MAGEE v. BRENNEMAN et al. (L. A. 6519.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 27, 1922.)

1. Attorney and client ☞63—Evidence held sufficient to support finding of existence of relationship of attorney and client.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, evidence held sufficient to support a finding of the existence of the relation of attorney and client between the mortgagors and the mortgagee.

2. Attorney and client ☞123(1)—Protection of client against unfair contracts with attorney applies to administrator of an estate.

Civ. Code, § 2235, providing that transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary by which the trustee obtains any advantage from his beneficiary are presumed to be without consideration, and under undue influence, applies to the relation between an attorney and his client who is administrator of an estate, regardless of Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, providing for payment of an administrator's attorney out of the estate.

3. Attorney and client ☞123(1)—Procuring note by attorney from his client held to put burden of proof that proceedings were fair on assignee suing on it.

Under Civ. Code, § 2235, providing that transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary, whereby the trustee obtains any advantage from the beneficiary are presumed to be entered into by the beneficiary without sufficient consideration, where an attorney procured a note signed by two defendants, secured by property worth $50,000, in exchange for an unsecured note signed by one of them, an assignee suing on the note had the burden of proving that the transaction was fair and regular, and was entered into by defendants voluntarily with a full knowledge of the facts.

4. Attorney and client ☞123(1)—Evidence held to sustain a finding that the amount of a note was an unreasonable charge and that the note and mortgage securing it were not executed and delivered voluntarily.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage securing a note given for an attorney's fees, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the amount of the note was an unreasonable charge, and that the note and mortgage securing it were not executed and delivered voluntarily.

5. Attorney and client ☞123(1)—Court held to have power to find what was a reasonable fee.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage securing a note given for an attorney's fee, where plaintiff failed to rebut the presumption arising from execution of the note and mortgage, while the relation of attorney and client existed between the parties that the note was executed under undue influence, the contract evidenced by the note was voidable at the instance of defendants, and the court had power to find what was a reasonable fee.

6. Appeal and error ☞843(3)—Where evidence supports findings which support judgment, considering insufficiency of evidence as to other findings is unnecessary.

Where evidence is insufficient to support findings which support a judgment, considering alleged insufficiency of evidence to support other findings is unnecessary.

7. Attorney and client ☞123(1)—Evidence held to support a finding that payments of interest on note were made while relation of attorney and client existed and were not made voluntarily.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage securing a note given for an attorney's fee, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that payments of interest on the note were made while the relation of attorney and client existed between the parties, and were not made voluntarily.

8. Equity ☞84—Defendants held not guilty of laches in setting up defense against note.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage securing a note for an attorney's fee given by defendants acting under undue influence, defendants are not barred by laches to set up the defense of undue influence, since it was a matter of defense to be set up when suit was brought on the note.

9. Attorney and client ☞123(1)—Determination of reasonable attorney's fee in prior action held not error.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage securing a note given by defendants for an attorney's fee in a will contest, where it was alleged the note was given as the result of the undue influence of the attorney, the determination by the court of a reasonable fee in the will contest was necessary to show whether the contract between the attorney and defendants was fair and regular.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Suit by Henry C. Magee against Clayton B. Brennehan and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, Miguel Estudillo, of Riverside, Alex W. Davis, of Los Angeles, and Walter C. Davison, of Riverside, for appellant.

Fredericks & Hanna, and Harold C. Morton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff, Henry C. Magee, from a judgment in favor of the defendants Clayton B. Brennehan and Friletta G. Brennehan, his wife, in an action tried by the court, sitting without a jury, to foreclose a mortgage given by the said two defendants to secure a promissory note for $10,000 executed by the said parties in favor of appellant's assignor, one Miguel Estudillo. It was found that certain fictitious persons, joined as defendants, were not served with complaint or summons, and were found to have no interest in the property.

It appears that, on July 18, 1911, the said Miguel Estudillo, who is an attorney, was retained by Brenneman to represent him in securing letters of administration upon the estate of his mother, Rebecca E. Brenneman, deceased, and thereafter, on July 21, 1911, to represent him in contesting a purported will of the deceased. For several years before this time Estudillo had acted as Brenneman's attorney in various legal proceedings. The contest of the will was successful and as a result Brenneman as heir obtained about $63,000 from the estate instead of a $5,000 legacy which he would have received under the purported will. Estudillo acted as Brenneman's attorney in the matter until the latter's discharge as administrator on August 1, 1913, and it was shown that for some time after this he continued to handle legal matters for him.

Before the trial of the will contest, Brenneman paid Estudillo $1,500 as a retainer fee. After the trial and on June 12, 1912, he paid him $5,000 more and gave him his promissory note in the sum of $10,000, to run for one year. The evidence as to what the agreement was with regard to the fee at the time Estudillo was engaged is involved in conflict. Estudillo testified that Brenneman agreed to give him half the amount recovered in the suit to contest the will. Brenneman testified there was no amount agreed upon until the $5,000 was paid and the note given. Both parties testified that the $6,500 in cash and the promissory note for $10,000 constituted the entire fee for the services in contesting the will.

On May 31, 1913, at Estudillo's request, the respondents executed a note and mortgage in favor of Estudillo in the sum of $10,000, which was given to Estudillo in exchange for Brenneman's note of June 12, 1912. This note and mortgage of May 31, 1913, was assigned to the plaintiff and is the one upon which this action is brought. The respondents have paid $4,000 on the principal and $1,080 interest upon the said note and mortgage and in their answer contest plaintiff's claim for the remaining $6,000 upon the grounds that they executed the note and mortgage "in form only"; that there was no consideration for its execution; that its execution was not the voluntary act of the respondents, but was brought about by the demand, the threatening attitude of Estudillo and the feeling of terror and bewilderment which these acts inspired in respondents. It was also alleged that the note of June 12, 1912, was executed by reason of Brenneman's belief in Estudillo's honesty, integrity, and good faith; by reason of Brenneman's weak mental condition; and by reason of the importunities and request of Estudillo and the relation of confidence existing between them at that time; that they had paid Estudillo in all the sum of $13,185 for his services in connection with the contest of the will; that $7,500 would be a reasonable fee for such services; and that any sum in excess of that amount would be oppressive, unconscionable, and exorbitant. The defendants do not seek the recovery of the amount they have paid beyond what is alleged to be a reasonable fee.

The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law and decreed that the note and mortgage be declared null and void and that plaintiff take nothing by his action. Judgment was entered in favor of the respondents, and from that judgment this appeal is taken.

1. Appellant contends certain findings of the court are unsupported by the evidence. These findings are to the effect that the note and mortgage were executed by respondents without any consideration; that for many years prior to the execution of the note and mortgage Estudillo had been continuously acting as attorney for both respondents in various matters; that on May 31, 1913, and for a long time prior thereto, Estudillo was the attorney and confidential adviser of respondents; that they reposed implicit confidence in him and in all matters acted as he advised them; that Estudillo continued to act as attorney for respondent Clayton B. Brenneman in the matter of the estate after May 31, 1913; that on May 31, 1913, and subsequent thereto, respondent Frilletta G. Brenneman was weak and feeble mentally and unable to withstand the importunity of a person of normal mentality; that Frilletta G. Brenneman was unsophisticated in the knowledge of business transactions; that respondents did not have sufficient mentality to realize the consequences of making payments upon the principal and interest of the note and mortgage, or of delaying objections to the note and mortgage; that the payments on principal and interest were not made voluntarily, but by reason of the influence exercised by Estudillo, and while Estudillo was their attorney; that neither Estudillo nor appellant has been injured by the delay of respondents in questioning the validity of the note and mortgage; that Estudillo appeared before the board of supervisors, sitting as a board of equalization, in behalf of respondents, in 1917; that the sum of $11,580 paid to Estudillo is ample compensation for the reasonable value of his services in the matter of the will contest, and that any sum in excess of that amount would be unreasonable, oppressive, and exorbitant.

The further contentions are made that by making payments on the note and mortgage after the relation of attorney and client had ceased, respondents ratified the contract; that respondents have been guilty of laches; that the court had no authority to determine what was a reasonable sum for the services Estudillo rendered; and that certain findings are in conflict and are insufficient to support the judgment.

[1] The finding that the relationship of attorney and client existed between Estudillo and respondents on May 31, 1913, on which day the note and mortgage were given, is sufficiently supported by the evidence. At that time Brenneman was still acting as administrator of his mother's estate, and Estudillo represented him in that capacity. Estudillo testified he procured Brenneman's final discharge as administrator of his mother's estate; that he represented Brenneman in other matters, and that he drew the wills of both respondents subsequent to May 31, 1913. Brenneman testified he went to see Estudillo from time to time on legal business after May 31, 1913, and that Estudillo acted as his attorney in various matters all during the time up to January 15, 1915. Appellant particularly insists the evidence does not show that Estudillo was Mrs. Brenneman's attorney. Respondents do not contest this, but claim the finding is immaterial. However, Mrs. Brenneman testified on cross-examination, in response to questions as to whether she had any business of her own with Estudillo prior to May 31, 1913, that she "had a little business with him when my sister died." In view of this it cannot be held the court could not have concluded that the relationship had not been terminated on that date. Apart from this, we think it clear that the testimony hereinafter referred to in connection with appellant's contention that the transaction was fair and regular, would have warranted a conclusion that Mrs. Brenneman entered into the contract as the result of undue influence without regard to the relationship of attorney and client.

[2] Appellant contends respondents should not be allowed to claim the benefit of this relation of confidence, because, on the particular date in question, Estudillo represented Brenneman, if at all, in the latter's official capacity as administrator only. He has cited section 1616 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 448, 101 Pac. 448, and Malville v. Kappeler, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 843, 37 Pac. 934, as supporting this position. These are authorities for the rule that an attorney may be retained by a client both in an official and a private capacity and that he must look for his compensation to the client in the respective capacities, but they are not authority for the proposition that, where an attorney is retained by the administrator of an estate, the latter as an individual is not entitled to the protection afforded by the relation of attorney and client. Section 2235 of the Civil Code draws no such distinction, but applies to all cases of attorney and client, where any contract is made whereby the attorney receives an advantage.

It having been shown that the relation of attorney and client existed between the parties, we shall next consider whether the dealings between them were fair and regular. In Metropolis Trust & Savings Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 598, 147 Pac. 265, 268, the court declared:

"The relation of attorney and client is of a fiduciary character, and the Civil Code (sec. 2235) clearly provides that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, 'are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence.' This does not mean that a trustee may not deal with his beneficiary. But if he does deal with him in such manner as to obtain an advantage, the trustee has the burden of showing by evidence that the transaction was fair. Certainly the obtaining of a note for $20,000, secured by a mortgage, is an advantage, and the attorney, or those claiming under him, cannot safely rest, as they did in this case, without affirmative proof of the facts surrounding the transaction."

It is further pointed out in that case that a consideration may be shown to exist for such a note, and also that if such a note is found to have been given as a result of undue influence, it is merely voidable and not void. In Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 425, 91 Am. Dec. 644, it was held that the beneficiary in such a case must show some damage resulting to him from the transaction. The court declared, in Shirk v. Neible, 156 Ind. 66, 59 N. E. 281, 83 Am. St. Rep. 150, that:

"These attorneys having agreed with their client during the progress of the confidential relation as to the amount of their fees, and demanded and taken a negotiable note and mortgage therefor, the law presumes the transaction to be fraudulent, and the fee excessive, and the burden is laid upon the attorneys to show by clear proof that it was fair, and the amount agreed upon but a reasonable compensation for the services which they had performed or would be called upon to perform under their employment."

In Cole v. Wolfskill (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 549, a physician brought suit on a note given him by a patient in payment for services rendered, and it was held that the fact that the contract was in writing was sufficient to rebut the presumption that an agreement between parties occupying a confidential relation was entered into without a sufficient consideration, the consideration being presumed from the writing. Section 1614, Civ. Code. The case of Dimond v. Sanderson, 103 Cal. 97, 37 Pac. 189, was there cited to the point that it was not sufficient to show merely that a confidential relation existed, but that it must also be shown that such a relation was used to obtain an unfair advantage. In Dimond v. Sanderson, supra, the court said:

"We think that, before the presumption contemplated for can apply, it must appear that plaintiff, in obtaining the note sued upon, obtained some advantage over the defendant, and that the possession of the note is not of itself evidence that any advantage has been obtained."

The court plainly held that the contract there was not shown to be one in which an advantage was obtained by the party occupying the position of trust, and therefore it did not fall within the rule of section 2235 of the Civil Code. The case of Cole v. Wolfskill, supra, therefore cannot be considered authority for the proposition that the burden of proof is shifted to the beneficiary in cases where the attorney has received an advantage. To place the burden on the beneficiary would be to put such contracts in the same category as those between parties occupying no relation of trust, to ignore the provisions of section 2235 of the Civil Code, and to deny this added protection to one whose confidence has been abused.

[3] The procuring of the note signed by both respondents, secured by property which the record shows to be worth about $50,000, in exchange for an unsecured note signed by Brenneman alone, was certainly an advantage to Estudillo. In addition, the evidence shows that the transaction was carried out at Estudillo's request. It therefore, under the authorities cited above, devolved upon appellant to show that the transaction was fair and regular and was entered into by respondents voluntarily with a full knowledge of the facts; and upon respondents to show that they had suffered damage as a result of the undue influence. There can be no doubt that the foreclosure of the mortgage involved in this suit, as well as the payment of an excessive fee, would be damaging to respondents.

[4] Appellant has sought to meet the burden of proof resting upon him, first by showing the amount agreed upon was a fair, reasonable charge for the services performed. The trial court concluded appellant failed to sustain this burden. It was found the amount of the note was more than a reasonable charge, and that the note and mortgage—

"were not made, executed, or delivered freely or voluntarily, by said defendants or either of them, but such said note and mortgage were so made, executed and delivered against the wish and will of said defendants, and each of them, and by reason of the request, demand, and importunities of said Miguel Estudillo, and by reason of the power and influence of said Miguel Estudillo over said defendants, and over each of them."

We cannot say these findings are not warranted by the evidence. Expert testimony was received on the subject of the value of Estudillo's services, and under all the circumstances the court found that the sum of $11,580 was "ample compensation for the reasonable value" of the services he performed. Although the court might consider any fee within certain limits not to be so unreasonable as to characterize the transaction as unfair, some sum which would be a reasonable fee must necessarily be fixed as a specific amount by the judgment. The record shows Estudillo conducted the will contest with energy and diligence, but although appellant has cited cases in which as high as one-third or one-half of the property involved in the action was held to be a reasonable contingent fee, it cannot be held, upon the evidence before us, that the trial court erred in concluding that $11,580, amounting to almost a fifth of the property involved, was a reasonable compensation for contesting the will.

The evidence does not show that the note and mortgage, though for more than a reasonable amount, were executed while the parties were acting upon an equal footing. Estudillo testified it was given simply at his request, with no discussion except as to the amount of interest. On the other hand, Brenneman stated he did not know what the extent of the property included in the mortgage was until foreclosure proceedings were begun; that "my wife was frightened and is to this day. She was afraid of Estudillo. He forced us to do it, he would not let us go out of his office." Mrs. Brenneman stated that Estudillo "acted like he was angry and I thought he was, because his face got so red. He raised up that way and leaned over the drawer. I was afraid of him. I signed the note and mortgage because I thought I had to. He told me I had to and I thought I had to"; that "I always had confidence in Mr. Estudillo, and I thought he was all right as an attorney, and I thought whatever he told me to do I had to do." She testified further:

"Q. Why did you go to Mr. Estudillo's office on May 31, 1913? A. Because I thought I had to. Mr. Estudillo sent for me to come.

"Q. Did you think you had to go every place Mr. Estudillo sent for you to go? A. I felt that I had to do everything that Mr. Estudillo told me to do then."

Both respondents stated that they continued to consult Estudillo because they feared he would be insulted if they did not, and because they believed he would eventually "do right" in the matter of the will contest. There was other evidence to the same effect.

[5] It thus appears the contract was entered into while the relation of attorney and client existed and was advantageous to the attorney, Estudillo. This raised a presumption of undue influence and cast the burden on appellant to prove the transaction was fair and regular. Appellant failed to show that the transaction was fair and regular, or that the agreement was for a reasonable amount. Thus the presumption that it was entered into under undue influence was not rebutted. Under these circumstances the contract was voidable at the instance of respondents. Hence, the court could have found, as it did, what was a reasonable fee for the services performed. The finding is that an amount equal to such a fee had already been paid. It follows there was nothing more due to him, and the conclusion and judgment in favor of respondents must therefore be upheld.

[6] Since the evidence sustains the findings above referred to, and those findings support the judgment, it becomes unnecessary to consider the alleged insufficiency of the evidence as to the others. Wheat v. Bank of California, 119 Cal. 7, 50 Pac. 842, 51 Pac. 47.

[7] 2. Appellant's next contention is that:

"Defendants by their act in paying through Mr. Estudillo's stenographer $4,000 on the principal, voluntarily as the evidence shows, ratified and confirmed the note and mortgage of May 31, 1913."

The court found that certain payments on interest on the note and mortgage were made between February 6, 1914, and September 22, 1915, and that $4,000 was paid on the principal January 15, 1915; that:

"Said payments were not made freely or voluntarily, but were made under the circumstances and by reason of the influence and motives in these findings mentioned, and at times when the relation of attorney and client continued to exist between said Miguel Estudillo and said defendants."

Appellant insists this finding is not supported by the evidence, in that at the times the payments were made Estudillo was not acting as attorney for either of respondents. Inasmuch as it was not shown how long a period the various services covered, or what interval elapsed between them, it cannot be said the court was not justified in concluding that Estudillo was acting continuously as Brenneman's attorney at the times the payments were made. With reference to the payments, Brenneman stated that he paid interest on the note and mortgage for a while, but that he let Estudillo ask him for it; that he did not want to pay it very much, but that he did pay it; that he paid "because I had to do it. That is the reason. He would not leave me off." He also testified that all the interest payments were made by him. Such testimony as this amply supports this finding.

[8] 3. Appellant contends that respondents have been guilty of laches, and that a finding of the court to the effect that neither Estudillo nor appellant has been injured by the delay of respondents in questioning the validity of the note and mortgage is not supported by the evidence. This contention cannot be maintained. In Estate of Cover (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 583, it was said that:

"While it is the rule generally that a cause of action grounded in fraud must be instituted within three years from the time of the discovery of the fraud, that rule does not apply to a defense interposed upon the ground of fraud in a case where it is affirmatively sought to have declared valid and enforceable a contract claimed to have been conceived and consummated in fraud. In such a case, neither the limitation of the statute nor the doctrine of laches will operate to bar the defense of the invalidity of the agreement upon the ground of fraud, for, so long as the plaintiff is permitted to come into court seeking to enforce the agreement, the defendant may allege and prove fraud as a defense. In short, it is not incumbent upon one who has thus been defrauded to go into court and ask relief, but he may abide his time, and when enforcement is sought against him excuse himself from performance by proof of the fraud. [Citing cases.]"

Respondents here are not suing to rescind the agreement, but are interposing the defense of undue influence. This case is therefore analogous to Estate of Cover, supra, and respondents are not barred by any delay in seeking relief, but were entitled to plead their defense whenever appellant sought to recover.

[9] 4. The next contention is that the court erred in assuming to determine what was a reasonable compensation in the matter of the will contest. Inasmuch as it was alleged the contract was entered into by respondents through undue influence, it was necessary for the court to determine whether or not the fee charged was reasonable, as showing whether the contract was fair and regular. Appellant has cited certain authorities to the effect that, in an action for attorney's fees, where both parties have full knowledge of all the facts, the jury is not empowered to go behind the agreement between attorney and client to decide whether, in addition to being free from undue influence, the agreement is for a reasonable fee. In view of the fact that the contract here was found to have been entered into under undue influence, it is unnecessary to consider those cases.

5. Three of the findings are claimed by appellant to be in conflict. These are to the effect that the note and mortgage were executed without any consideration whatsoever; that the note and mortgage were executed and delivered instead of and in place of the promissory note of June 12, 1912; and that the note and mortgage were executed in partial payment of the attorney's fees claimed by Estudillo to be due, and for no other consideration. One of the allegations of the answer was that there was no consideration for the note and mortgage. Appellant claimed that the note of June 12, 1912, in exchange for which the note and mortgage were given, was a valid consideration even if there were no other. Since the conclusion we have reached does not involve the question of consideration, it will not be necessary to pass on this assignment of error.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re DUFFILL'S ESTATE. (L. A. 6929.)

Rehearing Denied April 27, 1922.)

- 1. Appeal and error ⚡1071(1) — Erroneous finding as to value of property in hands of trustee harmless to beneficiary where trustee's commission based on income.

An erroneous finding, by the superior court, as to the value of certain stock included in the corpus of a trust estate, was not prejudicial to the beneficiary appealing from a decree fixing the compensation of the trustee, where the finding showed that the court recognized the value therein stated was excessive, but stated it as the value at which the property was delivered to the trustee by the executor, and where the trustee's compensation was fixed as a percentage of the gross income.

- 2. Trusts ⚡315(2)—Court had judicial discretion in fixing trustee's compensation.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1700, directing that the trustee shall be allowed such compensation for his services as the court may adjudge to be just and reasonable, the fixing of the amount allowed the trustee is within the judicial discretion of the court to be exercised not arbitrarily, but with due and proper consideration of the nature and extent of the services actually rendered.

- 3. Trusts ⚡316(2)—Seven and one-half per cent. of gross income allowed to trustees held not excessive fee.

An allowance to the trustee of seven and one-half per cent. of the gross income collected by it during the period was not an excessive fee, where the only witness testified that such allowance was common, though his hasty calculation of the amount such percentage would produce was erroneous.

- 4. Trusts ⚡316(2)—Trustee may be allowed fee larger than executor of property of same value.

Since the trustee is required to invest the money received by him under the trust by Civ. Code, § 2261, and must pay interest thereon if he fails to do so, under section 2262, he is subject to greater responsibilities than a personal representative of a deceased person of an estate of equal size, and may be allowed for his services a fee largely in excess of the commissions which could be allowed under the statute to an executor.

- 5. Attorney and client ⚡140—Factors governing determination of reasonable fee for attorneys of trustee stated.

In determining what constitutes a reasonable attorney's fee for the attorneys of trustee, the court will consider the nature of the litigation, its difficulty, amount involved, the attention given, and the success or failure of the attorney's efforts.

- 6. Attorney and client ⚡166(3)—Expert testimony as to reasonable attorneys' fees is not binding but may be considered.

While the testimony of other attorneys as experts, as to reasonable fees for services rendered by attorneys for trustee, is not binding upon the court, which has power to fix the amount to be allowed independent of such testimony, the court need not wholly exclude the testimony from its consideration.

- 7. Appeal and error ⚡932(1)—Presumed that court did not consider contingent nature of attorney's services for trustee.

If attorneys for trustee are not entitled to have the court consider, in fixing their fees, the fact that they would recover nothing if they were unsuccessful, there is a presumption that the court disregarded such fact in fixing the fees, especially where the amount as fixed by the court was smaller than that stated as reasonable by expert witnesses, who did consider the contingent nature of the employment.

- 8. Attorney and client ⚡141—Services in connection with controversies incidental to sustaining of trust held proper to be considered.

In determining the reasonable amount of fees to be allowed attorneys for trustees whose services resulted in preserving the trust estate, the services rendered by the attorneys in connection with controversies as to certain features of the trust, as to which they were unsuccessful except to the extent of securing a decision that those features did not invalidate the entire trust, may be considered.

- 9. Appeal and error ⚡984(5)—Allowance of fees for attorneys of trustees can be reversed only for abuse of discretion.

The allowance of fees for attorneys of trustees will not be interfered with except in case of plain abuse of discretion.

- 10. Appeal and error ⚡984(5)—$75,000 allowed attorneys of a $1,000,000 trust held not excessive.

An allowance of $75,000 to attorneys for trustees for their services in preserving, during litigation, a trust estate amounting to substantially $1,000,000, which involved trial and briefing of the case below, and on appeal as to intricate questions of law raised by the litigation, though larger than Supreme Court might have allowed if it were fixing the fee in the first instance, was not so excessive as to show an abuse of discretion justifying a reversal of the allowance.

- 11. Trusts ⚡227—Trustee can be allowed attorney's fee for preserving trust, notwithstanding interest of one beneficiary in defeating it.

A trustee can be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee for his services in preserving the trust against litigation, which fee is to be paid out of the entire trust, even though it was to the interest of one beneficiary that the trust be defeated, because that beneficiary would have received a greater share under the intestate laws.

12. Trusts *§*274(3)—Attorney's fee for preserving trust in litigation may be charged against the corpus of the estate.

The allowance to attorneys for their services in preserving the trust in litigation, attacking its validity, is an extraordinary expenditure which may properly be charged against the corpus of the trust estate.

13. Trusts *§*325—Evidence held to show attorneys' services were rendered for trustee, notwithstanding formal appearance for other beneficiaries.

Evidence at a hearing on settlement of trustee's account held to show that the services rendered by attorneys for the trustee in defending the trust against litigation by one beneficiary, were rendered under employment by the trustees and for them, though the same attorneys also entered a formal appearance on behalf of other beneficiaries of the trust.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased. From a decree settling the account of the trustee and allowing fees to the trustee and its attorney, Harry Duffill, one of the beneficiaries of the trust, appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 180 Cal. 748, 183 Pac. 337.

Gibson, Dunne & Crutcher and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, James P. Sex, of San Jose, and Alex W. Davis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHURTLEFF, J. Eugenie A. Duffill, a resident of the county of Los Angeles, this state, died on January 7, 1916, leaving a last will and testament, which was duly admitted to probate by an order of the superior court of said county. By the terms of this will the testatrix, after making a number of specific bequests, bequeathed and devised the residue and remainder of her estate, real and personal, to the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, one of the respondents, in trust for certain enumerated purposes. Those material to this inquiry were: To invest and reinvest said property in productive and income-bearing property, and to apply and distribute the income and principal as follows: Pay to Albert Duffill, a minor, a grandson of testatrix, and son of Harry Duffill, a son of testatrix, the sum of $3,000 per annum, to be paid until he reaches the age of 21 years; to the said Harry Duffill the sum of $4,000 per annum, to be paid until Albert attains the age of 21 years, or, in the event of Albert's death before reaching that age, until the date Albert would have been 21 had he lived, each of said payments to be made in the amounts and in the manner directed in the will. It was further provided that, in the event Harry Duffill should marry one Mrs. Alice McNamara, then and in that event said trustee shall pay to him thereafter "only the sum of $2,000 per year instead of $4,000 per year." The testament also directed that when Albert attains the age of 21 years the trustee shall—

"segregate said trust fund, and any accumulations thereof, into two equal parts, and transfer and convey one of said parts to my son, Harry Duffill, provided, however, that in the event my said son, Harry Duffill, shall have married Mrs. Alice McNamara prior to the date when said Albert Duffill shall have attained the age of 21 years, then and in that event the said trustee shall at said time distribute to my son, Harry Duffill, one-half of the balance of the estate in the hands of said trustee after withdrawing therefrom all of the stock of the Grasselli Chemical Company." (Italics ours.)

Parenthetically, it should be said that the will provided that the last-mentioned stock, which constituted a large part of the estate and the value of which, as will presently appear, is involved in this appeal, should not be sold by the trustee. The will, after making provision for the distribution by the trustee to Albert, upon attaining the age of 21 years, of his share, provided that in the event of the death of Harry "prior to the distribution to him of his portion of the trust estate," distributable to him in accordance with the terms of the will and which terms were part of the trust created thereby, the trustee "shall distribute all of said trust fund" to Albert "in the same manner, and upon the same trusts as are provided for the portion of said trust fund" directly distributable to him (Albert) under the trust. In the event of the death of Albert while there remains undistributed to him any portion of the trust fund, distributable to him under the terms of the trust, the trustee forthwith shall distribute to Martha Duffill (wife of Harry and mother of Albert) "one-fourth of the entire trust estate and accumulations then in the hands" of the trustee, and the remaining three-fourths shall be distributed to Harry, "said distribution to be made at the same time that * * * Albert Duffill would have reached the age of 21 years had he lived." In the event of the death of both Harry and Albert "while any portion of said trust estate remains in the hands of the trustee and undistributed," upon the death of the last survivor of them, the trustee shall forthwith distribute the entire trust fund undistributed at that time as follows: An undivided one-fourth thereof to Martha Duffill; an undivided one-fourth thereof to Mrs. Ida Ireland, and the remainder thereof, share and share alike, to the children of Mrs. Daniel Bailey living at the time of the death of the last survivor of Harry and Albert. The will nominated the said Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank the executor thereof, and requested that while acting in the capacity of either trustee or executor, it "retain as its attorney John M. Kemp." The order admitting the will to probate included the appointment of said Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as executor, and as such executor it administered the estate of said Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased. Ultimately a petition for the distribution of the estate was filed by the executor, which, although not incorporated in the record, unquestionably asked for distribution in accordance with said terms of the will. The appellant, Harry Duffill, upon the hearing of said petition, presented a number of objections to distribution in conformity with the will, which, with one exception, were based upon the contention that the testamentary provisions objected to were illegal and void. The portions assailed were, briefly, the following:

(1) The provision for the accumulation of the income to be paid adult persons; (2) the part of the will reducing Harry's annuity of $4,000 and the one-half of the trust fund which he would otherwise receive, should he marry Mrs. Alice McNamara. Harry further claimed that the destruction of these enumerated features of the will, by reason of their illegality, involved a disposition of the estate of the decedent contrary to her will so that her intent failed, the result of which was to invalidate the trust in its entirety. He made the further contention that certain large stock dividends declared and paid during administration by the Grasselli Chemical Company, constituted income. All of the foregoing claims of Harry Duffill were resisted by the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as executor, as trustee named in the will, as guardian for Albert, of whom it was apparently the legally appointed guardian, and Martha Duffill, all of whom were represented by the same firm of attorneys. The superior court sustained all of said contentions upon the part of Harry, except the one that the entire trust was invalidated. A decree of final distribution was entered accordingly, which was on appeal affirmed by this court. Estate of Duffill, 180 Cal. 748, 183 Pac. 337.

The particulars of the appeals, two having been prosecuted, will be discussed in the course of this opinion.

The decree of distribution, which became final August 31, 1919, distributed certain property to the respondent Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank in trust, the possession of which it as executor, pursuant to the terms of said decree, transferred to itself as trustee on September 8, 1919.

On February 20, 1920, said Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, as such trustee, filed its "first account current and report showing the administration of the trust estate" including, among other things, receipts and disbursements "since the 8th day of September, 1919 (the date of the transfer of the trust property to it), to the 22d day of January, 1920." It was alleged in said report, which was in the nature of and is frequently herein called a "petition," that, during the administration of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased, and after the filing of the petition for final distribution therein, Harry Duffill filed objections, and to which we have just referred, to the distribution prayed for, and sought to have the entire trust, as provided in the will of deceased, declared invalid, and the whole of her estate immediately distributed to him, which necessitated the employment by the trustee of attorneys to defend the will and trust by it created, and that it employed the firm of Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg to render that service. It was further alleged that had all the objections of Harry been sustained, the trust would have been rendered invalid and there would have been no property in the hands of the trustee to pay said attorneys, since all of the property of the deceased would, pursuant to the laws of succession, have been distributed directly to Harry, her only child and sole heir, and Albert would have received nothing "under said will, either presently or in the future." The report also averred that the petitioner (Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank) made an agreement with the said attorneys (Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg) whereby it was agreed—

"that, in case said Harry Duffill succeeded in declaring the said trust invalid, that the said attorneys should receive nothing for their compensation, and that their fees should be wholly contingent upon the successful termination of the said litigation, * * * that, if said attorneys were successful in sustaining the said will and the trust provisions thereof, that it would be necessary that the court should allow such fees as would be reasonable under all of the circumstances and that any fee paid to them should be approved by this court" (superior court of the county of Los Angeles).

The report further alleged the filing by Harry of said objections to the distribution of the estate of deceased as prayed, the various hearings and arguments in the matter; the filing of voluminous briefs; the rendering of an opinion by the trial court sustaining the trust and ordering a decree in accordance with such opinion; the reopening and reargument of the matter; the preparation of additional briefs resulting in the court again upholding the trust, and a decree to that effect filed and signed on July 17, 1918; that Harry appealed to this court from said decree of final distribution; the argument in such appeal; the preparation and filing of briefs, and the preparation of an answer to Harry Duffill's petition for rehearing after the affirmation of said decree by this court, and the denial of such petition. It also alleged that the litigation which ensued by reason of Harry's said objections "covered a period of nearly three years"; that the value of the trust estate was approximately $1,000,000, and that the gross income from the estate since the death of said Eugenie A. Duffill, which, as has been said, occurred January 7, 1916, had (on February 20, 1920), amounted to about $400,000"; that there are two principal beneficiaries of the said trust estate (assuming that the minor Albert Duffill lives to the age of 21 years), and that when the said Albert Duffill shall attain the age of 21 years, the corpus of the said estate, according to the terms of said decree, will be divided equally between said minor and the said Harry Duffill, and that it is just and proper that the entire fee for sustaining the said trust and will should be paid from the corpus of the said trust estate. It was shown by the report and account that the accumulations for the benefit of Albert amounted to $195,083.80. The prayer asked that the account be settled and allowed; for reasonable compensation to the attorneys for the trustee for their services in connection with "litigation involving the validity of the will of the deceased and of the said trust"; that a reasonable sum be allowed the trustee as compensation to the date of filing the account and report (February 20, 1920), which shall also include a reasonable amount to be allowed the attorneys for the trustees "for the preparation and filing of this account and for legal services in the administration of the said trust to this date" (February 17, 1920). To this account and report, the appellant, Harry Duffill, filed a number of objections, but those material to this inquiry were: (1) That the valuation of $190 per share of the Grasselli Chemical Company was too large, and that its true value was $170 per share and no more; (2) to the allowance out of the trust estate of a fee (by Harry called a "contingent fee") to the trustee for its attorneys. It should be noted that Harry did not object, and never has objected, and does not now object, to the allowance of reasonable compensation to the attorneys for petitioner, or of a "reasonable sum * * * as compensation" to the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, as trustee. Harry does, however, as will subsequently be developed, contend that the respective sums allowed in response to the application were not reasonable.

Upon the hearing, the account, with certain corrections with which we are not concerned, was allowed and approved.

The court in the main found that the allegations of the report were true, that on September 8, 1919, the date upon which it was delivered to the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as trustee, and up to and including January 22, 1920, the date to which the account is brought, the value of common stock of the Grasselli Chemical Company was $170 per share, and not $190 per share as shown in the account and report, "but that said stock is carried at $190 per share as a matter of bookkeeping for the reason that the final decree of distribution in the above-named estate (Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased) fixed a value on said stock of $190 per share," which valuation was allowed and approved by the decree.

The court further found that, had the objections of Harry Duffill to distribution of his mother's estate been entirely sustained, the result would have been to extinguish the trust and that there would have been no property in the hands of the trustee from which to pay attorney fees; the employment by the trustee of the firm of Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg as its attorneys and the agreement between said attorneys and the trustee to the effect that their fees should be wholly contingent upon the preservation of the trust, and that, in the event "the trust should be sustained, it would be necessary that the court should fix and allow such fees as would be reasonable under all of the circumstances, and that any fee paid to them (attorneys) should be approved by the court"; that various hearings were had of said objections of Harry to the decree of distribution.

The court further found "that the said Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, as trustee, the said Albert Duffill by his guardian, Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, and Martha Duffill, as beneficiaries under said trust, defended the validity of the said trust; that Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg represented said Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as trustee, Martha Duffill, and Albert Duffill by Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, his guardian"; that evidence was taken and the matter argued and briefed by the respective parties, and the court rendered its decree, and, as heretofore stated, distributed the estate accordingly, and adjudged that the said provision for accumulations, except the one for the benefit of Albert, and the condition in restraint of marriage, were, and each of them was, void, and that the trust declared in the will was otherwise lawful and enforceable; that Harry Duffill appealed from that portion of the decree adjudging the trust valid, and that "the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as trustee and executor, Albert Duffill by his said guardian, and Martha Duffill appealed [to this court] from the whole of said decree"; that briefs were prepared and filed and thereafter the decree was affirmed (180 Cal. 748, 183 Pac. 337); that the estate was distributed in accordance with said decree, and that the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, as trustee, received "as of September 8, 1919, properties of the value of $1,000,000." The court further found: contract and agreement; that said services were rendered in the defense of the validity and in protection of the trust itself, and for the purpose of preserving and protecting the validity of the said trust for the benefit of the beneficiaries thereof and inured to the benefit of said entire trust; that the reasonable value of said services of Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg is the sum of $75,000 and the said sum is hereby allowed to said trustee for the said services of said attorneys. It is further ordered that the said sum of $75,000 be paid ratably out of the corpus of the said trust estate and from the fund accumulated for the benefit of Albert Duffill, a minor, as the same was distributed to and received by the said trustee from the said executor; that said trustee rendered further services in the handling of the said estate after the same was distributed to it, and there is hereby allowed to said trustees for said services the further sum of $3,449.72, as compensation to said trustee for its services from September 8, 1919, up to and including the filing of this account."

It is from parts of this decree that this appeal is taken. The particulars in which appellant seeks a reversal, each upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, are the following: The fixing of the value of the capital stock of the Grasselli Chemical Company at $190 per share; the amount ($3,449.72) allowed the trustee as compensation for its services performed between September 9, 1919, and January 22, 1920, both inclusive, and the allowance to the trustee of $75,000 for the services of its attorneys.

[1] We cannot see in what respect the appellant is injured by that portion of the decree which allows and approves Schedule "B" attached to the account in which the value of the common stock of the Grasselli Chemical Company is shown to be $190 per share, in view of the fact that the decree declares that, during the period covered by the account, its value was in fact $170 per share. Such valuation was in accordance with the stipulation of the parties made at the hearing "that as of the date the decree became final * * * the actual value of the Grasselli Chemical Company stock was $170 per share," and it was also of that value at the time this account was filed. It was likewise stipulated that the stock was worth $170 a share as of the date January 22, 1920. The valuation of $190 was the one fixed in the decree of distribution of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased. We think the language of the decree is the equivalent of a finding that the real value of the stock at the time indicated was $170 per share. The decree in terms declares that "said stock is carried at $190 per share as a matter of bookkeeping." While it must be conceded that the $190 per share valuation increased the volume of the corpus of the trust estate in the sum of about $82,620, this was of no moment and in no wise injured or prejudiced any one interested in the estate so far as fixing the fee of the trustee was concerned, since the allowance to the trustee, as stated by appellant, "was 7½ per cent. of the gross income shown by the [trustee's] account" (italics ours), and not upon the value of the corpus of the trust estate.

[2, 3] The next contention of the appellant is that the allowance of $3,449.72 to the trustee for its services from September 8, 1919, to January 22, 1920, both dates inclusive, a period of 4 months and 14 days, was excessive and unreasonable. Our Code directs that the trustee shall be allowed "such compensation for services as the court may adjudge to be just and reasonable" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1700), which in effect leaves the fixing of the amount thereof to the judicial discretion of the court, to be exercised, not arbitrarily, but always with due and proper consideration of the nature and extent of the services actually rendered. These services fairly include not only what might be termed physical services such as collecting and distributing the income, care of the property, making investments and the like, but in addition the responsibilities arising from and ever attending the faithful and profitable administration of the trust. Doubtless the amount of compensation awarded to the trustee in this instance was, in a measure, based upon the testimony produced by respondent, the appellant having offered none upon that issue, which, in substance, was that the usual charge for services of trustees similar to those involved here is 7½ per cent. of the gross income of the trust, and that an amount so ascertained is a reasonable allowance to the trustee in this instance. The trustee's trust officer, when testifying touching the compensation to be awarded the trustee, said:

"That [7½ per cent. of the gross income] is the usual charge made by trustees under such circumstances, and that is a reasonable amount. In this instance, I do not recall how much that would figure, but I think it will run $1,500 or $1,600."

We think it entirely clear from the context that the witness intended to and did adopt the percentage mentioned as the controlling basis for his opinion, and that the figures given were errors attributable to a hasty computation. It appears that the estate in the hands of the trustee and respondent consisted of 4,131 shares of the capital stock (common) of the Grasselli Chemical Company, a beneficial interest in a trust with the Citizens Trust & Savings Bank of orange and walnut groves; rented property in the city of Los Angeles, and an undivided one-half interest in acreage in Los Angeles county; add to the value of these properties the income from the trust, and you have an estate approximating $1,000,000 in value, the care of which gave rise to corresponding responsibilities, properly to be taken into consideration by the court when determining the fee of the trustee.

[4] Appellant draws our attention to the fact that the sum allowed the respondent, as compensation for its services, is largely in excess of what its commissions would have been under our statute regulating the same, had it received cash in an amount equal to said gross income in the capacity of an executor. But, in our opinion, the value of the services of the respondent, under the circumstances of this case, should not be determined by comparing them with those of an executor or administrator. A trustee of a trust, such as we are considering, is subject to greater responsibilities than a personal representative of a deceased person of an estate of equal size. It is incumbent upon the trustee to invest the money received by him under the trust (Civ. Code, § 2261), and if he omits to do so, he must pay simple interest thereon if the omission is merely negligent, and compound interest if willful (Civ. Code, § 2262); not so with the personal representative, whose legal duty is, in the main, confined to assembling, taking possession of, and protecting the property of the deceased, and holding it for administration. He is not obliged to invest any part of it, and if he does so it is at his peril, except in cases, and they are few in number, where the statute permits it to be done with the approval of the court.

In view of what precedes, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in making said award to the trustee, or that it was unreasonable.

Appellant's objection to the allowance of $75,000 to the trustee for the services of its attorneys, and to its payment "ratably out of the corpus of the estate and from the fund accumulated for the benefit of Albert Duffill," as the same was distributed and received by it, presents a more difficult question. Appellant concedes that the attorneys should receive a reasonable fee, but stoutly contends that $75,000 is "grossly excessive" and unreasonable.

[5] The court found, in accordance with the allegations of the report previously mentioned, that the trustee entered into an agreement with its said attorneys—

"that their fees should be wholly contingent upon the preservation of the trust, * * * that it would be necessary that the court should fix and allow such fees as would be reasonable under all of the circumstances, and that any fee paid to them should be approved by the court."

This agreement, so far as the trust was concerned, did not, in our opinion, provide for a contingent fee as commonly understood, since, under any and all circumstances, the compensation was by its terms to be fixed by the court and be reasonable in amount. Obviously, if the trust was invalidated, there would be no funds with which to liquidate the fee, and it was therefore unnecessary to provide for such a contingency. In our judgment the contingent feature of the arrangement looked more to the protection of the trust company from the possibility of being obligated to pay a fee in the event of Harry's attack upon the trust being in all respects successful. The attorneys did not agree to advance the costs of the litigation, neither did the trustee undertake, without the approval of the court, to give them any portion of the estate or any amount whatever. Indeed, the agreement left the amount of the fee precisely where the law places it—in the discretion of the court, the same in any event to be reasonable. In California Jurisprudence (vol. 3, § 96, p. 698) it is said:

"In determining what constitutes a reasonable [attorney's] fee, the court will take into consideration the following factors: The nature of the litigation, its difficulty, the amount involved, * * * the attention given, [and] the success or failure of the attorney's efforts," —authorities being cited from our appellate courts in support of each of these enumerated elements. The amount involved in the several controversies, in connection with which the services under review were rendered, was large, the nature of the litigation intricate, and in some of its aspects, difficult. It was skillfully conducted, and in its most particular part—the preservation of the trust scheme—successful. The record furnishes abundant proof of the learning, ability, and industry of the attorneys representing the different interested parties, although it is the professional services and ability of the attorneys for the respondents with which we are immediately concerned.

The proof of the services performed by the attorneys for the trustee was both documentary and oral, the former consisting of a brief filed by respondent in the matter of the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased, pending in the said superior court of the county of Los Angeles, upon the hearing of Harry Duffill's objections to distribution of said estate as asked in the petition for distribution, to which we have heretofore referred, copies of the transcript, briefs, petition for rehearing, and reply thereto, filed in this court in the appeal of Harry Duffill from the decree of distribution in said estate (Estate of Eugenie A. Duffill [L. A. No. 5907] 180 Cal. 748, 183 Pac. 337), a typewritten transcript, copies of appellant's opening brief and respondent's reply thereto, filed in this court in the appeal of Albert Duffill (a minor), Martha Duffill, and the said Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank from the decree of distribution. (Estate of Eugenie A. Duffill [L. A. No. 5886] 180 Cal. 748, 183 Pac. 337). A comparison of said two briefs shows that the one filed by respondent's attorneys in said appeal No. 5886 was taken almost in its entirety from the one they filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in the matter of Harry Duffill's objections to distribution in accordance with the will, so that it may be said that the real work of preparing both of said briefs was performed when the first was written. The subject-matter of the brief, filed by the attorneys for respondent in No. 5907, consisting of 75 pages, was new, and in the main not found in any prior brief offered in evidence. The oral testimony was mainly that of John W. Kemp, a member of the firm of Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, to which the fee in question will, if approved, be paid. He testified touching the services rendered by him and his associates as follows: The proceeding which, in effect, called for the interpretation of the will (of Eugenie A. Duffill) was filed on February 5, 1917, after the petition for distribution had been filed, and raised three questions, 1, that the provisions for accumulations were void, the other, that the inhibition of Harry's marriage to Mrs. McNamara was void, and the third, that the trust failed as a whole because of these alleged illegal provisions. Later in the litigation there arose the question as to whether or not certain stock dividends, which had been declared by the board of directors of the Grasselli Chemical Company, constituted principal or income. After the settlement of the preliminary matters, the objections came on for hearing in July, 1917, and the taking of evidence and oral arguments, according to the recollection of the witness, consumed "three or four or five days." The matter was argued at great length by counsel for Harry Duffill, and "on behalf of the trustee by myself [John W. Kemp] and Mr. Mitchell," and the matter was finally submitted on briefs, Harry Duffill filing a brief of some 95 pages of typewritten matter. We answered with a printed brief of over 100 pages. Later, in the summer of 1917, the other question in regard to stock dividends was raised, and the witness thinks, although not positive, re-argued orally. In any event, the question was submitted on briefs. We took evidence as to the conditions of the Grasselli Chemical Company and its surplus on hand at various years prior to that time and up to the time of the declaration of these dividends. The matter was decided in the spring of 1918, but the decree was not agreed upon and signed until the 17th of July, 1918. After the decree was signed, we had several conversations with the attorneys for Harry Duffill, looking towards an adjustment by accepting the decree as it was. A settlement not being accomplished, both parties appealed, the particulars and results of which appeals have been previously stated. In this litigation I represented the trustee under the will, the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank. We were attorneys for the executor originally. We also represented the trustee, and we also appeared formally for the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as guardian of the estate of Albert Duffill, and for Martha Duffill, one of the beneficiaries under the will. The time consumed in the litigation extended over a period commencing February 1, 1917, and ending September 1, 1919—

"two years or thereabouts, and it took a good deal of time, necessarily, both myself and one other member of the firm—a great deal of our time—and at times other members of the firm and employees. It was a very important case, one involving large interests, and we spent all the time that was necessary upon it—that we thought necessary. The value of the estate, based upon the valuation of $170 a share [capital stock of the Grasselli Chemical Company], at the date of the trustee taking it over was $1,001,160. That was the value of the corpus of the trust estate turned over to the trustee, which included the accumulations for the benefit of Albert Duffill, which at that time were worth $180,103.80. The corpus of the main trust for the benefit of both Albert and Harry was at that time $821,056.71."

The corpus of the trust estate was held jointly for the benefit of the two beneficiaries, Albert Duffill and Harry Duffill. Expert testimony was produced by respondent touching the reasonable value of the services performed by the attorneys for the trustee, but no evidence upon that branch of the controversy was offered by appellant in rebuttal. Mr. Bradner W. Lee, basing his opinion upon the testimony relating to the services rendered, all of which testimony was heard by him, declared that a reasonable fee would be "any where from 10 to 15 per cent. of the amount recovered to the trustee." Upon cross-examination he stated the basis for his opinion in these words:

"The trustee is charged with the duty of sustaining the trust. * * * He starts * * * to recover by an action a certain fund which would not come to the trust except from his activities in the discharge of that duty, and he recovers the fund. I think then the percentage should apply on the fund so received. * * * There was nothing, as I understood the testimony [that] would have come into the hands of the trustee except for his activity * * * the fee being upon a contingent basis I should say that, in an estate of this size, * * * that a fee of from 10 to 15 per cent. under those circumstances would not be unreasonable."

Mr. J. W. Anderson, after stating that he had heard the testimony touching the services of said Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg to the trustee in sustaining the trust, said:

"Basing my answer upon that evidence, I would say 10 per cent. of the gross amount received by the trustee or saved to the trust would be a reasonable fee to be allowed such attorneys for that litigation as a contingent fee."

[6] Both Mr. Lee and Mr. Anderson are eminent members of the bar of California and thoroughly qualified to testify concerning the value of legal services. While, as contended by appellant, their testimony was not binding upon the trial court, which had the unquestioned power to fix the amount to be allowed for attorneys' fees, without, and independent of, expert testimony (Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 281; Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298-307, 104 Pac. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49; Zimmer v. Kilborn, 165 Cal. 523-525, 132 Pac. 1026, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 368), it does not follow that the court should have wholly excluded this testimony from its consideration. The record discloses that the allowance made by the court was in fact less than that named by either of them.

[7] Walbridge v. Barrett, 118 Mich. 433, 76 N. W. 973, and O'Neill v. Crane, 65 App. Div. 358, 72 N. Y. Supp. 812, mentioned in appellant's brief, substantially hold that the value of an attorney's services could not be augmented by the fact that they were to be performed gratuitously in the event the side of the litigation they represented was unsuccessful. Accepting, for the purpose of discussion, the pronouncement of these cases as the law, the fee allowed here does not fall within it. There is no presumption that the court gave any consideration to the contingent feature of the agreement. If such agreement contravenes the law, the presumption is that the court disregarded it. "The fact that the award happened to concur in part with the terms of the contract does not necessarily imply an enforcement of the contract." Estate of Willard, 139 Cal. 501, 506, 73 Pac. 240, 64 L. R. A. 554. While we must assume that the experts took into consideration the contingent element of the agreement and gave their opinion accordingly, the fact that the court fixed a less amount than named by them, respectively, would indicate that it was not controlled by their figures, and eliminating its contingent aspect, adopted an amount which in its judgment was reasonable, which could be done without wholly rejecting the testimony of Messrs. Lee and Anderson.

In Freese v. Pennie, 110 Cal. 467, 470, 42 Pac. 978, 979, this court said:

"It is well, and it is the law, that the court should temper this kind of evidence [of attorneys testifying as experts] with its own calm judgment, based upon the amount and kind of labor performed, and to thereupon make its decree. When a court has done this, this court, as an appellate court, only has the right to interfere with its judgment when a plain and palpable abuse of its discretion (for it has a large discretion in such matters) has occurred."

The amount allowed in that case was $80,000.

Counsel for appellant cite Estate of Page, 57 Cal. 238, holding that an administrator is without authority to make a contract with an attorney to give him an interest in the property of the estate as compensation for recovering it. Estate of Willard, 139 Cal. 501, 73 Pac. 240, 64 L. R. A. 554, where this court refused to enforce a contract between an administrator and a real estate broker with respect to the amount the latter was to receive for his services, but, held, which is important, that the court could nevertheless, in its discretion, make an allowance to the administrator for a reasonable compensation. These cases are easily distinguishable from the one at bar. Here, as previously stated, there was no contract for a definite amount, the only contingent feature of the arrangement being that, unless successful, the attorneys would not be compensated, and, above all, the amount of the fee was expressly left to the court.

[8] Nor can we agree with appellant that the controversy concerning the accumulations, the condition in restraint of marriage, and the disposition of the stock dividends, had nothing to do with the trust or its protection, or the preservation of its property, and therefore should not be considered when ascertaining the fee. The two first-mentioned conditions were among the provisions of the trust contained in the will, and the last was one of construction of the terms of the trust. It is our opinion that the trustee was not only justified in employing, but it was its duty to employ, competent attorneys to represent it upon the hearing of each of these important matters. The fact that in certain branches of the litigation the trustees were unsuccessful does not necessarily exclude the services performed by its attorneys in connection therewith from the consideration of the court when fixing the attorneys' fees.

[9, 10] While the allowance we are considering impresses us as large—larger, perhaps, than we would have named had the fixing of it in the first instance been with us—nevertheless, in view of all the circumstances of the litigation, in connection with which it was allowed, its importance, the amount involved, and the extent and character of the services, we cannot say that there is present here a "plain and palpable abuse of discretion." In Estate of Parker, 200 Pac. 620, very recently decided, in speaking of an allowance made to an attorney for an executor for extraordinary services, we said:

"But the allowance of attorney's fees for such services rendered in the probate of an estate rests largely in the discretion of the court in the first instance, and will not be reversed or modified, unless this court can plainly see and unequivocally say that the order under review is absolutely and unqualifiedly an abuse of discretion."

To the same effect is Estate of Conrad Iser (Cal. App.) 198 Pac. 1014. This court, in Freese v. Pennie, supra, gave expression to the following, which embodies and adequately expresses the conclusion we have reached touching the fee here assailed:

"While the fee allowed in the present case [Freese v. Pennie] is a very large one, still we think the judgment must stand. It appears that the allowance made is less than the estimate of any witness who testified, and such fact indicates that the trial court did not consider itself absolutely bound by the expert testimony presented. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the allowance is clearly and palpably too great."

To the same effect is Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 418, 63 Pac. 838, 839, where it is said:

"The order of the lower court as to attorneys' fees will not be interfered with, except in case of a plain abuse of discretion."

[11] The appellant urges that the trial court was wrong in deciding that the services performed by the attorneys for the trustee—

"were rendered in the defense of the validity and in protection of the trust itself and for the purpose of preserving and protecting the validity of said trust and for the benefit of the beneficiaries thereof, and inured to the benefit of said entire trust."

He concedes that the services rendered in the litigation, to which we have referred, were very valuable to Albert Duffill and Martha Duffill, but affirms they were in the main, if not wholly, opposed to his pecuniary interest, and for that reason to his injury rather than to his advantage. He urges that the compensation of the attorneys for the trustee must be determined and apportioned according as the services helped or injured the different beneficiaries of the trust. Granting that this may be the rule under some conditions, it is not applicable here. The professional efforts and services of the attorneys were in this instance directed to the preservation of the trust in its entirety, a duty imposed upon the trustee, whom they represented, irrespective of whether, if upheld or only partially upheld, the result might be more beneficial to some than to others, who are interested therein; or harmful financially to some of those who are beneficiaries under its provisions, because, if abrogated, they would, under the laws of succession, receive a larger portion of the estate than they take under the trust. The appellant assailed the validity of the entire trust, against which attack it was the duty of the trustee to defend, and which it did defend, with the result that though some of Harry's contentions were sustained, the general scheme of the trust was nevertheless preserved. Under such circumstances, we can see no good reason for holding that the attorneys for the trustee should not be compensated for the entire service. By accepting the trust, which the facts indicate was done here, the trustee became bound to execute it (39 Cyc. 293), and to fulfill the purpose of the trust as declared at its creation. (Civ. Code, § 2258.) In Pomero's Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed., § 1085), the rule is thus declared:

"The trustee is entitled to be allowed * * * all expenses reasonably necessary for the security, protection, and preservation of the trust property, or for the prevention of a failure of the trust." (Italics ours.)

In the Estate of Gartenlaub v. Union Trust Co., 198 Pac. 209, 16 A. L. R. 520, we adopted the following, taken from 39 Cyc. 339, as being a correct exposition of the law:

"The rule which has been applied in a great variety of cases affecting the administration and execution of trusts is that a trustee has a right, whenever necessary to the proper administration, preservation, and execution of the trust and the prosecution or defense of action, to employ counsel and to be reimbursed from the trust estate for whatever sums he has paid for the services of such counsel. The rule is applicable even though the cestui que trust employed counsel to represent the same interests, and although, to a certain extent, the private and personal interests of the trustee may also be involved in the litigation." (Italics ours.)

In view of the duty of the trustee, which it may be said spoke for and represented Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased, the maker of the trust, to uphold and defend the trust as a whole, which includes its several provisions, we are not impressed with appellant's contention that the trustee should not be allowed compensation for its attorneys, to be paid them for services performed in an effort to preserve the trust as a whole, because some one or more features forming part of the entire scheme were held to be invalid.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the trial court as to the value of the services of, and the allowance made to, the attorneys for the respondent trustee.

[12] Appellant's next point is directed to the legality of that portion of the order requiring said $75,000 to be paid ratably out of the corpus of the trust estate and from the fund accumulated for the benefit of Albert as the same was received by the trustee from the executor, the result of which was, so appellant affirms, to impose a charge of approximately $30,000 upon his property rights and interest "for services rendered against him and to that end that those property rights might be destroyed," and in support of his contention appeals to the maxim "he who takes the benefit must bear the burden." Civ. Code, § 3521. The theory is that the trustee's efforts to preserve the trust were exclusively for the benefit of Albert and Martha in that, had it been destroyed in its entirety, they would have received nothing from the estate of Eugenie A. Duffill, deceased, since, under such circumstances, all of her property, with the exception of a few specific bequests, under the laws of succession would have gone to Harry. We think, however, that the rule applicable here is that the trust estate is chargeable with all expenditures incurred in the interest of the beneficiaries (Somerset Ry. v. Pierce, 98 Me. 528, 57 Atl. 888), and that such interest is determined and ascertained, not from what they or any one of them might receive if the trust was destroyed, but by and from what they take under the terms of the trust. Our Code provides that "a trustee is entitled to the repayment, out of the trust property, of all expenses actually and properly incurred by him in the performance of his trust." Civ. Code, § 2273. Unquestionably, when proceedings are commenced, attacking the validity of a trust, it is the right, and, under circumstances (similar to those appearing here, the duty, of the trustee to secure legal assistance, and it is equally beyond doubt that the facilities to command such assistance should not be narrowed, if not entirely destroyed, by any such restriction as that compensation for such assistance is wholly dependent upon, and measured by, the degree of success.

While, under ordinary conditions, the accustomed expenses incurred in the administration of a trust are payable from the income, extraordinary and unusual expenses are payable from the corpus of the trust. Estate of Gartenlaub v. Union Trust Co., supra. In Cogswell v. Weston, 228 Mass. 219, 117 N. E. 37, it is said:

"The regular annual or periodically recurring expenses arising in the administration of a productive trust commonly are paid out of the income, while extraordinary and unusual expenses are chargeable against the capital. The costs of litigation generally fall in the latter class."

We are satisfied that the attorney fee here involved was an extraordinary expense. While it is debatable whether any part of the allowance to the trustee of an attorney's fee should have been ordered paid from the fund accumulated for the benefit of Albert Duffill, which, we understand, is made up of his share of the net income, we are not called upon to consider that question, as Albert makes no objection to the apportionment.

We can find no merit in the argument that Harry's interest in the corpus should contribute no part of the fee of the attorneys for the trustee, because he was obliged to compensate his personal counsel, who represented him in his effort to secure the complete annulment of the trust. Estate of Gartenlaub v. Union Trust Co., supra.

Appellant refers to a large number of cases which he affirms reflect the principle lying at the base of, and which sustains, his contention that his interest in the trust should not be burdened with any portion of the attorney fees. The facts of none of those cases are analogous to the facts shown here, and for that reason they are not controlling.

[13] Finally, the appellant insists that the record confirms the claim, which he makes, that in substantially all of the litigation and proceedings in which the trustee participated, and for the conduct or defense of which the trustee employed the attorneys to whom the fee in question will be paid, and in some of which controversies Martha and Albert Duffill appeared, the trustee espoused their cause as against him, and in some instances its attorneys actually represented them in the litigation, and for that reason his interest in the corpus of the trust estate should not be subjected to the payment of any part of the fee. The court found that Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg represented said Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank as trustee, Martha Duffill, and Albert Duffill by Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, his guardian, in the said proceeding involving the validity of the trust, both upon the trial and in the two appeals from the judgment, but a survey of the entire record satisfies us that in reality the services of the attorneys were exclusively rendered to the trustee, and that their separate appearance on behalf of Martha and Albert was formal and gratuitous—part of the general plan of resistance to Harry's attack upon the trust. Such was the undisputed testimony of Mr. Kemp, who declared that the appearance of his firm for Albert and Martha was merely formal. In response to the question propounded by the attorneys for Harry, if he was not seeking "to have one attorney's fee fixed and settled for all those persons [trustee, executor, Martha and Albert] that you represented," he replied, "we are seeking to have the attorneys' fee fixed for the trustee." The court found the services of said attorneys were rendered to the trustee, and the order of the court recited that the amount allowed to the trustee was "for the said services of said attorneys." Bailey v. Buffalo Loan, Trust & Safe Deposit Co., 213 N. Y. 525, 107 N. E. 1043; Id., 214 N. Y. 689, 108 N. E. 561, cited by appellant to the point that the trustee will not be allowed an attorney's fee, where it joins with certain beneficiaries against another beneficiary who is contesting the validity of the trust and is ultimately successful, while in many of its facts similar to the one at bar, is unlike it in these important and distinguishing particulars, namely, there the trust was wholly abrogated, while here the trust was preserved. There, as said by the court:

"As the attempted trust was invalid, the funds constituting the same passed under the will to the plaintiff as residuary legatee. As against him, the trust company has no claim or right to the fund" (italics ours.) (213 N. Y. 525, 107 N. E. 1043.)

—while here the trust was sustained with the result that the funds of the trust remained in the hands of the trustee. There (214 N. Y. 689, 108 N. E. 561) it was declared, and therein lies the fundamental difference between that case and this:

"As the plaintiff was finally successful, we determined that the action [defending the trust] of the trust company did not justify an award of costs or an allowance to it to be paid by plaintiff, the successful party."

Here the trustee was successful in preserving the trust, which was the main and dominant issue, although some of its specifications and provisions were adjudged to contravene the law.

For the foregoing reasons we hold that the evidence supports the findings and decree of the trial court, and that the record is free from reversible errors.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ESTES. (Cr. 2417.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 419, 420(1), 1169(2)—Admission of hearsay testimony held error but harmless where fact otherwise shown.

The admission of testimony by decedent's sister that the decedent, defendant's wife, had an appointment to meet defendant on the night of the homicide, which had been made by decedent, was erroneous because such testimony was hearsay as to defendant, but not prejudicial where the sister also testified that defendant stated to her, after the homicide, that he kept the appointment, thereby establishing his knowledge thereof.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1170½(5)—Exclusion of cross-examination as to time defendant bought pistol held harmless.

The exclusion of cross-examination of a witness for the prosecution, who testified he sold to defendant the pistol with which the killing was committed, as to the hour at which he made the sale, was not prejudicial to defendant where the record of sale signed by defendant was in evidence and was not contradicted, though the witness made contradictory statements as to the hour at which the purchase was made, one of which fixed the time at an hour while defendant was at work.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1035(3), 1166½(12)—Statement witness' opinion was as good as some expert's who would testify, not objected to, held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the defense was insanity, and defendant intended to introduce expert testimony on that issue, a remark by the court in ruling on an objection to an opinion of the witness as to handwriting that the offer probably was as good as some of the experts that would testify, was not prejudicial to accused as belittling the testimony of his experts, where the experts also testified for the prosecution and where no objection was made to the remark, but it was treated facetiously by counsel for both sides.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1169(1), 1170½(5)—Allowing surgeon to testify from notes and exclusion of cross-examination as to course of bullets held harmless.

In a prosecution for homicide where there was no dispute that decedent was killed by bullet wounds inflicted by defendant, it was not prejudicial error to allow a surgeon, who held the autopsy, to testify from his notes as to the course of the bullets and to refuse to permit defendant's counsel to inspect the notes and to examine the witness with reference thereto.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1169(9)—Admission of evidence as to caliber of bullet causing death held harmless.

Admission of testimony by a surgeon as to the caliber of the bullet which caused the death of decedent, without requiring him to qualify as to competency, was not prejudicial to defendant, where the same witness had previously stated the caliber without objection and where there was no denial that deceased was killed by a bullet fired by defendant.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1166½(12), 1170½(5)—Exclusion of cross-examination to show interest and court's remark witness was interested held harmless.

In a prosecution for homicide, defendant was not prejudiced by the exclusion of cross-examination of the sister of the decedent who testified for the prosecution as to her interest, manifested by her taking notes of the case, nor by the court's query in connection with its ruling thereon: "Why shouldn't she be interested?"

7. Witnesses $\S$ 271(1)—Letter introduced by prosecution does not authorize production of other letters unconnected therewith on cross-examination.

The introduction by the prosecution, of a letter written by defendant, does not justify the production on cross-examination of other correspondence not connected with that letter, but defendant could, as part of his own case, call for and introduce such correspondence.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 466—Exclusion of cross-examination as to opinion based on defendant's appearance held proper.

Where a witness for the prosecution, who had seen defendant shortly after he killed his wife, and while he was semiconscious from a self-inflicted wound, had described defendant's eyes as glazed, with greatly dilated pupils, it was not error to sustain objections to cross-questions whether defendant's eyes did not appear as the eyes of an insane person, and if there was not something abnormal about his eyes.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 479—Medical student held not qualified to state opinion as to insanity.

Where a witness for defendant, who had been a medical student for three years, and who saw defendant in the ambulance shortly after he had killed his wife and attempted to kill himself, had been permitted to testify to the facts as to defendant's appearance and action, it was not error for the court to refuse to permit him to state his opinion as to defendant's sanity, since he did not qualify as an expert and had not had intimate acquaintance with defendant.

10. Criminal law ⚡456—Nonexperts cannot express opinion as to sanity unless they are intimate acquaintances.

Witnesses who did not qualify as experts cannot express an opinion as to defendant's sanity unless they qualify to express such an opinion under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, authorizing such opinion if the witness was an intimate acquaintance.

11. Criminal law ⚡1144(10)—Refusal of adjournment to permit preparation of hypothetical questions not presumed, erroneous.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the defense was insanity, the refusal of the court to permit an adjournment to enable defendants to prepare a hypothetical question to ask its experts, even if an abuse of the trial court's discretion, will not be presumed erroneous where such a question was asked his experts, and there was no complaint made that it was insufficient.

12. Criminal law ⚡1170(4)—Exclusion of statement of expert during trial held harmless, in light of testimony.

The erroneous exclusion of a statement made by an expert for the prosecution after the completion of his testimony that defendant might have been insane was not reversible error, where that expert did not testify directly that defendant was sane but only that he did not see any evidence he was insane, and on cross-examination stated that, under the facts in a hypothetical question, defendant might have been insane.

13. Criminal law ⚡823(2)—Instruction on insanity held not erroneous as assuming homicide, in view of other instructions.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the jury had been previously instructed as to presumptions of innocence and necessity of proof of every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt, an instruction on insanity, based on the hypothesis defendant committed the act, was not erroneous as assuming that defendant killed deceased, especially where that fact, if not expressly admitted, was inferentially conceded throughout the trial and there was no possible doubt, under the evidence, that he did kill deceased.

14. Homicide ⚡294(1)—Instruction on irresistible influence held proper under the evidence.

Where the defense in a homicide prosecution claimed "confusional insanity," the characteristics of which were a state of mind rendering defendant incapable of knowing the nature of his act, or an uncontrollable impulse to do certain things, it was not error to give an instruction correctly stating the law as to irresistible or uncontrollable influence.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Augustus M. Estes was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Fred H. Thompson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SLOANE, J. This appeal is by the defendant, from a judgment of conviction in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, of murder in the second degree.

That the defendant committed the act charged as murder in the information is established by the evidence, beyond all controversy. That is, on the 16th day of October, 1920, the defendant shot and killed his wife, Alena Estes, at Fifth street and Broadway, in the city of Los Angeles.

That the killing was under circumstances constituting manslaughter or murder in the first or second degree is only disputed by evidence tendered under the plea of not guilty, for the purpose of establishing the insanity of the defendant to a degree that rendered him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, in relation to the act resulting in the homicide.

By its verdict of guilty, the jury found against the plea of insanity.

The uncontroverted facts are that the defendant and the deceased were husband and wife; that they had been living for a long time in a state of domestic infelicity and had several times separated, and were living separate and apart, by reason of the desertion of the wife at the time of the homicide. They had five little children whom the husband was trying to support and who, in the periods of separation, had been consigned to the care of a children's home. The defendant attributed his wife's refusal to live with him to disloyalty on her part to the marriage relation. Whether with or without cause, he believed she was having improper relations with other men. The defendant, shortly before the tragedy, had attempted to induce his wife to return and live with him on account of the little children. This she refused. She claimed to be afraid of him, and there is evidence that he had on several occasions threatened her life. There is no doubt that, at the time of the shooting and for some period previously, the defendant was greatly depressed, extremely nervous, and unbalanced, physically and mentally. The evidence does not disclose the movements of the parties immediately preceding the shooting, or how they came to be together at the time and place of the tragedy. Bystanders were first attracted by the act and noise of the shooting, which was immediately followed by the attempt of defendant to shoot himself. There was some evidence to indicate that they had met in this vicinity by appointment, previously arranged with the defendant.

The evidence of acquaintances as to defendant's conduct preceding the tragedy, and his depressed state of mind, together with the testimony of medical experts that in their opinion he was insane, was doubtless sufficient to have supported a finding that he was irresponsible because of insanity, if such had been the verdict of the jury. It is not questioned, however, that evidence against such degree of insanity was sufficient to support the finding of the jury that defendant was sane, implied in its verdict that he was guilty of murder in the second degree.

The only other ground of attack, upon the conclusiveness of the evidence to support the verdict, arises on the proof of malice sufficient to remove the case from one of manslaughter to that of murder. This element was sufficiently supplied to sustain the verdict by evidence of the feeling existing between the defendant and his wife, his threats to kill her, and the purchase of a pistol of the caliber of the one used in the shooting, on the afternoon of the evening of the tragedy. This statement of the established facts in the case narrows a consideration of the errors assigned on this appeal to the question of a fair trial on the issues of insanity and malice.

Certain alleged errors of the trial court in admitting and excluding evidence over the objection of defendant's counsel are specified as being calculated to prejudicially influence the jury in finding against the defendant in these particulars. We agree with the District Court of Appeal, from which this appeal comes to us on rehearing, that such erroneous rulings occurred, but in the light of all the evidence in the case can it be held that such errors have caused any miscarriage of justice? In other words, is there any shadow of ground for believing that, had the rulings complained of been favorable to the defendant, the jury could or would have been influenced thereby to a different verdict?

Taking first the question of malice, because it is most easily disposed of, the uncontroverted evidence shows that the defendant was desperately tried by his wife's conduct. He found himself unable to induce her to come back to his home. He was shown by competent and unimpeached testimony to have made threats against her life. He had on other occasions sought interviews with her which had been denied. The shooting itself was under circumstances that would imply malice. No evidence was offered excepting that alone of mental irresponsibility, which would rebut the implication of malice. The evidence, admitted over defendant's objections, was merely corroborative or cumulative on this point. It merely emphasized what was already sufficiently proved.

[1] The most objectionable ruling affecting the question of malice and premeditation arose on the admission of certain testimony of Inez Jewell, a sister of the murdered woman, as to a prearrangement on the part of defendant to meet his wife at the time and place of the tragedy. On the part of the prosecution this witness was asked:

"Were you to meet the defendant Saturday somewhere? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did you make this arrangement with the defendant to meet him Saturday? A. Over the telephone with her," meaning with the defendant's wife.

This answer in no way connected the defendant with such arrangement, and, if it indicated that such an arrangement had been reached between defendant and his wife, was clearly hearsay. It should have been stricken out on defendant's motion. There was further testimony to the effect that the arrangement was that the witness and her husband were to meet the defendant on this Saturday evening, the night of the murder, at Seventh and Broadway, and that they were later to meet the wife of defendant at Fifth and Broadway.

To the question, "How did you make this arrangement with the defendant to meet him Saturday?" the witness answered, "Over the telephone with her." As evidence of an arrangement between the wife and her sister for a meeting at the time and place mentioned, this testimony was properly admitted. It was incompetent, however, to in any way connect the defendant with knowledge of or agreement to such meeting. The witness, in fact, testified that she had no talk with the defendant about the proposed meeting near the place where the tragedy occurred.

The only evidence that defendant was party to or had knowledge of such an arrangement was that the witness had been so informed by her sister over the telephone, which, as already pointed out, was hearsay and not in any way binding on the defendant.

Of course, if there was such an understanding between defendant and his wife, or if information was conveyed to the defendant of such an arrangement between the witness and his wife, it would sufficiently account for his meeting his wife at the place and time of the shooting, no matter how he heard of it. The witness further testified that she and her husband did go to Seventh and Broadway at 7:30 that evening, but failed to meet the defendant, and were at Fifth and Broadway at 10 minutes after 8, but did not meet the others there. In the absence of a showing that defendant was in some way informed of the proposed rendezvous, the testimony should have been excluded. It does, however, appear by the testimony of this same witness that, in a conversation with defendant after the shooting, the defendant told her that he did go to Seventh and Broadway and afterwards to Fifth and Broadway at the times mentioned, which would justify an inference that he had received some information of the proposed appointment. But whether the parties to the tragedy met that evening by appointment, or on the sole initiative of the defendant, or by accident, has slight bearing on the question of malice. It is quite clear that he was seeking a meeting with his wife, and just how it was brought about is of little consequence.

[2] Objection is also made to the ruling of the court, restricting the cross-examination of the witness Runge, who testified to having sold to defendant a pistol, of the caliber of the one with which the shooting was done, on the afternoon of the fatal day. The witness had previously testified that the sale was made at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Later he testified that it was about 3 o'clock. It developed that the defendant was on duty as a motorman on an electric car at 2 o'clock and did not leave his work until about 3, and it was sought on cross-examination to show that the witness changed his testimony as to the time of day the sale was made after learning such fact as to the time defendant quit work. Such cross-examination might better have been permitted, but the witness had, at no time, been positive as to the exact time of the sale, and if it was actually made to the defendant, it was entirely immaterial whether it was at 2 or 3 o'clock.

There was no pretense of disputing the purchase of the pistol by defendant. A record of the sale was introduced in evidence, bearing a signature which the witness testified to be that of the defendant. Defendant's proven authentic signature was before the jury, in relation to another phase of the case, it is true, but it is hardly conceivable if any question existed as to the identity of the person to whom the pistol was sold, that the defense would not have resorted to this obvious means of testing the genuineness of the signature.

We are satisfied that no error occurred on the trial which could have affected the sufficiency of proof of malice to justify the verdict.

The question of defendant's sanity is the sole issue of defense open to review on this appeal. Conceding that under the evidence a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity would have sufficient support in the evidence, were there any errors in the admission or exclusion of evidence which were calculated to prejudice this issue against the defendant?

[3] Appellant assigns as error a statement made by the trial judge in the presence of the jury, which it is claimed tended to call in question the credibility of certain of defendant's witnesses.

Upon the examination of a witness for the defendant who was asked to identify a certain signature from his familiarity with the handwriting of the alleged signer, the court, in overruling the objection to his competency, made the remark:

"Well, I think I will let him testify. Probably his opinion is as good as some of the experts we will get here."

As appellant's case rests largely upon the opinions of experts, he thinks that this remark was calculated to have a prejudicial effect on the jury. It was doubtless inconsiderately made, and carried perhaps some sort of an innuendo unfavorable to expert testimony, but it was directed to no particular witness, and both the prosecution and the defense introduced the testimony of experts, and anyway the observation was not in its terms derogatory. The witness was held qualified to testify. There is no reason to suppose that the court questioned his entire competency and credibility, and to say that his opinion was probably as good as that of other witnesses to be heard on the trial bears on its face no implication against the reliability of the testimony of the others referred to. We cannot think that the incident, however interpreted, can have affected the action of the jury. Furthermore, no objection was made at the time. The remark was treated facetiously by counsel on both sides. Had objection been made by counsel for defendant, the court would doubtless have cured any possible error by explanation and instruction to the jury.

[4] Exception was taken to the refusal of the court to sustain defendant's objection to permitting the surgeon, who held the autopsy on the slain woman, to testify from his notes, and in refusing to allow defendant's counsel to inspect the same and examine the witness regarding them before allowing their use as memoranda.

Here, again, it may be conceded that the rulings of the court were erroneous. But all the witness testified to from such notes was as to the location and nature of the wounds upon the person of the victim of the shooting. There is no pretense of a dispute that the wounds, wherever located, caused death, and their location is not otherwise material to the case. In fact, on another assignment of error in which the appellant objected to introducing in evidence the bloody garments which showed the location of the bullet holes, appellant's counsel states that "there was no question as to the course or direction of the bullet." Error in the admission of incompetent evidence of an uncontradicted and conceded fact cannot be held to justify a reversal on appeal.

[5] It was also assigned as error that the court permitted the autopsy surgeon to testify, without qualifying as to his competency, to the caliber of the bullet found in the wound. The surgeon had, in a former part of his testimony, testified that the bullets were 25 caliber, prior to the direct question as to what the caliber was, to which this objection was taken, and there was no objection to or motion to strike out this former testimony. Moreover, this is another of the uncontroverted facts of the case entirely susceptible to adverse proof, if any question had existed.

[6] It is assigned as error that counsel for defendant was not permitted to pursue his cross-examination of the witness Inez Jewell, sister of the slain woman, on account of her taking notes at the trial, to show her interest and bias in the case; also a remark of the trial judge, "Why shouldn't she have an interest in the case?" Neither the ruling nor the remark of the judge was prejudicial. She was a sister of the dead woman. She admitted she was keeping notes of the evidence. The fact was obvious, and the remark of the court merely affirmed the point of counsel's objection, that she was, from the very nature of the circumstances, an interested witness. Counsel for appellant say that the statement, "Why shouldn't she be interested," assumed that the defendant was sane and that he killed the deceased premeditatedly. That would be a very extravagant inference. The words quoted simply assumed what counsel was asserting, that the witness was interested, and the fact did not require further proof.

[7] The letter written by defendant and introduced by the prosecution did not justify the production, on cross-examination, of other correspondence not connected with the letter in evidence. Defendant had a right in his own case to call for and introduce other correspondence relevant to the case, but this he did not attempt to do.

[8] The witness W. H. Maddox, called on behalf of the people, was present at the shooting. On cross-examination he was asked if he noticed the eyes of the defendant at that time and if they did not appear to him "as the eyes of an insane person," and if there was not something abnormal—something unusual about the eyes of this man" that particularly attracted his attention.

The sustaining of an objection to these questions is assigned as error. The objection was properly sustained. The witness was permitted to testify that the eyes were glazed and the pupils greatly dilated. He was not qualified to give an opinion as to the significance of these conditions. The witness had just testified to seeing the defendant put a pistol in his mouth and firing a bullet into his own head. The defendant, at the time the witness observed his eyes, was stretched on the sidewalk in a state of semi-consciousness. It might be taken for granted that such conditions would produce in themselves "something abnormal" in the expression of the eyes. Under the circumstances no legitimate inference of insanity could be drawn from the appearance of his eyes.

[9] Walter M. Harvey, a witness called on behalf of the defendant, testified that he had been a medical student for three years; that he had put in 3,000 hours in the Receiving Hospital of Los Angeles, where he had numerous opportunities to observe insane people. He, like the witness Maddox, only saw the defendant immediately after the tragedy, and in the ambulance on the way to the hospital, when defendant was in a semiconscious condition from self-inflicted wounds. This witness was permitted to testify to all the facts relating to defendant's appearance and actions while under his observation, but the court refused to allow him to give his opinion as to the defendant's sanity.

Appellant concedes that the witness did not qualify as an expert so as to justify admitting his opinion upon a hypothetical statement of facts, and it appears from the evidence that he had no intimate acquaintance with the defendant, and his only opportunity for observation was for a brief period when the defendant was suffering from his injuries and practically unconscious as a result thereof. Under such circumstances the opinion of the witness was properly excluded.

[10] Similar assignments of error relating to other witnesses are based upon the refusal of the court, after taking the testimony of the witnesses as to their observation of the appearance and conduct of the defendant, to permit them to express an opinion as to defendant's sanity. In each instance such ruling was based upon the insufficiency of the showing that the witness was qualified under subdivision 10 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which only authorizes the admission of such an opinion, from one not an expert on insanity, when he is shown to have been an intimate acquaintance of the defendant. The proffered testimony was properly excluded.

[11] Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to take an adjournment of the trial, in order to permit counsel for defendant to prepare a hypothetical question to propound to the experts on insanity.

Such a hypothetical question was framed and propounded by the defense, and it is not pointed out wherein it was not sufficient. Unless it appears that defendant failed to get a full and satisfactory opinion from his witnesses in this respect, no error will be presumed, even if the court abused its discretion in refusing an adjournment.

[12] The trial court should have permitted counsel for defendant to ask the witness Dr. Sawyer if he had not subsequently to his examination in chief stated to one Mr. Vogel, "that the defendant might have been insane." But, under the circumstances, we cannot deem the error prejudicial.

Dr. Sawyer's testimony for the prosecution was at best indefinite and negative in its character. He had made a brief personal examination of the defendant three or four months after the date of the shooting, after the trial had commenced, and testified that, in his opinion, at the time of such examination the defendant was sane. He at no time directly testified that defendant was sane at the time of the shooting, though he did state, upon his attention being called to certain facts introduced by the defense to prove insanity, that he did not see any evidence in the testimony that would lead him to believe that the defendant was insane. On the other hand, upon cross-examination upon a hypothetical state of facts in the case, the witness answered that the defendant "might have been insane according to that." Most of his testimony was directed to special acts and conduct of the defendant, offered by defendant to prove insanity, which the witness stated would not necessarily, or did not in his opinion, indicate that the man was insane.

The declaration claimed to have been made to the man, Vogel, if proven, would only indicate a state of speculation by the witness as to defendant's mental condition, which is apparent throughout his testimony, and in the instance above referred to was expressly stated.

The jury was fully and correctly instructed as to the law of the case, and we find no prejudicial error in the rulings of the court in granting or refusing instructions.

The appellant makes particular objection to the instruction on insanity predicated upon the theory of "irresistible impulse." That part of the instruction claimed to be unwarranted and prejudicial reads as follows:

"It has been urged, on behalf of the defendant, that it being impossible to assign any reason for the perpetration of the offense, he must have been acting under what is called a powerful and irresistible influence or homicidal tendency. But in that connection I charge you that the circumstances of an act being apparently motiveless is not a ground from which you can safely infer the existence of such an influence. Motives exist unknown and innumerable which might prompt the act. A morbid and restless (but irresistible) thirst for blood would itself be a motive urging such a deed for its own relief."

It is not questioned that such instruction correctly states the law, but appellant claims that the instruction assumes the commission of the homicide by defendant, and is based upon an unwarranted statement that defendant relied upon evidence that he acted under an irresistible influence or homicidal tendency.

[13] As to the assumption in the instruction that defendant committed the homicide, the contention of appellant cannot be maintained in the light of other instructions given, in which the jury was fully informed as to the presumptions of innocence and the necessity of proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every element of the offense charged.

[14] This particular instruction was directed to the defense of insanity, which is always based upon the hypothesis that the defendant has committed the act thus sought to be excused, and does not carry the implication that the act itself does not first have to be proved to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. Moreover, if the fact of the homicidal act was assumed as a proven fact, in this case, it would not be prejudicial, as it is a fact which, if not expressly admitted, was inferentially conceded throughout the trial. The commission of the crime was not a controverted fact on the trial, other than as made by the issue of insanity. There is no possible doubt, under the evidence, that the defendant shot and killed his wife. The sole defense rests on the degree of the crime, and the defense of what is called "confusional insanity." The characteristics of such insanity, as explained by expert witnesses for the defense, consist of such a state of mind as to render the sufferer incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or an uncontrollable impulse to do certain things. It cannot be said that this latter element was not before the jury. Defendant's experts expressed the opinion that, under the facts presented to them, the defendant "was impelled by a force over which he had no control"; that among the delusions found on an examination of the defendant was "the impulse to do things, and an impulse over which he had no control"; and, again: "He was unable to control the act which he did, in my judgment." All this was ample justification for instructing the jury as to the application of this form of insanity to the case.

As heretofore stated, the only controverted points in this case are as to the defendant's mental insanity and responsibility for the homicide and, if he was responsible, the degree of his guilt.

We find no error in the trial indicating that there was a miscarriage of justice in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

HINKEL v. CROWSON. (S. F. 9321.)(Supreme Court of California. March 8, 1922.
Rehearing Denied April 7, 1922.)

1. Homestead §108—That administrator has not been appointed held no excuse for not presenting claim constituting lien on homestead.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1475, providing that liens on the homestead must be presented to the administrator and shall be valid against the homestead, only for a deficiency, applies, though no administrator was appointed in view of sections 1294, 1365, 1377, providing for appointment of administrators and for appointing any applicant, where those preferentially entitled fail to apply.

2. Homestead §108—Waiver of claim against general assets does not excuse presentation of claim, constituting a lien on the homestead.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1475, providing that liens on a homestead must be presented to administrator, and that the lien may be enforced against the homestead only for a deficiency, after personal assets are applied, presentation of the lien to the administrator is a condition precedent to the right to enforce it against the homestead, and the general rule that, where a lien is on a specific piece of land, presentation to the administrator is not necessary, when no claim is made on the general assets, has no application.

3. Homestead §108—Vendor's claim for price is a "lien" within statute requiring presentation to administrator.

Under Civ. Code, § 3046, declaring that "one who sells real estate has a vendor's lien thereon" and section 1241, providing that the homestead is subject to forced sale for vendor's liens, the right of the vendor to look to the land for the payment of the purchase price is a "lien," and, in order to subject a homestead to the payment of the lien, the vendor must first present his claim to the administrator of the deceased purchaser, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1475.

4. Homestead §108—Setting apart homestead to surviving husband of purchaser held not to relieve vendor from necessity of presenting claim for purchase price to administrator.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1241, providing that a homestead is subject to vendor's lien existing at the time the declaration of homestead is filed, a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1723, setting apart the homestead to the surviving husband of a deceased purchaser, did not have the effect of separating the homestead from the other property of the deceased wife, so as to relieve the vendor from the necessity of presenting his claim for the unpaid purchase price to the administrator of the wife, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1475, before being able to subject the homestead to the payment of the lien.

On Petition for Rehearing.

5. Executors and administrators §3(1)—Administration of estate can be had where necessary to enforce certain liens against the homestead.

Though there are no general assets of an estate subject to payment of ordinary debts, administration of an estate can be had to subject a homestead to payment of vendor's liens or mechanic's liens as provided for in Civ. Code, § 1241.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

See, also, 182 Cal. 68, 186 Pac. 1042.

James F. Sheehan, Chas. J. Heggerty, and Knight & Heggerty, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Richard B. Bell, of Berkeley (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The plaintiff sued to foreclose an alleged vendor's lien. The complaint alleges the sale and conveyance of the lot in question by plaintiff to one Florence G. Hinkel, for the price of $4,000, on November 27, 1914, the giving of a note for the price by said vendee; that it was agreed at the time that she would execute to the plaintiff a mortgage on the lot to secure the payment of the price but that she failed to do so; that the price is unpaid, except to the amount of $510; that said Florence G. Hinkel afterwards married the defendant, E. A. Crowson, and thereupon filed a declaration of homestead on the lot for the benefit of herself and said Crowson; that she died on October 16, 1916, and said E. A. Crowson, by proceedings under section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure, procured an order of the superior court of the county on May 7, 1917, setting apart said lot to Crowson as surviving husband of said decedent, and that Crowson has since intermarried with the defendant, Katherine M. Crowson, who is now his wife. It also expressly waived all recourse by the plaintiff to any other property of the estate of Florence G. Crowson, deceased, for the payment or satisfaction of said debt.

The answer admitted, by failing to deny, the allegation that Florence had agreed to execute a mortgage on the lot to secure the price aforesaid, but alleged that a mortgage for the price was executed by her to the plaintiff, and that he afterward released it. It alleged that the conveyance of the lot to Florence G. Hinkel was a gift, and denied that any money was owing to plaintiff as the price of said lot, or at all.

The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true; that no mortgage was ever executed to plaintiff by said Florence G. Hinkel to secure the price of said lot; that no administration has ever been had upon the estate of said decedent and that none is pending, and that $4,551.07 was due to plaintiff for the principal and interest of the note given for the price of the lot. Thereupon judgment was entered for the foreclosure and sale of the lot to discharge the vendor's lien of the plaintiff thereon. From this judgment the defendant, E. A. Crowson, appeals. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone.

[1] The appellant contends that the complaint and findings are insufficient to support the judgment, because it is neither alleged nor found that any claim for the payment of the balance due on the note was presented to an administrator of the estate of the deceased, Florence G. Crowson, for allowance. Section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, if there be subsisting liens or incumbrances on the homestead of a deceased person, the claim secured thereby must be presented to the administrator, and the funds in his hands applied thereon, and that the lien shall only be enforced against the homestead for any deficiency remaining after the other funds of the estate have been applied in payment of the claim.

In Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20, the owner of the homestead died leaving the homestead incumbered by a mortgage. There was administration upon the estate, but no claim for the mortgage debt was presented for allowance. The complaint in foreclosure alleged that the plaintiff waived all recourse against any other property of the estate, as the complaint does here. The court, holding that the complaint did not state a cause of action, said:

"The purpose of the Legislature in providing, by section 1475, that if there be subsisting liens or incumbrances on the homestead, the claims secured thereby must be presented and allowed as other claims against the estate, was undoubtedly to preserve the homestead if possible."

This case was followed in Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. 375, where, after the foreclosure suit was begun and before the trial, the mortgagor died. No claim was presented to the administrator of the estate of the mortgagor within the time prescribed by the law. The plaintiff then amended his complaint by averring that he waived all recourse against any property of the estate, except that covered by the mortgage. The court found that there was not, and never had been, any property or assets of the estate that could be subjected to the payment of the mortgage, except the property mortgaged, but gave judgment for the defendants and this judgment was affirmed. This court held that the fact that there were no other assets did not change the rule that the claim must be presented to the administrator and allowed, as required by section 1475, as held in Camp v. Grider, supra. With respect to the effect of that section, the court said:

"The provision of the section is general, that claims secured by liens or incumbrances on the homestead, selected and recorded prior to the death of the decedent, must be presented and allowed as other claims against the estate. The whole matter was under the control of the Legislature, and we are not authorized to nullify the plain letter of the law because we can see no good reason for making it applicable to a case like this,"

—and that the decision in Camp v. Grider was a correct exposition of the Code on the subject and must be upheld and followed. The same rule was stated and applied in Building, etc., Ass'n v. King, 83 Cal. 442, 23 Pac. 376; Hearn v. Kennedy, 85 Cal. 57, 24 Pac. 606; Rosenberg v. Ford, 85 Cal. 612, 24 Pac. 779; Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 121, 24 Pac. 852, 21 Am. St. Rep. 26; Perkins v. Onyett, 86 Cal. 350, 24 Pac. 1024; Wise v. Williams, 88 Cal. 33, 25 Pac. 1064, and Bank v. Stephens, 144 Cal. 663, 79 Pac. 379. The case of Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 62, 18 Pac. 808, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235, is not in conflict with these cases. In that case the wife had mortgaged her separate property as security for the debt of her husband. The husband died. In the lifetime of both a homestead had been declared on the property. It was held that, with respect to the debt, she stood in the relation of a surety for her husband, but that, inasmuch as the homestead was on her separate property, and not on the community property or the separate property of the husband, no presentation of a claim for the debt against the husband's estate was necessary as a condition precedent to the right to foreclose the mortgage on her property. This must be so, since the language of section 1475 limits its application to cases where the homestead to be protected is a part of the estate of the decedent.

It is apparent from these authorities that the appellant's objection is well taken, unless some reason can be found for declaring this case to be an exception to the rule thus established.

[1] It is argued that the presentation of the claim for allowance is not necessary, when there is not, and never has been, any administrator to whom it could be presented. We have seen that the fact that there are no other assets does not avoid the statutory requirement, Bollinger v. Manning, supra. In this case the absence of other assets is not shown, either in the complaint or findings. The simple fact that no administrator has been appointed does not appear to be as potent to avoid the necessity for presenting a claim as an absence of assets. The latter is incurable, and would remove all necessity for presentation of a claim, and would demonstrate beyond doubt that no benefit could flow therefrom, to the homestead claimant, if such inquiry could be made and the fact established in the foreclosure suit. But it is always possible to have an administrator appointed. Section 1365 prescribes the order of preference of persons entitled to letters of administration, but section 1377 provides that, where those preferentially entitled to fail to apply for letters, they may be granted "to any applicant." The superior court of the county in which the decedent was a resident at the time of her death or in which she left estate has jurisdiction to appoint an administrator of such estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1294. The homestead was her property, and was a part of her estate at the time of her death. The plaintiff could therefore have obviated the difficulty by procuring letters to be granted to a competent person. In view of the imperative language of section 1475 and the construction given to it in the above cited case, we think a lien claimant cannot escape its requirements, on the ground that no person has applied for or received letters of administration upon the estate. It is his own inaction that has produced that condition, and he cannot take advantage thereof to avoid the statute.

[2] The plaintiff claims that the right of a vendor, to have the price declared a charge upon the land and the land sold to enforce payment thereof, is not technically a lien, and therefore is not within the scope of section 1475. He bases this claim upon some expressions descriptive of the right of a vendor in this respect in Porter v. Brooks, 35 Cal. 202, to the effect that it is "only an equitable right to resort to the land for payment," and holding that where the vendor has conveyed the land, his vendor's lien does not prevent him from suing out an attachment in an action for the price. He also relies on a statement in Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 484, 14 Pac. 201, that a vendor's lien "is in its nature a personal privilege, unassignable, which the vendor can assert, only in a suit brought for the purpose of having it decreed and enforced." We do not regard these decisions as decisive of the matter. No doubt it is true that the lien of a vendor is not assignable and that it can be enforced only in an action in equity. But section 1475 expressly applies to, and includes, all "subsisting liens or encumbrances on the homestead." The Civil Code declares that "one who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon" for so much of the price as remains unpaid and otherwise unsecured (section 3046), and that the homestead is subject to forced sale on liens existing at the time the declaration of homestead is filed, and "on debts secured by mechanics, contractors, subcontractors, artisans, architects, builders, laborers of every class, materialmen's or vendors' liens upon the premises" (section 1241). These provisions leave no doubt that the vendor's right to resort to the land for payment of the price thereof is a lien; that one of the objects of section 1475 was to protect the homestead from vendors' liens, as well as other liens, and that no sound distinction exists upon which to differentiate a vendor's lien from any other lien on the premises embraced on the homestead.

[3] The plaintiff also relies on decisions such as Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 24, 81 Am. Dec. 140, holding that it is not necessary to present a claim against an estate for a lien upon a specific parcel of land belonging to such estate, not the homestead, as a condition precedent to the right to foreclose such lien. These decisions go upon the principle that the lien itself is not a claim against the estate. They do not hold that the debt, which is secured by the lien is not a claim which must be presented and allowed in order to secure payment thereof out of the general assets, but merely declare that, where resort to the general assets is waived, the holder of the lien can have his action against the specific parcel upon which his lien exists, without having presented a claim for allowance. Necessarily, they have no application whatever to cases coming under section 1475, in which the lien exists against the homestead, and they do not at all impair the force of the decisions first above cited, holding that, where the lien is on the homestead, a claim for the debt secured by such lien must be presented to the administrator of the estate of the deceased owner, as a condition precedent to the right to enforce the lien against the homestead premises.

[4] It is also suggested that the proceeding under section 1723, Code of Civil Procedure, above mentioned, whereby the homestead was declared to have vested in the defendant, as surviving husband, had the effect of separating the property from the other estate of the deceased wife so that the presentation of the claim was unnecessary. The other provisions of the Code show that this could not be the effect of an order under section 1723. The Civil Code, as above shown, provides that the homestead shall be subject to liens of the various kinds there specified, among them the lien of a vendor for the purchase money. The order declaring the homestead vested in the surviving husband left it as it was, subject to these liens, and it therefore was as important to the husband to have the other assets of the estate of his deceased wife applied to discharge the vendor's lien, after such order vested title in him, as it was before.

We find no ground upon which to predicate the statement that the plaintiff's case is an exception to the established rule. The conclusion follows that the court below erred in giving plaintiff judgment of foreclosure. The judgment is reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [5] In a petition for rehearing, the respondent refers to the statement in the opinion heretofore filed, in discussing the possibility of obtaining letters of administration upon the estate of the deceased wife of the appellant, that, "the homestead was her property and was a part of her estate at the time of her death," and claims that this statement is contrary to previous decisions of this court, referring to Matter of Tracey, 136 Cal. 385, 69 Pac. 20; Estate of Shirey, 167 Cal. 193, 138 Pac. 994; Saddlemire v. Stockton, etc., Soc., 144 Cal. 653, 79 Pac. 381; Estate of Beer, 178 Cal. 57, 171 Pac. 1062; and Estate of Simonton, 183 Cal. 54, 190 Pac. 442. These cases declare that a homestead which was declared upon community property or upon separate property of the spouse making or joining in the declaration upon the death of either spouse, vests immediately in the survivor and constitutes no part of the property of the deceased spouse, although it was his or her property at the immediate time of his or her death. The decision of the Estate of Beer is to the effect that a brother of a deceased wife is not entitled to administration of his estate, in preference to the public administrator, where the only property in which he claimed an interest was a homestead declared upon separate property of the wife in the lifetime of herself and the decedent, the wife having died before the husband, it being stated that the homestead thereupon immediately vested in the surviving husband and that the relatives of the wife took no interest therein by descent. The above-quoted passage of our opinion should perhaps have been followed by a further statement in explanation, but when considered in connection with the subject then under discussion it is not contrary to the previous decisions of this court. None of those decisions hold that, where a homestead declared on separate property is subject to a vendor's lien, there can be no administration upon the estate for the purpose of disposing of such homestead and enforcing the vendor's lien thereon. It is no part of the assets of the estate for the payment of ordinary debts, and it immediately vests in the surviving spouse upon the death of the spouse in whom the title was previously vested. The question whether administration could be had because of the necessity of providing for the enforcement of the subsisting liens on the homestead, such as the vendor's liens or mechanic's liens provided for in section 1241 of the Civil Code, was not involved in any of those cases. Where administration is necessary for that purpose, it must be held that administration can be had although there are no general assets of the estate subject to the payment of ordinary debts.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Ex parte NEWELL. (Cr. 2447.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1922.)

1. Criminal law  576(3)—New information after acquittal because of variance need not be filed within 30 days of commitment.

Pen. Code, § 1382, requiring the dismissal of the prosecution if no information is filed within 30 days after accused has been held to answer by the committing magistrate, does not apply where an information had been filed within the time fixed and accused placed on trial thereon but acquitted on the ground of variance, and the court had directed that he be detained in custody until a new information was filed, as authorized by Pen. Code, § 1165.

2. Indictment and information  41(6)—Preliminary hearing unnecessary to sustain new information directed by court after acquittal because of variance.

Under Pen. Code, § 1165, authorizing the court to order defendant detained in custody after acquittal because of variance, to the end that a new information may be filed as authorized by section 1117, and under section 998, prescribing procedure under such new information, a new preliminary examination is not necessary to authorize the new information when directed by the court, though, if the court fails to refuse to order the new information, the district attorney can proceed to have defendant examined before a magistrate, and may, upon his commitment, file a new information in the same manner as if no charge had previously been preferred against him.

3. Habeas corpus  3—Erroneous acquittal because of variance does not deprive court of jurisdiction to order new information so as to warrant discharge.

Even if the court was in error in directing an acquittal of accused because of variance, that error did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to order accused to be detained pending the filing of a new information against him, so as to entitle him to discharge for such detention on writ of habeas corpus, as he can avail himself of the error by pleading the first acquittal as a bar to a prosecution under the new information.

In Bank.

Application by Hugh H. Newell for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of Alameda County to secure release of petitioner from custody, on the ground that his detention is illegal. Writ denied.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, and Chas. H. Seecombe and Dutton, Seecombe & McDonough, all of Oakland, for petitioner.

SHAW, C. J. The petitioner, Hugh H. Newell, was tried upon an information charging him with cashing a check drawn upon a bank in which he had no funds, and he was acquitted on the ground of variance. Thereupon the court directed the district attorney to file a new information so as to avoid the variance discovered upon the trial. In accordance with this order a new information was filed, and the petitioner was detained in custody to await trial upon the new information. He applies for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that his detention to answer the new information is illegal.

[1] The principal point relied on is that, because of the fact that the new information was filed more than 30 days after the defendant had been held to answer by the committing magistrate, the court has no power to do otherwise than dismiss the prosecution as provided in section 1382 of the Penal Code. That section does not apply to the case. It provides that, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, the court must dismiss a prosecution where the defendant has been held to answer and no information is filed within 30 days thereafter. It does not provide for a case where an information has been filed within the 30 days and a trial has been had thereon, and a new information is directed by the court because of an acquittal upon the trial of the original information on the ground of variance. In such a case a new information is authorized by section 1165, and it is manifest that the provision of section 1382 applies only to the information first filed, where the filing is delayed more than 30 days after the commitment to answer.

[2] Section 1165 provides that, where an acquittal occurs because of a variance between the pleading and proof, the court may order the defendant to be detained in custody "to the end that a new indictment or information may be preferred, in the same manner and with like effect as provided in section 1117." Section 1117 provides that, when the trial of a cause is discontinued and a jury discharged because the facts alleged did not constitute an offense, and the court, nevertheless, believes from the evidence adduced or for other good reasons that a new charge can be framed which will constitute an offense, the court "may direct the district attorney to file a new information * * * and the same proceedings must be had thereon as are prescribed in section 998; provided, that after such order or submission the defendant may be examined before a magistrate, and discharged or committed by him as in other cases." Section 998 provides that, where a new information is ordered, the defendant shall remain in custody, or on bail, to answer the same, but that if it is not filed before the next grand jury of the county is discharged, the defendant must be discharged from custody or his bail exonerated.

It is clear from these provisions that a new preliminary examination is not necessary to authorize a new information curing the variance to be filed when it is ordered in pursuance of section 1165. Doubtless, under section 1117, to which reference is made in section 1165, if the court fails or refuses to order the district attorney to file a new information, that officer may, nevertheless, under section 1117, proceed to have the defendant again charged before a magistrate with the proper offense disclosed by the evidence, and may, upon his commitment, file a new information in the same manner as if no charge had previously been preferred against him, but this does not mean that such re-examination must be had in all cases. If the court orders a new information, there is no necessity for another preliminary examination or commitment. The hearing already had in court upon the original information furnishes all the foundation that is necessary to authorize the filing of the new information as ordered by the court.

[3] We are not to be understood as holding or conceding that the validity of the new information, so ordered to be filed, could be attacked on habeas corpus in any event. It would seem that the superior court, having jurisdiction of the cause regularly brought before it, would have jurisdiction to direct an amendment of the information, and that its action in doing so would be an exercise of its jurisdiction, erroneous but not void, and reviewable only on appeal. But upon this we need express no opinion. So, also, the claim that the court, in directing the new information to be filed, erred in its holding that there was a variance rendering the new information void, is without merit. That ruling would be a ruling in the exercise of its jurisdiction and advantage could be taken thereof only by presenting the former acquittal as a former adjudication in defense of the new information. It cannot be made the ground for issuing a writ of habeas corpus.

There being no merit in the petition in any view of the case, it is ordered that the writ be denied and that petitioner be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Alameda county, to be held for trial on said new information.

PEOPLE v. MANRIQUEZ. (Cr. 2409.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 4, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ☞1081; 1070½, New, vol. 11 Key-No. Series—Appeal from judgment not taken in open court or by notice within two days must be dismissed.

Where the appeal from a judgment entered upon a plea of guilty was not taken by defendant in open court, in the manner prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1239, at the time the judgment was rendered, or by filing a written notice of appeal within two days thereafter, the appeal must be dismissed.

2. Criminal law ☞273—Plea of guilty must be made by accused and be explicit.

Under Pen. Code, § 1018, providing that a plea of guilty can be put in by defendant himself only in open court, the plea must be entered by defendant personally and the confession of guilt should be explicitly made, and the form is sufficiently vital, if the admission of guilt is clear and unconditional.

3. Criminal law ☞273—Express admission of guilt by defendant personally held sufficient plea.

Where the attorney for accused stated the plea was guilty, before accused could reply through the interpreter, but accused himself thereafter stated he had been guilty all the time, the statement of accused was sufficiently explicit to be a plea of guilty.

4. Criminal law ☞274—Plea of guilty cannot be withdrawn because entered with unfounded hope of leniency.

A plea of guilty entered by defendant with knowledge of his rights and the consequences of his plea, cannot be withdrawn merely because he was led by his counsel or others to hope or believe that he would receive a milder punishment than if he stood trial, which hope proved unfounded.

5. Criminal law ☞977(3)—Requirement sentence shall not be imposed before two days after plea of guilty may be waived.

The provision of Pen. Code, § 1191, that judgment shall not be entered less than two days after the entry of the plea of guilty, creates a right for the benefit of accused which he can waive and which is waived where his counsel expressly consented to sentence on the day following the entry of the plea.

6. Homicide ☞18(5)—Unintended killing in commission of robbery is "first degree murder."

A homicide, committed in the perpetration of a robbery, was murder in the first degree, under Pen. Code, § 189, notwithstanding defendant's claim that the pistol went off when his victim grabbed at it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Murder in First Degree.]

7. Criminal law ☞980(1)—Trial judge has in his discretion power to impose death penalty on plea of guilty to first degree murder.

Where the trial judge had decided, as required by Pen. Code, § 1192, that, upon the evidence introduced, the defendant, who had pleaded guilty, was guilty of murder in the first degree, it was within his discretion to impose the death penalty.

8. Criminal law ☞1149—Leave to withdraw plea of guilty rests in trial court's discretion.

The denial or granting of permission to withdraw a plea of guilty and to substitute a plea of not guilty rests within the sound discretion of the trial court, and its action thereon must be upheld unless an abuse of such discretion clearly appears.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Miguel Manriquez was adjudged, after plea of guilty, to be guilty of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion to set aside the judgment and to permit him to withdraw his plea of guilty. Appeal from the judgment dismissed, and order affirmed.

Harry B. Ellison, of El Centro, and M. A. Thomas, of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. R. Simon, of El Centro, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, J. [1] The defendant was charged with the crime of murder. After the entry of a plea of "guilty" the court determined the degree of the crime as murder in the first degree, and, on July 22, 1921, imposed the death penalty. Thereafter the defendant interposed a motion to set aside the judgment and for leave to withdraw the plea of guilty and to substitute a plea of not guilty instead. The motion was denied on September 28, 1921. There appears, in the clerk's transcript of the proceedings in the court below, what purports to be a notice of appeal to this court from the judgment of conviction, "and from an order made on the 28th day of September, 1921, after judgment affecting the substantial rights of the defendant." It does not appear that any appeal from the judgment was taken by the defendant in open court, in the manner prescribed by section 1239 of the Penal Code, at the time the judgment was rendered, or by filing a written notice of appeal within two days thereafter. Consequently the appeal from the judgment must be, and is, dismissed.

Several contentions are advanced in support of the appeal from the order denying the motion to set aside the judgment and to permit the withdrawal and substitution of the plea. The motion was made upon the ground, in substance, first, that no plea of guilty was put in by the defendant himself in open court, as required by section 1018 of the Penal Code, and that the entry of any such purported plea was without his express consent. Passing over the provision of the statute which requires that application for permission to withdraw a plea of guilty, and to substitute a plea of not guilty, must be made before judgment (Pen. Code, sec. 1018), a point not raised by the Attorney General, we are convinced that there is no merit in appellant's position.

From the record of the proceedings on arraignment, and no attempt is made to impeach the verity of the reporter's transcript, it appears that the appellant is a Mexican who does not speak or understand the English language. When he came into court for arraignment, an interpreter was duly appointed and sworn to interpret the proceedings. By direction of the court, the information was then translated to the appellant by the interpreter, a copy of the information was handed to the defendant at the time, and the court informed him of his right to be represented by counsel before being arraigned. Upon appellant stating that he had none, and no money with which to pay one, the court appointed a member of the local bar to represent the defendant, and continued the arraignment until the following morning. When the case was called the next day, the attorney appointed by the court appeared with appellant. At his request the information was read by the district attorney and then translated to the defendant by the interpreter. The court thereupon arraigned the defendant, but, at the request of his counsel, continued the matter another day to take the plea. At that time the following proceedings were had:

"The Court: Are you ready for plea?

Mr. Ellison (defendant's counsel): Yes, sir.

The Court: Is the interpreter in court? Translate the proceedings to the defendant, please, Mr. Interpreter. Miguel Manriquez, you have been heretofore arraigned upon this information, charged with the crime of murder; to this information what is your plea?

Mr. Ellison: The plea is guilty to the charge of murder.

The Defendant: I have been guilty all the time.

Mr. Ellison: The plea of guilty may be entered.

The Court: My recollection is I have to take evidence to determine the degree.

Mr. Simon (the district attorney): I think that is true. If the court please, I assume the burden will be on us to show the degree.

Mr. Ellison: I am willing it should be shown by the defendant himself."

[2, 3] The court thereupon proceeded to take the testimony of several witnesses, including the defendant, who took the stand at his counsel's suggestion, and determined the crime committed to be murder in the first degree. Section 1018 of the Penal Code provides that a plea of guilty can be put in by the defendant himself only in open court, and the point now made on behalf of the appellant is that he "himself" offered no plea when arraigned. He relies upon the statement in People v. Thompson, 4 Cal. 238, to the effect that a defendant must plead guilty in person, and his attorney is not allowed by the law to admit away his life or liberty. It is true, as was said in People v. McCrory, 41 Cal. 458, 461, that a plea of a defendant confessing himself guilty of crime should not be entered except with the express consent of the defendant, given by him personally in direct terms in open court, and his confession of guilt should be explicitly made. We are satisfied that there was a positive and literal compliance with such requirement in this case. The foregoing extract from the record and the transcript of the proceedings on the motion to set aside clearly and most conclusively confirm that view. The mere fact that the attorney for the defendant announced to the court what the plea would be, before the defendant was able to answer through the interpreter, and consented to the entry of the plea after it was made, is an unimportant matter in view of the independent action of the defendant himself. There is no merit in the contention that the answer of the appellant cannot be held to constitute a plea except by implication. The statement was a direct and explicit confession of guilt and was properly received by the court and entered as the plea in the case. The form of the plea is not of vital importance, provided the admission of guilt is clear, definite, and unconditional. 16 C. J. 401.

[4] Another ground upon which the appellant based his motion for vacation of the judgment was that his plea of guilty was entered without due deliberation, and with the hope and expectation that the punishment to which he might be exposed would be mitigated. Even if such were the case, the fact that a defendant, knowing his rights and the consequences of his act, hoped or believed, or was led by his counsel, or others, to hope or believe that he would receive a milder punishment by pleading guilty than that which would fall to his lot after trial and conviction by a jury, presents no ground for the exercise of the discretion necessary to permit a plea of guilt to be withdrawn. People v. Dabner, 153 Cal. 398, 403, 95 Pac. 880; People v. Miller, 114 Cal. 10, 16, 45 Pac. 986; People v. Lennox, 67 Cal. 113, 115, 7 Pac. 260.

[5] Appellant's last contention in support of his motion to vacate the judgment is that the court violated the provisions of section 1191 of the Penal Code in that it pronounced judgment upon him the day following the entry of his plea. The section provides that, after a plea of guilty, the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment, which must be not less than two nor more than five days after the entry of the plea. A sufficient answer to the contention is that the appellant through his counsel, at the time he made his plea, expressly waived time and, with the consent of the court and district attorney, requested the court to impose the sentence on the day following. It has long been settled that one may waive a right created by statute for his benefit, and that the rule applies to the time for pronouncing the judgment of the court in criminal cases. People v. Robinson, 46 Cal. 94, 96; People v. Mess, 65 Cal. 174, 3 Pac. 670; People v. Johnson, 88 Cal. 171, 174, 25 Pac. 1116.

[6] Although the appeal from the judgment has of necessity been dismissed, we have carefully read the entire record of the evidence submitted to the trial court, to enable it to determine the degree of the crime, before passing sentence. The homicide resulted from the attempt of the appellant and two others to rob a store at El Centro, kept by a Chinese. The three men went together to the store for the purpose of committing the robbery. According to the appellant, who took the stand at the instance of his own counsel, one of his accomplices directed Quon Sue, one of the Chinese, to hold up his hands and told the appellant "to hold him there." He "put his gun on him" and—

"as soon as I did it he tried to grab it. * * * When the Chinaman grabbed at me, the pistol went off, and he went down, and I ran out, and I don't know what the others did."

[7] There was other testimony that Quon Sue was killed instantly, and the evidence of the autopsy surgeons tended very strongly to indicate that the killing was not in the manner described by the appellant. Be that as it may, the homicide was committed in an attempt to perpetrate robbery, and was murder in the first degree. Pen. Code, sec. 189. The evidence was of such a nature as to support no other conclusion. Having determined this matter, as was its duty to do upon the entry of the plea of guilty (Pen. Code, sec. 1192), nothing further remained for the trial court but to pronounce judgment. That it approached the performance of this difficult task with due regard for the serious consequences which might attend the appellant is evidenced by the careful manner in which it considered and determined the degree of the crime committed. That it saw fit to impose the extreme penalty fixed by the law is a matter resting within the exercise of the judicial discretion with which the trial court is vested by the supreme power of the state.

[8] The granting or denying of permission to withdraw a plea of guilty, and to substitute a plea of not guilty, is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, and its action must be upheld unless an abuse of such discretion clearly appears. There are no such peculiar or unusual circumstances in this case as to enable us to say the trial court should have acted differently in the matter. People v. Bostic, 167 Cal. 754, 760, 141 Pac. 380; People v. Dabner, supra.

No legal questions are presented by the appeal which call for the intervention of this court. It follows therefore that the order appealed from must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

IN RE SCRIMGER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9676.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 14, 1922, as Modified March 27, 1922.)

1. Charities ☞33—Devise to orphan asylum given to corporation conducting asylum as successor of former corporation.

Where a will provided that, at the termination of a life estate, interests in the property should be given to a Roman Catholic orphan asylum and others (corporations, societies, and institutions in San Francisco), and it appeared that the corporation conducting such asylum at the date of the will had been dissolved by expiration of its charter, and that a new corporation had taken over the management of the same asylum, the new corporation is entitled to the benefit of the gift, since the children in the institution were the real beneficiaries, and the appropriate custodian of the fund at the termination of the life estate was the corporation then operating the institution.

2. Executors and administrators ☞315(5)—Decree of distribution is conclusive as to meaning of will.

A decree of distribution is a conclusive determination of the meaning and effect of the will, and the will itself cannot be looked to for the purpose of interpreting the decree except in so far as it is referred to and made a part thereof.

3. Charities ☞20(2) — Corporations ☞1—Equity disregards corporate form to promote justice.

Courts of equity look behind the corporate form to the persons behind that form, where necessary to promote justice, and can regard a new corporation, formed to conduct an orphan asylum after the expiration of the term of the former corporation, as the revival and reorganization of the former to enable the new corporation to receive a gift made to the former one.

4. Charities ☞37—New corporation to conduct orphanage held entitled to fund under cy pres doctrine.

Where a will gave a portion of the trust fund at the termination of the trust to a corporation conducting an orphanage at the time the will was executed, the fund can be given, under the doctrine of cy pres applied to charities, to a corporation formed to conduct the orphanage after the expiration of the charter of the corporation in existence when the will was made.

5. Wills ☞681(2) — Beneficial interest not definitely given does not revert to heirs but remains in the trustees.

Where an estate was vested in trustees the title remains in them even though the beneficiaries cannot be ascertained, so that the interest of a beneficiary not ascertainable cannot, in any event, pass to the heirs of testator but must be held by the trustees.

6. Trusts ☞331—Matters settled on first accounting of trustees cannot thereafter be questioned.

Payments by the trustees out of the corpus of the estate which were approved on a first settlement of the trustees' account cannot be questioned on settlement of their final account.

7. Trusts ☞315(1)—Trustees can charge for care pending determination of disposition after termination of trust.

Where the trustees retained possession of the trust funds, and cared for them for several years after the termination of the trust, because litigation was pending by an heir to have the gifts of the trust fund to charities declared void, the trustees are entitled to charge for the care of the property during such period.

8. Appeal and error ☞757(3)—Objection to allowance to trustees can be disregarded where testimony is not printed in appellants' brief.

An objection to an allowance to trustees of expenses incurred by them in the care of the estate after the termination of the trust can be disregarded on appeal where the appellants did not print the evidence in their brief, the appeal being upon a typewritten transcript, nor point out in detail the items of the account to which they objected.

9. Executors and administrators ☞315(6)—Decree is not void though error appears on its face.

A decree of distribution is not subject to attack on final settlement of the trustees' accounts because error in sustaining charitable devises by will, executed within 30 days of testator's death, appears on the face of the decree, since the court had jurisdiction to render such decree even though it was erroneous, and the only remedy would be by appeal.

10. Executors and administrators ☞315(6)—Decree ordering distribution to charity in accordance with void bequest not necessarily erroneous.

The mere fact that a decree distributed property in accordance with charitable bequests, which were void because the will was executed within 30 days of testator's death, does not establish that the decree was erroneous, since it might have been consented to by the persons who otherwise would have been entitled to receive the fund.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles Louis Scrimger, deceased. From an order settling the final account of trustees and directing distribution of the funds in their hands, the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco and others appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

W. H. Burrows, of San Francisco, for appellant Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum.

Charles W. Slack and E. T. Zook, both of San Francisco, for appellant San Francisco Protestant Orphan Asylum Society.

Aaron Sapiro and Milton D. Sapiro, both of San Francisco, for appellant Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum and Home Society of San Francisco.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley and Ben F. Woolner, all of Oakland, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal by the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco, Protestant Orphan Asylum, and the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum from the order of the superior court settling the final account of the trustees under the final decree of distribution in the estate, and directing the distribution of that portion of the trust estate held by said trustees in trust for the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum to a sister of the deceased, Kate McGavin.

On the 15th of January, 1911, a decree of distribution was entered in the above-entitled matter whereby the residue of the estate, after the payment of specific legacies, was distributed to J. C. Fitzsimmons and Joseph E. Barry as trustees upon the trust provided in the will and set forth in the decree, to hold the same until said trust shall terminate by reason of the death of the mother or sister of the deceased. The decree of distribution recites the provisions of the will as follows:

"Sixth. After the payment of all specified bequests * * * I give, devise, and bequeath to J. C. Fitzsimmons of Oakland * * * and Joseph E. Barry of said city and county of San Francisco * * * as trustees, all my property and estate * * * in trust for the following uses and purposes. * * *

"Upon the death of my said mother or my said sister said trust and the powers and duties of my said trustees shall ipso facto cease and determine, and in the event that my said mother die before my said sister, an undivided two-thirds of all of my said property shall go to my said sister, free and clear of any trust and for her own and absolute use forever, and the remaining undivided one-third of my said property shall go as follows, to wit: Protestant Orphan Asylum, Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, and San Francisco Society for Protection of Children (corporations, societies, or institutions located in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California), to be divided equally among said charitable institutions share and share alike, all of my said property being subject, however, to the payment therefrom of the funeral expenses and the expenses of the last illness of my said mother, and, in the event that my said sister die before my said mother, an undivided two-thirds of all of my said property shall go to my said mother, free and clear of any trust and for her own and absolute use forever, and the remaining undivided one-third of my said property shall go as follows, to wit: To the Protestant Orphan Asylum, Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, and San Francisco Society for Protection of Children (corporations, societies, or institutions located in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California), to be divided equally among said charitable institutions, share and share alike."

The decree then provided:

"That upon the death of said Nancy C. Scrimger, the said mother of said deceased, before the death of Kate McGavin, the said sister of said deceased, the said Kate McGavin, sister of said deceased, will be entitled to an undivided two-thirds of all of said trust property, free and clear of any trust, and for her own and absolute use thereafter; and at the same time the charitable institutions mentioned in said will, and as hereinbefore set forth, Protestant Orphan Asylum, Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, and San Francisco Society for Protection of Children, will be entitled to the remaining undivided one-third of the said property and trust fund, free and clear of any trust, in equal shares, share and share alike;

"That in the event Kate McGavin, the said sister of said Charles Louis Scrimger, deceased, die before the said mother of said deceased, Nancy C. Scrimger, the said mother of said deceased will then be entitled to an undivided two-thirds ($\frac{2}{3}$) of all of the said property of said deceased, free and clear of any trust, and for her own and absolute use forever, and at the same time the charitable institutions named in said will namely, Protestant Orphan Asylum, Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, and San Francisco Society for Protection of Children, will then be entitled to the remaining undivided one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) of the property of said deceased, in equal shares, share and share alike."

The mother of the deceased died November 19, 1912, and the trust then terminated. The decree settling the account of the trustees awarded the portions of the trust property held in trust for the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum and for the San Francisco Society for Protection of Children to the sister, Kate McGavin. The appellants contend that this portion of the decree, so far as it relates to the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, is erroneous, but no complaint is made with reference to that portion of the decree by which the property held in trust for the San Francisco Society for Protection of Children, under the decree of distribution, is now "distributed" to the sister of the deceased. Appellants also complain that the trustees have delayed distribution for more than seven years after the trust terminated, and that certain charges of expense awarded the trustees for that reason should not have been allowed, and that other expenses should have been paid from the income instead of from the principal of the trust. The basis upon which the court awarded that portion of the trust property the deceased left for the benefit of the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum to the sister of the deceased instead of to the asylum is shown in the following finding of the trial court:

"The court further finds that the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum named in the will of said deceased, and the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum named in the decree of distribution, was a corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of California on the 12th day of August, 1858, and whose charter expired by limitation on the 12th day of August, 1908, prior to the date of the will of said decedent; that from on or about the 12th day of August, 1858, until the 12th day of August, 1908, on which said date it ceased to exist as a corporation as aforesaid, but not thereafter, said Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum was organized, existing and transacting its business and conducting a charitable institution for the care of orphans in the city and county of San Francisco; that on the 24th day of March, 1910, there was incorporated under the laws of the state of California a corporation by the name of Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco, which said corporation is the corporation which has appeared in this proceeding and filed objections to the above mentioned account; that said Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco thereupon commenced to transact business in the city and county of San Francisco and to carry on and conduct the asylum for the care of orphans that had been previously conducted by said Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum that had forfeited its charter on the 12th day of August, 1908, as aforesaid; that said orphan asylum was conducted continuously and that the people who had controlled the corporation that forfeited its charter on the 12th day of August, 1908, as aforesaid, continued to operate said asylum until the 24th day of March, 1910, at which date said same persons incorporated said Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco, which said last-named corporation has continued to operate said asylum as aforesaid; that the said Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum named in said will was the same Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum as was named in said decree of distribution and that said Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum named in said will and in said decree of distribution has at no time since the 12th day of August, 1908, existed either as a corporation, or society, or institution, or otherwise; that said Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco incorporated March 24th, 1910, as aforesaid, and which is the only Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum that has appeared in any proceeding in connection with the said estate, or the said trust, was not named in said will or in said decree of distribution, and has no right, title, or interest in or to any portion of the said trust estate, either by reason of said will of said deceased, or said decree of distribution, or otherwise."

[1] The deceased died March 6, 1909. The decree of distribution was rendered January 5, 1911, and entered March 22, 1911. At that time the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum in San Francisco was being operated by the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco, a corporation. The decree should be construed as a distribution in trust for the new corporation then in existence, for it is clear that the real beneficiaries of the trust are the children in the institution and the appropriate custodian of the trust fund, upon the death of the mother of decedent, the corporation operating the institution. (See discussion in Estate of Winchester, 133 Cal. 271, 65 Pac. 475, 54 L. R. A. 281; Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 59 Pac. 315.)

The decree of distribution to the trustees declared that they were to hold the same upon a trust which terminated upon the death of the mother, whereupon one-third of the property should "belong to and vest in the following corporations, societies, or institutions located in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, namely, Protestant Orphan Asylum, Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, and San Francisco Society for Protection of Children, to be divided equally among such charitable institutions, share and share alike." Thus, by the terms of the decree the trustees were to turn over to a corporation, society, or institution known as the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, one-twelfth of the property in their hands. There was at the time of the decree of distribution in the city and county of San Francisco no other institution of that or similar name. It was, therefore, appropriate that the order settling the final account of the trustees should have directed the transfer from the trustees, Fitzsimmons and Barry, to the corporation in charge of the orphan asylum of that portion of the trust funds devoted to the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum.

[2] In this connection it should be borne in mind that the decree of distribution is a conclusive determination of the meaning and effect of the will and that the will itself cannot be looked to for the purpose of interpreting the decree except in so far as it is referred to and made a part thereof. The rule in that regard is thus stated in Wills v. Wills, 166 Cal. 529, 531, 137 Pac. 249, 251.

"These decrees stand unassailed, and they are conclusive determinations against the existence of any trust in favor of plaintiff under the will of his father. (William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, [48 Pac. 323]; Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, [63 Am. St. Rep. 145, 51 Pac. 681]; Estate of Trescony, 119 Cal. 568, [57 Pac. 951]; Williams v. Marx, 124 Cal. 22, [56 Pac. 603]; More v. More, 133 Cal. 494, [65 Pac. 1044, 66 Pac. 761]; Martino-vich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 354, [70 Pac. 459]; Keating v. Smith, 154 Cal. 186, [97 Pac. 300].) It will not do to argue, as is here done, that because the property must have been distributed to the widow in any and in all events, resort may be had to the will, from which it will be discovered that it was distributed to her as trustee under a trust. Only where by apt language the will is incorporated into the decree, as in Goldtree v. Thompson, 79 Cal. 613, [22 Pac. 50], may this be done. (Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, [63 Am. St. Rep. 145, 51 Pac. 681].) In all other cases the decree speaks for itself alone, without the aid of the evidence upon which it was based, and the will itself is only such evidence. 'The decree supersedes the will and prevails over any provision therein which may be thought inconsistent with the decree.' (Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, [63 Am. St. Rep. 145, 51 Pac. 681].) 'Where a trust has been created by will the validity of the trust is necessarily involved in the question of distribution, for if invalid the bequest fails. (Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 660, [49 Am. St. Rep. 971, 41 Pac. 772].) Hence, as necessary to distribution, it is within the province of the probate court to define the rights of all who have legally or equitably any interest in the property of the estate derived from the will.' (More v. More, 133 Cal. 494, [65 Pac. 1044, 66 Pac. 761].) 'The decree was necessarily a judicial construction of the will and of the several interests of the distributees, and cannot be assailed collaterally. There is no doubt or uncertainty in the decree itself as to plaintiff's title, and to that alone we are permitted to look.' (Williams v. Marx, 124 Cal. 22, [56 Pac. 603].)"

So far as the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum is concerned the matter resolves itself into this simple proposition: The trustees hold certain properties in trust for the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, indifferently described in the decree of distribution as a corporation, society, or institution. This is a charitable institution, described as such in the decree, which refers to the beneficiaries as "such charitable institutions." It is a matter of entire indifference whether the corporation in charge of the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum is the identical corporation in charge at the time of making the will or the death of the deceased. There is no uncertainty as to the ultimate beneficiary of the trust. The question of whether or not there is or was a corporation entitled to take is wholly immaterial, where the decedent left the property to trustees who took the title thereto and were charged in law with the duty of administering the trust.

[3] Two other considerations leading to the same conclusion may be referred to. Courts of equity look behind the corporate form to the persons behind that form where necessary for the purpose of doing justice. In a recent case we said:

"But it is well established in this state that under circumstances such as these where a corporation reorganizes under a new name but with practically the same stockholders and directors and continues to carry on the same business, a court of equity will regard the new corporation as a continuation of the former corporation, and will hold it liable for the debts of the former corporation. (Blanc v. Paymaster Mining Co., 95 Cal. 524, [29 Am. St. Rep. 149, 30 Pac. 765]; Higgins v. California Petroleum Co., 122 Cal. 373, [55 Pac. 155]; 147 Cal. 363, [81 Pac. 1070]; Strahm v. Fraser, 32 Cal. App. 447, [163 Pac. 680].)" Stanford Hotel Co. v. M. Schwind Co., 180 Cal. 348, 354, 181 Pac. 780, 783.

It would seem to follow inevitably in this case that we should be able to see the same orphan asylum with its officers and orphans behind the new corporate name, which is but a convenience for the conduct of the institution. (See Estate of Winchester, supra, and Estate of Upham, supra.) The new corporation was, in effect, a revival and reorganization of the defunct corporation by the former managers, and for the beneficiaries of the old corporation.

[4] The other rule leading to the same conclusion is the equitable doctrine of cy pres applied to charities. Here the respondents have the legal title to the estate under the decree and in trust for the "Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum." The doctrine of cy pres points to the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco as the proper object of such trust. The rule is thus stated in Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457, 504:

"* * * Our conclusion upon this branch of the case, is, that courts of equity in this state have jurisdiction, derived from the English common law, independent of the statute of Elizabeth, to establish and enforce charities, when trustees competent to take the legal estate are named, and the class to be benefited, and the individuals to be designated by the trustees, are capable of ascertainment. * * *"

[5] There is, in any event, no basis whatever for the order directing the trustees to turn the property over to Kate McGavin. We are not dealing with a legacy lapsed for uncertainty which the heir at law may take, but with an estate vested in the trustees, and the only question is whether the beneficiaries can be ascertained by the probate court or a court of equity. If not, the title remains in the trustees.

[6] A large portion of the appellants' opening brief is devoted to a discussion of certain general objections to the settlement of the account of the trustees. These objections are taken in general terms and the specific items of the account objected to in the main are not pointed out. It is objected that the trustees violated the terms of the trust in that they paid certain expenses out of the corpus of the estate instead of out of the income before the death of the mother. These matters were settled in the first account of the trustees and cannot now be questioned. It is claimed that the trustees had no right to use the trust property to pay assessments upon stock in certain corporations which had been distributed to them as a part of the trust estate. In response to this very general objection the respondents call attention to the fact that most of these payments were made with the knowledge and consent of all the beneficiaries of the trust, including the appellants. The stock in one of the corporations finally became worthless by reason of the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the property of the corporation.

[7] The appellants also object to the allowance made to the trustees for expenses and for fees during the administration of the trust estate from the time of the death of the mother until the date of the account. The objection is that the trustees should have turned the property over upon the termination of the trust in 1912, and that the continued possession of the trust estate by the trustees was wrongful, and that they should not only be deprived of the compensation but should pay interest upon the trust as a penalty for such wrong holding. It is particularly pointed out that the trustees have favored the sister, Kate McGavin, in the litigation which she has instituted to secure for herself the entire trust estate.

[8] In view of the fact that the appellants neither printed the evidence in their brief, the appeal being based upon a typewritten transcript, nor have pointed out in detail the items of the account to which they object, we would be justified in declining to consider these propositions. It appears, however, that the reason for the delay in the distribution of this estate has been that the respondent Kate McGavin, upon the death of her mother, claimed that the original decree of distribution was procured by mistake, by reason of the fact that the will having been made within 30 days of the death of the deceased, Charles Louis Scrimger, was void as to charitable bequests under the provisions of section 1313, Civil Code, and this was overlooked in preparing the decree. She instituted an action to have the decree vacated and was successful in the lower court, but the judgment was reversed upon appeal. McGavin v. San Francisco P. O. A. Soc., 34 Cal. App. 168, 167 Pac. 182. Upon the return of the remittitur to the lower court the respondent herein requested the trial court to adjudicate the rights of the beneficiaries of the trust in that equitable action, but the court refused to do so and dismissed the case, leaving the matter to be determined upon the settlement of the final account of the trustees. The trustees thereafter rendered an account and requested that the trust estate be distributed. The respondent Kate McGavin then contended, and still contends, that she is entitled to the entire estate. The trial court found that the trustees at all times acted in good faith; that the appellants were estopped to object to the payment of assessments upon the corporate stock held by them as trustees, so that the general claim of appellants with reference to the account narrows itself down to this proposition, namely, that trustees as a matter of law are not entitled to any expenses paid after the termination of the trust even though they may hold the property for a long period awaiting proper settlement of the final accounts and the decree of distribution by the probate court. It is sufficient to say that this position cannot be maintained. It was the duty of trustees to care for the trust estate, even after the trust terminated, where there was a dispute as to the rights of the beneficiaries, until the matter was settled by the court having jurisdiction over the settlement of their final account. We see no reason for overturning the conclusion of the trial court that the trustees were entitled to the allowance as made to them. The appellants in their reply brief have offered to print such portions of the record as we may consider necessary to the proper determination of the appeal. After an examination of the typewritten record as well as the brief, we feel satisfied that the order settling the account should be affirmed, and that no substantial benefit would be derived by the appellants by a further printing of the record, and, no doubt, that was the opinion of the appellants when they printed their brief.

[9] The respondents claim that in view of the fact that under the law the provisions of the will of the deceased in favor of the appellants were void because the will was executed within 30 days of the death of decedent, and because it is stated by the appellants in their brief that the deceased did, in fact, die within 30 days from the date of the will, that these admitted facts render the decree invalid, and that the judgment should be affirmed for the reason that the effect of such admission is the same as though the decree of distribution itself had recited the fact of the death of the testator within 30 days after the will was executed. This point is not well taken. The court had jurisdiction to make an erroneous decree of distribution, and, even though the facts showing such error appeared upon the face of the decree, it would not be void as to such provisions. The remedy would be by appeal.

[10] Moreover, the mere fact that the decreed of distribution was made in accordance with the terms of the will, notwithstanding the fact that the will was invalid as to the charitable bequests, would not necessarily show that the decree was erroneous. It might have been consented to by the persons who would otherwise be entitled to receive the trust estate and for that reason be valid.

The trial court is directed to enter a decree reducing the award to Kate McGavin from five-sixths to three-fourths of the estate, and to award one-twelfth to the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco, one-twelfth to the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, and one-twelfth to the Protestant Orphan Asylum.

SHEEHAN v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 9938.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1922.
Rehearing Denied April 27, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨882(20)—On appeal by defendants from order refusing to quash writ of mandate, petitioner cannot urge that issuance of writ was unnecessary.

Where, upon the going down of remittiturs from the Supreme Court in an appeal, a petitioner applied ex parte to the court in which the proceedings were initiated for an order directing issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate requiring defendants to issue a warrant for the payment of the sums found to be due petitioner on the appeal and the writ issued, and defendants appealed from the order refusing to quash the writ, petitioner's motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the issuance of the writ was unnecessary and hence not harmful to respondents, cannot be urged.

2. Appeal and error ⇨801(4)—Where ground of dismissal could be determined on hearing on the merits, motion for dismissal will be denied.

Upon the going down of remittiturs from the Supreme Court in an appeal, petitioner applied ex parte to the court for an order directing issuance of a writ of mandate requiring defendants to issue a warrant for the payment of the sums found to be due petitioner on the appeal and the writ issued, and defendants moved to set aside the order and quash the writ on appeal from the order refusing to quash the writ, where the question of the rights of the clerk to include interest was within the scope of the appeal upon its merits, petitioner's motion to dismiss should be denied.

3. Interest $\S$ 22(1)—Adjudication of right to writ of mandamus held not to have the effect of judgment in civil action, so as to authorize interest on claim.

In a proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1085, to compel the board of police commissioners to issue a warrant for a claim to a retired police officer, as provided in San Francisco charter, art. 8, c. 10, the fact that the petitioner was bound to allege and prove that he was entitled to the pension due him for the payment of which a warrant should issue, did not give the proceeding the nature of a civil action, so as to render the judgment the same as one procured in civil action so as to entitle petitioner to interest as provided by Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 1915, 1920.

4. Mandamus $\S$ 176—Board of police relief and pension fund commissioners of San Francisco not liable for money judgment in mandamus proceeding.

The board of police commissioners of San Francisco, whether acting as such or ex officio as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, is a mere agency of the municipality for dispensing certain funds in the custody of its treasurer and has no separate existence and is incapable of either suing or being sued, except as it may be required, as an official body, by mandamus to perform its official duties, and where mandamus proceedings are brought against the board to compel the issuance of a writ for an unpaid pension, the procurement of a money judgment either against the board or the municipality was not within the scope and purpose of the proceeding.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Mandamus by James F. Sheehan against the Board of Police Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco and others. From an order denying motion to set aside order directing writ of mandate to issue and directing payment of judgment with interest and costs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

George Lull, City Atty., and Charles S. Peery, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles J. Heggerty and Knight & Heggerty, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The proceedings out of which the present appeal arose had their inception in two certain special proceedings, instituted by the respondent herein in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the board of police commissioners of said municipality, by which, in the first of said proceedings, he sought, by a writ of review, to have certain orders of said board, wherein he was attempted to be dismissed from the police department thereof reviewed and annulled; and by the second of which proceedings he sought, by writ of mandate, to compel his restoration and reinstatement as a disabled and retired police officer, and also to compel the issuance of a warrant by said board for the payment of his accrued and accruing pensions as such disabled and retired officer. These two proceedings were consolidated by the trial court which, upon the hearing thereon, upheld the contention of the petitioner in both of said proceedings, reviewing and annulling the said orders dismissing him from the police department, adjudging that he was entitled to have and receive his accrued and accruing pensions as such disabled and retired police officer, establishing the aggregate amount of his already accrued pensions up to the time of the rendition of its decision to be $4,600, and directing a writ of mandate to issue against the said board of police commissioners, acting ex officio as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, and ordering said board in that capacity to issue a warrant for said sum, drawn upon the auditor and treasurer of said municipality.

From the orders of said court, directing the issuance of these respective writs, appeals were taken to the District Court of Appeal for the First district, upon the hearing of which the said orders were respectively affirmed. The history of said proceedings and of said appeals up to the time of their said affirmance is quite fully and accurately set forth in Sheehan v. Board of Police Com'rs, etc., et al. (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 51. Upon the going down of the remittiturs in each of said appeals, the petitioner and respondent therein applied ex parte to the court in which said proceedings had been initiated for an order directing the clerk of said court to issue a peremptory writ of mandate requiring the said board of police commissioners, in their said capacity as ex officio the board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, to issue a warrant to the petitioner for the payment of said sum of $4,600—

"the amount of the pension due and unpaid to the petitioner from the 1st day of January, 1904, to the 1st day of September, 1911, together with legal interest on said $4,600 from September 1, 1911, to July 1, 1920, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; and also for the further sum of $600 per annum payable and unpaid to petitioner for his pension from September 1, 1911, to July 1, 1920, together with legal interest at 7 per cent. per annum thereon from the end of each year, viz., from September 1, 1912, on said sum of $600 per annum from the time the same became due and payable up to July 1, 1920; and also for the sum of $209.75, the amount of petitioner's costs herein."

An order was made pursuant to said applications and in the above language thereof, and a peremptory writ of mandate issued in accordance with said order and in the terms thereof, as above quoted, on July 2, 1920.

Thereafter, and on July 21, 1920, the defendants, board of police commissioners, gave notice of a motion to set aside said order and to quash and to recall said writ, which motion, coming on for hearing on August 6, 1920, was by the trial court denied, whereupon the present appeal was taken by said defendants from the order of July 2, 1920, directing the issuance of said peremptory writ of mandate, and also from the order made on August 6, 1920, denying said defendant's motion to vacate said former order and refusing to recall and quash the peremptory writ of mandate issued in pursuance of said former order.

[1, 2] Upon the hearing of this appeal, the respondent moved for a dismissal thereof upon several grounds, most of which related to informalities in the defendants' motion to vacate the order for the issuance of said peremptory writ of mandate; and, as to these, we do not perceive any merit in them. Nor do we think there is any merit in the chief ground of said motion to dismiss which is that the order directing the issuance of the peremptory writ was one unnecessary to be made and hence not harmful to the appellants, since it was the duty of the clerk of the trial court, upon the receipt of the remittitur showing the affirmance upon appeal of the original order of the trial court directing the issuance of a peremptory writ, to issue said writ without the necessity of any further or later order of the court. The answer to this portion of the respondent's motion to dismiss is twofold, the first being that the respondent, having deemed such further order necessary to the issuance of said writ, as shown by his ex parte application therefor, cannot now be heard to urge that the making of said order was unnecessary upon a motion to dismiss the appeal thereon; second, as to that portion of said order which requires the clerk to include interest upon both the amount of the petitioner's claims for his pension accrued prior to September 1, 1912, the date of his original order, and the amount thereof accruing and becoming payable annually after said date, the same question arises, namely, whether the clerk had the right to include said items of interest in the terms of said writ. We think that the order of August 6, 1920, was sufficient in form to cover and deny the appellants' motion to quash and recall said writ, and we also think that the question of the right of the clerk to include said items of interest in said writ, with or without an order of the court to that effect, is embraced within the scope of this appeal upon the merits, and hence that the respondent's motion to dismiss the same should be denied.

[3] The single question thus presented upon this appeal is whether or not the trial court had a right to order interest payable upon the so-called "judgment" in said mandamus proceeding, establishing the petitioner's status as a disabled and retired police officer and, as such, entitled to the pension provided for in chapter 10 of article 8 of the San Francisco charter, and ordering the issuance of a warrant by the board of police commissioners for the amount of his said accrued and accruing pension. The respondent contends that the adjudication of the trial court is such a judgment as would bear interest from the date of its entry, under the provisions of sections 1915 and 1920 of the Civil Code, and he relies, as the basis for his said insistence, upon the express terms and phrasing of said adjudication, wherein the trial court used the following language:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the petitioner have and recover judgment, and judgment is hereby made and given in favor of the petitioner and against the respondents as prayed for in the petition of petitioner * * * and that the petitioner have and recover and that he be paid and that respondents pay to petitioner, from the police relief and pension fund of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, a yearly pension of $600 from and after the 1st day of January, 1904, and that there was due and unpaid from the said police relief and pension fund to the petitioner on the 1st day of September, 1911, the sum of $4,600 * * * and that the petitioner have and recover and be paid by the respondents, from the police relief and pension fund of the said police department, the said sum of $4,600, together with his costs expended herein."

The trial court further—

"adjudged and decreed that the petitioner had no speedy or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law and that a peremptory writ of mandate issue out of this court * * * addressed to the respondents, directing and requiring that the respondents revoke and set aside the said finding, action, order, and resolution of January 12, 1904, and that the respondents restore the petitioner to the pension roll of the police relief and pension fund of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, and that the petitioner be paid, from the said relief and pension fund, a yearly pension of $600, from and after the 1st day of January, 1904, and which pension up to the 1st day of September, 1911, amounts and is hereby adjudged to be the sum of $4,600, which it is ordered and adjudged shall be paid by the respondents to the petitioner, from the police relief and pension fund of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco."

If we were to regard the form of this adjudication as decisive of the question before us, it might well be held sufficient as such a judgment as, entered in an appropriate action or proceeding, would come within the terms of sections 1915 and 1920 of the Civil Code; but the question presented herein lies deeper than the face or terms of this adjudication and involves the nature of the proceeding, the parties before the court, the fund from which the petitioner's pension was and is payable, and the powers of the trial court, both in the making of such original adjudication and in the issuance of its subsequent order and writ for the enforcement of its terms. It may be conceded, at the outset of this discussion, that the petitioner and respondent herein has sufficiently established his right to be the recipient of a pension amounting to the sum of $600 a year, dating from the 1st day of January, 1904, and continuing down to September 1, 1911, and that such pension was payable from the police relief and pension fund, collected and maintained by said municipality for the payment of pensions to disabled police officers or, in the event of their death in service, to their relatives; and that such pension, to which the petitioner was thus entitled, had remained unpaid down to and after the time of the inception of the original proceedings herein, by means of which he sought to compel the allowance and payment of his said accumulated pensions. The police relief and pension fund of said municipality is provided for in chapter 10 of article 8 of the San Francisco charter. By the terms of said chapter, the board of police commissioners of said municipality are constituted ex officio a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners and, as such, are made the trustees of said fund. The moneys which supply and maintain the same, derived from various sources, are deposited with the treasurer of the municipality and are paid out by said treasurer to those persons who are entitled thereto, upon warrants issued by the said board of police relief and pension fund commissioners and presented to the auditor to be, by the latter official, audited and ordered paid. The only function which the board of police commissioners, acting ex officio as the board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, have to perform in relation to said fund is that of determining who, among the members of the police department of said municipality, by reason of age, infirmity, or physical disability, are entitled to retirement upon pension, or the relatives of whom, by reason of his death in service, are entitled to receive such pension, and for what length of time the same shall be paid. Having determined these matters, the only further function of said board of police relief and pension fund commissioners is to issue the warrant for the amount of pension to which the pensioner has thus become entitled, and which warrant when issued is to be presented to the auditor for approval and to the treasurer for payment. The petitioner herein, being, as we have seen, entitled to his pension in the sum of $600 per annum from a date not long after his original disability and retirement on account thereof, and his right to such pension having been accordingly fixed and awarded, demanded the issuance of his warrant for the aggregate amount thereof by said board; and this demand being refused, he commenced the original proceedings herein wherein he sought a writ of mandate to compel the issuance of said writ. In so doing, he was acting strictly within the scope and terms of section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for the issuance of writs of mandate "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station." In seeking this appropriate remedy, the petitioner was bound to allege and prove that he was entitled to the said pension and to the aggregate amount thereof then due him and for the payment of which such warrant should issue; but that fact did not give to the proceeding the nature or qualities of a civil action so as to render the adjudication by the court in such special proceeding that the petitioner was entitled to said writ, such a judgment as would be obtainable in a civil action. The petitioner could not, in fact, have obtained such a judgment in said special proceeding, since he would not have been entitled to sue the board of police commissioners in a civil action to recover the amount due him on account of his said pension.

[4] The board of police commissioners, whether acting directly as such or acting ex officio as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, is a mere agency of the municipality for the dispensation of certain of its funds in the custody of its treasurer. Said board has no separate existence and is incapable of either suing or being sued, except as it may be required as an official body by mandamus to perform its official duties, or except as its official action may be compelled or enjoined in some other special proceeding. It was so decided in the case of Spencer v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 103, 116, 179 Pac. 163, and in that case it was held to be well settled that an action will not lie against the officers or official boards of a municipality to recover money, as, in that case, money paid upon an illegal assessment, unless it appeared that the money was still in the hands of the board or its members at the time such action was begun. Spencer v. City of Los Angeles, supra; Hartford, etc., Co. v. Jordan, 168 Cal. 270, 142 Pac. 839; Craig v. Boone, 146 Cal. 718, 81 Pac. 22. In the instant case, none of the money belonging to said pension fund was at any time in the hands or under the control of the board of police commissioners, either directly or in their said ex officio capacity, their only function in regard to such pensions, when allowed, being, as we have seen, that of issuing warrants for the amount thereof for presentation to and approval by the auditor and for payment upon his order by the treasurer, who is the official custodian of said pension fund. This being so, the sole purpose for which the petitioner could institute, and, in fact, did institute, his mandamus proceedings was that of procuring an adjudication of his right to a writ of mandate, directing said board to perform its official duty by the issuance of a warrant for his unpaid pension. It was not, and could not be, the procurement of a money judgment, either against said board of police commissioners or against said municipality, since the procurement of such a judgment was not within the scope and purposes of such a proceeding.

We are reinforced in this conclusion by the uniform current of authority in this state as to the scope and functions of writs of mandate. In the early case of Davis v. Porter, Treas., etc., 66 Cal. 658, 6 Pac. 746, the proceeding was one in mandamus to compel the treasurer of the city of Sacramento to pay certain coupons on bonds issued by said city, and it was attempted, in said proceeding, to have it adjudicated that the payee of such bonds was entitled to interest upon such of said coupons as were not paid at maturity. The court held that such a question could not be adjudicated in that form of proceeding, saying:

"It may be conceded that the plaintiff is entitled to have the interest on his coupons not paid at maturity, of the city of Sacramento. But in this proceeding it cannot be allowed, for the reasons above given. This is not an action brought upon the coupons, to recover the amount due on them, and interest on such amount. Nor is it an application to have the proper authorities of the city of Sacramento levy a tax for such purpose. But it is an application to compel the performance of an act especially enjoined by law, and resulting as a duty from the office and station of respondent. We have pointed out the limits of the remedy in the foregoing part of this opinion, and, as so limited, such interest on interest cannot be allowed. If the party is entitled to recover such interest, he must resort to some other mode of procedure."

In the case of Barber v. Mulford, 117 Cal. 356, 49 Pac. 206, the application was in mandamus against the board of education of the city of San Diego to compel the issuance of an order upon the county school superintendent for the drawing of a requisition on the county treasurer for the payment of a claim of the petitioner against the school district. It was contended, by the petitioner, successfully in the trial court that he was entitled, in said proceeding, to the allowance and award of interest upon his claim from the time of its allowance by the board of education. In refusing to sustain this contention, upon appeal, the court said:

"It was error to allow interest in the mandate of the writ. If it be said that interest should be allowed for damages as in ordinary cases for breach of contract, the reply is that mandamus does not lie to enforce the obligation of contracts but only the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, in this instance the issuance to plaintiff of an order for the amount of his audited claim, no more nor less. The judgment should be modified by omitting therefrom the direction for the allowance of interest."

In the case of Howe v. Southrey, 144 Cal. 767, 78 Pac. 259, the application was for a writ of mandate to compel the trustees of a school district to issue an order for the payment of the amount of a judgment, which the applicant had obtained against the school district for the sum of $55 and costs, amounting to $134.50. The judgment did not provide by its terms for interest thereon, but the applicant insisted that he was entitled to interest upon the judgment, under the provisions of sections 1915 and 1920 of the Civil Code. The court said:

"As to the matter of interest, it does not appear from the petition herein that any interest was provided for in the judgment entered in the original suit. Mandamus does not lie to enforce the obligation of contracts, but only to enforce the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins. In this case it can go no farther than to compel the board to issue its requisition for the exact amount of the judgment. It cannot determine whether the obligation rests upon the district to pay interest upon the judgment, for such is not the office of the writ of mandate." Citing Barber v. Mulford, supra.

In the recent case of Engebretson v. City of San Diego (Cal. Sup.) 197 Pac. 651, the question of the right of a claimant against a municipality to recover interest upon his claim from and after the date when payment thereon was due, took a broader range, since that action was one directly against the city of San Diego to recover upon such claim with interest. The court in that case held that, in the absence of a statutory provision authorizing it, the holder of a claim against a municipality was not entitled to recover interest, even in a direct action against said municipality to recover a judgment upon such claim. In so holding, the court cited, with approval, the foregoing cases to the effect that, in a mandamus proceeding, interest was not allowable upon a claim against the funds of a city, and stated that the only remedy, if any, for a claimant in case of delay in the auditing and payment of his claim would be by a direct action against the city to recover judgment thereon, which judgment, when recovered, would bear interest, under section 1920 of the Civil Code. This case has a direct bearing, not only upon that portion of the order of the trial court herein which directed the inclusion in the writ of mandate of interest upon the pension claims of the petitioner accrued prior to its original adjudication, but also upon that portion of the order herein appealed from which directs payment of interest upon the pension claims of the petitioner, which have ripened since such original adjudication and as to which no judgment or adjudication of any kind, other than said ex parte order and the later order refusing to vacate the same, has ever been had.

The cases cited and relied upon by the respondent are not at variance with the views above expressed. They are, in each instance, cases wherein the judgment relied upon, as bearing interest, was one obtained in a direct civil action against the municipality or individual owing the debt or directly liable for the amount of the demand. No case of a writ of mandate directing interest to be allowed upon a claim not founded upon such a judgment has been called to our attention. The case of Fuller v. Aylesworth, 75 Fed. 694, 21 C. C. A. 505, upon which the respondent herein strongly relies, was a case wherein a money judgment had been rendered against a county, adjudging it liable to pay a sum certain to the plaintiff, with a provision for mandamus to compel the levy of certain assessments for the payment of such judgment. Judge Taft, in that case, pointed out:

"That the writ of mandamus in the circuit courts is never an independent suit as it is in many states and in England, but it is only a proceeding ancillary to the judgment which gives the jurisdiction; and, when issued, becomes a substitute for the ordinary process of execution to enforce payment of the same as provided in the contract."

The writ of mandate in this state is an independent proceeding, having for its purpose the compulsion of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station. It has none of the characteristics or functions of a civil action for the collection of a debt.

It follows from the foregoing review of the authorities that the petitioner and respondent herein neither had nor could obtain such a money judgment in this mandamus proceeding, as would bear interest under the provisions of sections 1915 and 1920 of the Civil Code, and hence that the trial court was in error, in its ex parte order of July 2, 1920, in so far as it undertook to direct the issuance of a writ of mandate to the appellants herein, which should include the allowance of interest upon the aggregate amount of the petitioner's pension due and unpaid prior to September 1, 1911, the date of its original order, from and after said date and up to July 1, 1920; and was also in error in providing therein for the inclusion of interest at the legal rate, upon the annual amount of the petitioner's pension, to which he had become entitled between September 1, 1911, and July 1, 1920; and was also in error in its refusal to vacate and set aside its said order of July 2, 1920, in so far as the same related to and required the payment of such interest, and in refusing to recall and quash the writ of mandate issued in accordance with said order.

The orders are reversed, and the trial court is hereby directed to recall and quash the writ of mandate, issued in conformity therewith, in so far as the same directs the drawing of any warrant or warrants for the payment of interest upon the petitioner's pension demands.

BANK OF ORLAND v. HARLAN.
(Sac. 3124.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 16, 1922.

1. Contracts ☞108(2)—Contract to loan credit and securities to bank to enable it to pass examination is illegal.

Under Pen. Code, § 563, and section 563a, as added by St. 1917, p. 580, making it an offense for any officer of a bank to make a false entry with intent to deceive an examiner, a contract whereby defendant agreed to loan to a bank his credit, represented by his note, together with certain securities, to protect an overdraft by defendant's brother so that the bank examiner would make no adverse report because of the overdraft and the bank agreed to return the note and securities at the end of 90 days regardless of whether the brother was able to deposit other securities by that time, was illegal.

2. Contracts ☞138(1)—Court will not aid either party to contract to loan credit and securities to bank to enable it to pass examination.

A court will not lend its aid to either party to a contract, whereby defendant loaned plaintiff bank his credit, represented by his note, together with certain securities, to enable it to pass examination by the examiner without criticism of an illegal overdraft to defendant's brother, but will neither enforce defendant's note against him in suit by the bank, nor enforce, in defendant's favor, the bank's agreement to return his note and securities.

3. Contracts ☞138(3)—Participation in illegal contract for benefit of bank bars party from recovering property transferred.

The fact that defendant's participation in an illegal contract, whereby he loaned to a bank his credit, represented by his note, together with certain securities to enable the bank to pass examination, was for the benefit of the bank and that he received no profit therefrom and that only the bank was amenable to the penal statute, does not prevent defendant from being in pari delicto as to the fraud and deceit involved, as respects his right to have enforced the bank's agreement to return his note and securities.

4. Contracts ☞138(6)—Immaterial whether illegal nature of contract appears from pleadings.

Whether or not facts showing that the contract sought to be enforced is illegal appear from the pleadings, where the evidence discloses that the relations of the parties are illegal, the court, will act on its own motion.

On Petition for Rehearing.

5. Contracts §138(1)—Public good does not require enforcement of illegal contract in favor of solvent bank.

The exception to the rule against enforcement of illegal contracts in cases where the public good demands the enforcement of defendant's obligation does not apply to an illegal contract whereby a bank apparently obtained additional security to enable it to pass examination, if there is no showing that the bank is not solvent and able to pay all its debts, including those due the depositors, notwithstanding the loss of the demand based on the illegal contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Orland against T. W. Harlan on promissory notes. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. C. Huston, of Woodland, W. T. Belieu, of Willows, and W. E. Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank Freeman, George R. Freeman, and Duard F. Geis, all of Willows, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. Plaintiff brought its action to recover on a promissory note executed by defendant to plaintiff, and for the conversion of a certain crop of barley covered by a mortgage assigned by defendant to plaintiff. Defendant, by his answers, pleaded by way of defense and for affirmative relief, that the note was executed and the crop mortgage and other securities were assigned to plaintiff for a limited and temporary use, with the agreement that they would, within a specified period, be surrendered and returned to defendant.

The two actions were consolidated and tried before a jury, and a verdict and judgment rendered in favor of defendant, awarding him the return and possession of such note and securities. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

The appeal was first heard before the third district court of appeal, where the judgment was affirmed. A rehearing was granted in this court for the purpose of further consideration of the questions of law involved. The following statement of the case and conclusions of the district court of appeal are adopted as part of this opinion:

"The appellant makes but two points. The first is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The second is error in giving a certain instruction. As to the first, it is sufficient to say that the evidence was sharply conflicting on the disputed point. The verdict, if supported at all by evidence setting out a reasonably credible story, is conclusive on appeal. The appellant insists, however, that the version of the matter tendered by the respondent is so inherently improbable that, as a matter of law, it must be held that it is not true. We cannot accept this view. It is quite true that the transaction was an unusual one, but the conditions which brought it forth were somewhat unusual. The appellant had permitted one G. B. Harlan, a brother of the respondent, to overdraw his account to the extent of some $13,000 and wholly without security. The significance of this large overdraft is appreciated when it is recalled that the entire capital stock of the appellant bank is but $50,000, and that an overdraft in this amount, being more than 10 per cent. of the capital stock, is permitted in violation of law. The appellant was expecting an official visit from the bank examiner, and it was apprehensive that that official would criticize its acts in the matter. In this emergency, the appellant applied to the respondent to furnish security in behalf of G. B. Harlan. The respondent at first refused; but being assured that the securities were desired only for a temporary purpose and would be returned to the respondent as soon as certain other specified securities were obtained, he responded to the request and placed in the hands of appellant the various securities here in suit. The respondent, in his answer, pleads this contract in full, sets out a description of these securities, and avers that the appellant agreed that it would rely upon these other securities and return to the respondent those furnished by him. It is further set out that it was mutually understood that these other securities would be substituted within about 90 days. In support of the verdict, it will be assumed that the jury found in favor of the respondent on such of these issues as are necessary to support the judgment."

The real question in dispute is whether the facts as stated and accordingly found by the verdict of the jury support the affirmative relief granted the defendant.

To elaborate a little more fully the testimony as to this transaction as given in behalf of the defendant, it is fairly made to appear that G. B. Harlan, a brother of the defendant, T. W. Harlan, was being financed by the plaintiff bank in a contract for state highway construction; that he had overdrawn his account in the sum of $13,000, which overdrafts were unsecured. At a meeting arranged by G. B. Harlan with the bank officials, which the defendant had been invited to attend, it developed that the bank officials were expecting a visit from the bank examiner and were very desirous to obtain collateral security to cover these overdrafts before opening their books to the examiner. The defendant was in no way obligated to the bank or to his brother on account of this indebtedness. He was first asked if he would not furnish security on behalf of his brother. This he positively refused to do. He was then asked if he would loan his credit and securities to the bank temporarily until it would have an opportunity to substitute other securities from the business resources of G. B. Harlan, which they represented would materialize in about 90 days. These anticipated securities were to consist of certain assignments on account of the highway contract of G. B. Harlan and a mortgage upon a rice crop to be planted and grown under a lease in which he was interested.

To put it in the words of the defendant:

"They simply asked me if it would be possible for me to loan them sufficient securities to keep away the bank examiner, so they could keep this amount of money whole, so that in the spring when Harlan [G. B.] was supposed to have the securities he had stated to them they would have, that they could take the security from him and return my securities to me. * * * I enumerated the securities that I did have that I would not need for two or three months, and if it would be of any benefit to them, if they would return them to me I would let them have them, and that was done."

He further testified that the bank accepted these securities and the note under the unqualified agreement to return them in 90 days, and that this agreement was not contingent upon the bank being able to substitute the securities expected from G. B. Harlan. In the language of the witness, referring to the director who was spokesman for the bank at this conference, "he was to give me back the securities irrespective of the mortgage."

This statement of the agreement was corroborated by the testimony of G. B. Harlan.

This version of the transaction is vigorously denied on behalf of the plaintiff, whose witnesses testify that the securities advanced by defendant were given in for the benefit of his brother and were only to be returned when other satisfactory security was deposited in his behalf.

If such was the arrangement it would have been entirely legitimate; but in view of the verdict of the jury, we are bound to accept the controlling force of the evidence most favorable to the defendant.

[1] It is contended on behalf of appellant, however, that, under the most favorable interpretation of defendant's story, the contract was made in furtherance of a fraud in an attempt to cover up the deficit in the bank's assets and to deceive and mislead the bank examiner. In such a case the courts will not aid either party in its enforcement.

Such would clearly be the application of the law if the effect of this agreement was purely fictitious, and for the sole purpose of deceiving the bank examiner, without any provision for substituting other securities for those to be surrendered. The transaction as testified to by respondent, under the conditions pleaded, amounts to the same thing.

Even conceding that both parties were sincere in the expectation that sufficient manna would be sent down from heaven to replace respondent's securities within 90 days, such was not the result. Both parties must have known that G. B. Harlan's affairs bordered on insolvency. That the prospects from highway profits and crop mortgage were exceedingly nebulous. Yet, according to respondent's story and the implied findings of the jury, the bank and respondent connived at a plan to so fix the bank's securities as to make it appear to the bank examiner that this note and the hypothecated mortgages were held by the bank in the ordinary course of business, to cover this $13,000 overdraft. The arrangement entered into, as sought to be enforced, reaches precisely this result. The bank having failed to obtain new securities at the end of the 90 days is left once more with this unprotected overdraft upon its hands.

In other words, the defendant was not relying upon the credit of some third party to release his note and securities, but upon the promise of the bank to return them, whether redeemed by other security or not. The parties were gambling upon the ability of the bank to procure other security. The transaction to be presented to the bank examiner was not what it seemed on its face. It was a state of affairs that no bank would dare disclose to the examiner, an overdraft for $13,000, secured by collateral paper which was subject to withdrawal and cancellation after 90 days, with the bare contingency that the insolvent debtor might be able by that time to protect the dishonored paper. There was nothing on the books to indicate that this overdraft was not substantially and permanently protected. If the true state of the case, as found by the jury, was to be disclosed to the bank examiner, it must have been obvious to both parties that it would not for an instant pass inspection. They may have hoped and intended in some way to keep this security good, but to enter upon this contract to restore to respondent his securities, irrespective of substituting other indemnity, was to make the transaction upon the bank's books fictitious and misleading.

Section 563a of the Penal Code as added by St. 1917, p. 580, declares it a crime for any officer, director, trustee, or agent for any bank organized under the laws of this state to make an untrue entry in any book or any report, tag, or statement of the business affairs or condition, in whole or in part, of such corporation with intent to deceive * * * any agent or examiner, private or official, employed or lawfully appointed to examine into its condition. Section 563 of the Penal Code provides that every officer or agent of any corporation who, with intent to defraud, knowingly omits to make or cause or direct to be made a full and true entry on the books or accounts of such corporation of the property of the corporation, or omits or concurs in omitting to make any material entry in any book of accounts or other record or document kept by such corporation, is punishable by imprisonment. Even in the absence of any such penal statute any such conduct would be a fraud upon the creditors and depositors, and any person participating or conniving at such concealment or deceit by the bank officials would be tainted with the same fraud.

Under section 5209 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. § 9772), corresponding with the sections of the Penal Code cited, the Supreme Court of the United States in Cross v. State of North Carolina, 132 U. S. 132, 10 Sup. Ct. 49, 33 L. Ed. 287, dealing with the question of fictitious assets, uses this language:

"If the notes in question had not been forged, but, with or without the consent of the obligors, had been temporarily placed by defendants among the assets of the bank, and entered upon its books, when they were not its property, with intent to deceive the agent appointed to examine its affairs, they could have been punished under section 5209."

While the law does not impose the penal liability for such a deal upon participants not officials of the corporation, that fact cannot relieve them from the moral opprobrium of the act.

Appellant cites the decision of Judge Ross in the case of Pauly v. O'Brien (Circuit Court, S. D. Cal.) 69 Fed. 460, in support of the illegality of this contract, but also of the contention that the respondent is nevertheless liable to the bank in this action.

The case cited fairly illustrates the illegality of the transaction before us, but does not put the appellant bank in the favorable position claimed. In the cited case the California National Bank of San Diego had procured a note from one of its employees to take the place of and cover up the insufficiency of paper of an insolvent debtor for the purpose of deceiving the bank examiner. The bank subsequently went into the hands of a receiver, and the suit was by the receiver on the note. Judge Ross in the opinion says:

"Undoubtedly, the transaction in question originated with the officers of the bank, but to it the defendant became a willing party. It would require more credulity than I possess to believe that the defendant, when his brother, who was the bookkeeper of the bank, came to him with the proposition of its vice president, in its every suggestion and essence deceptive and fraudulent, did not know its true character and purpose. So far as appears, Naylor was a total stranger to him. Why should he execute his note to take up the note of Naylor? What moved him to do it, except to enable the officers of the bank to supplant the overdue note of Naylor with a live note, which he now insists was without consideration and purely voluntary, but which enabled the bank officers to make a deceptive, and therefore a fraudulent, showing of assets? Obviously, nothing."

In its inception and execution that transaction was closely analogous to the one presented in this action, and if here, as there, the action had been brought in behalf of the creditors, the defendant might properly be held estopped from showing that his obligation was different from what it appeared on its face.

The other citations by appellant upholding the right of the payee to recover, notwithstanding the contract was made in violation of law (Blochman Bank v. F. G. Investment Co., 177 Cal. 763, 171 Pac. 944; Brittan v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 124 Cal. 282, 57 Pac. 84, 71 Am. St. Rep. 58), are not in point. In both of these cases the transaction was one restricted by law for the benefit of the bank and its depositors, and the defendants had received full consideration for the notes sued on. In the one case, the bank had made loans in excess of the limitations imposed by law, and in the other, had loaned money to one of its directors in violation of the law. It was said by this court in each of these decisions that the defendant could not take advantage of the situation "as the violation of the provision in question could only be availed of at the instance of the state or sovereign power."

[2] In the case at bar, under the facts as found, the bank parted with no value for the respondent's securities, and the respondent received no consideration therefor. The bank is not insolvent, the rights of creditors are not involved, and it would be indefensible to allow it to profit by its own wrong. On the other hand, the respondent, according to his own statement, made himself a party to a transaction intended to deceive and mislead the bank examiner as to the financial condition of the appellant bank. Public policy forbids that the courts should aid him in escaping from his dilemma.

The rule that a contract which is against public policy, good morals, or the express mandate of law cannot be made the basis of either legal or equitable relief in the courts requires no citation of authorities. And where the parties are in pari delicto neither can recover. It is the policy of the law to leave the parties precisely where it finds them.

Applying this doctrine to the parties to this action we are confronted with this situation:

The plaintiff stated and made prima facie proof of a good cause of action both as to the promissory note and the conversion of the property covered by the assigned mortgage. The defendant pleaded and proved by way of defense facts which showed not only that the note and assignments were given without consideration but for the purpose of perpetuating a fraud under the banking laws of this state. Under this state of the facts the plaintiff cannot recover. Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 Pac. 708, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cas. 609; Gridley v. Dorn, 57 Cal. 78, 40 Am. Rep. 110; Thom v. Stewart, 162 Cal. 413, 122 Pac. 1069; Alpers v. Hunt, 86 Cal. 78, 24 Pac. 846, 9 L. R. A. 483, 21 Am. St. Rep. 17; Ball v. Putnam, 123 Cal. 134, 55 Pac. 773.

[3] On the other hand, the defendant has placed himself in a position where, in seeking the return of his note and securities, his only ground for such affirmative relief is in reliance upon this same indefensible contract. He entered into the arrangement voluntarily and, although not himself benefited by the transaction, assumed an equal moral responsibility with the plaintiff. Both parties connived at this attempt to deceive the bank examiner. The fact that only the appellant is amenable to the penal statute does not prevent the respondent from being in pari delicto as to the fraud and deceit involved. In this case both parties understood the purpose, the nature, and the probable result of the agreement they entered into. The respondent, while not financially interested and acting, it may be conceded, for the accommodation of the appellant, proceeded voluntarily and without undue influence of any kind. He, therefore, cannot escape his share of the responsibility. Colby v. Title Insurance & Trust Co., 160 Cal. 632, 117 Pac. 913, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 515; Exchange Bank v. Center State Bank, 100 Neb. 278, 159 N. W. 409.

[4] Neither party is entitled to relief in this case. The courts will leave them where they were when the action was begun. It is immaterial whether the facts showing the unenforceable nature of the contract appear from the pleadings or not, where the evidence discloses the relations of the parties to the transaction are illegal and against public policy the court will act on its own motion. Morrill v. Nightingale, 93 Cal. 452, 28 Pac. 1068, 27 Am. St. Rep. 207; Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112, 27 Pac. 735; Vulcan Powder Co. v. Hercules Powder Co., 96 Cal. 510, 31 Pac. 581, 31 Am. St. Rep. 242; Pac. Wharf & Storage Co. v. Standard Am. Dredg. Co., 184 Cal. 24, 192 Pac. 847.

The judgment is reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In a petition for rehearing the plaintiff urges that the circumstances of this case bring it within an exception to the rule that "in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis," because the good of the public is involved, and that the public good demands that the defendant's obligation be enforced.

[5] The good of the public is not involved in this case, unless some other party than the plaintiff is concerned or interested therein. If the plaintiff is solvent and able to pay its debts, including those due its depositors, notwithstanding the loss of its demand against the defendant, then it would seem that the public is not interested in the matter. There is nothing in the case which purports to show or to claim that the rights of creditors or depositors were involved or endangered by the loss of this asset of the plaintiff. Consequently the basis for the exception in favor of the plaintiff is wanting. If, in any subsequent action, it shall appear that it is necessary for the protection of creditors or depositors to enforce this obligation, the opinion and judgment in this action will not be a bar to such relief.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

HOGARTY v. HOGARTY. (S. F. 9713.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 12, 1922.)

1. Divorce ⇨219—Alimony only allowed pendente lite.

Alimony is only allowed during the pendency of the suit.

2. Divorce ⇨252—Award of property to wife on husband securing divorce held a property settlement, and not a statutory allowance.

Since Civ. Code, § 139, providing that, where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to make suitable allowance to his wife for her support for life or for a shorter period, is inapplicable to a husband's suit for divorce, an agreement made by a husband, and embodied in decree for divorce against his wife, to pay her $30 per month, was not an allowance, but was a part of the property settlement.

3. Divorce ⇨249(1)—Spouse guilty of cruelty cannot complain because award of community property was on condition.

Where a divorce was granted for cruelty, the court having power under Civ. Code, § 146, to grant all the community property to plaintiff absolutely, without any provision for the defendant, defendant cannot complain because the allowance was granted on condition that it might be set aside.

4. Divorce ⇨249(2)—Agreement for allowance to wife, embodied in decree for divorce to husband, conditioned on wife's proper conduct, held valid.

Where a divorce was granted the husband, an agreement giving the wife $30 per month until set aside by court for misconduct of the wife, if untainted by fraud or collusion, is valid, and when made a part of a decree is binding on the parties thereto.

5. Divorce — 249(2)—Agreement granting allowance until misconduct of wife discontinued, where misconduct shown.

Where a divorce was granted a husband for extreme cruelty, and the parties made an agreement embodied in the decree settling their property rights, whereby the husband was to pay the wife $30 per month until set aside by a court because of her misconduct, and misconduct was shown, the court could discontinue the allowance, if misconduct was grave enough to justify it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by William E. Hogarty against Mary E. Hogarty. From an order denying motion to modify interlocutory decree of divorce, plaintiff appeals. Order reversed.

L. R. Weinmann and Augustin Donovan, all of Alameda, for appellant.

Joseph P. Lacey, of Oakland, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion to modify an interlocutory decree of divorce.

Appellant, William E. Hogarty, and respondent, Mary E. Hogarty, were married January 11, 1892, and on July 10, 1918, appellant commenced a suit for divorce on the grounds of desertion and extreme cruelty. On April 3, 1919, an interlocutory decree was granted on the ground of extreme cruelty alone, and on April 6, 1920, the court entered its final decree of divorce. No appeal from either judgment was taken.

On March 18, 1919, appellant and respondent entered into an agreement settling their property rights, which agreement was embodied in the interlocutory decree. By the terms of this agreement and the decree, respondent conveyed to appellant all her right in their home, which was community property, and upon which, it appears, a homestead had been declared. Appellant agreed to pay respondent $30 a month "until the remarriage or death of defendant, or until set aside by the above-entitled court for misconduct on the part of the defendant."

On August 20, 1920, appellant moved for an order modifying the interlocutory decree by setting aside the provision that appellant pay respondent $30 a month. The motion was based on alleged misconduct on the part of respondent, which the court, from the evidence, found to have occurred. The court denied the motion upon the ground that the provisions sought to be modified—

"were based upon an agreement for the settlement of property rights whereby the major part of the community property was given to the plaintiff by said property settlement in lieu of said alimony provision of $30 per month, and that in such case the court cannot modify the interlocutory decree, even upon a finding that the defendant has been guilty of misconduct, and that this court has no jurisdiction to modify said decree, notwithstanding the said parties have agreed to and stipulated that said provisions for alimony contained in said interlocutory decree might be modified and set aside by the court."

From that order this appeal is taken.

Appellant contends that in an action for divorce by a husband on the ground of cruelty there is no statute providing for a payment of alimony, but that in such an action the community property may be divided as the court sees fit, that therefore this payment must be regarded as a property settlement, that the court had the power to impose terms on the payment, and that the court in cutting off the payment is really enforcing the decree.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that appellant's position is correct. The payment in question cannot be regarded as alimony, for alimony is only allowed pendente lite, nor is it a permanent allowance under section 139 of the Civil Code, for such an allowance is only made where the divorce is granted for an offense of the husband. Ex parte Spencer, 83 Cal. 460, 23 Pac. 395, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266. This allowance must therefore be considered as a part of the property settlement. Since the court might have granted all the community property to appellant absolutely (Civ. Code, § 146), without any provision for an allowance to respondent, the divorce having been granted for cruelty, respondent cannot complain because the allowance made by the court was granted upon a condition. It was held in Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 Pac. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520, that:

"Where a wife has obtained an absolute divorce carrying with it the privilege of a remarriage, and permanent alimony is decreed to her, it is generally held that the husband, upon her subsequent remarriage, may secure an order vacating the decree as to alimony." 14 Cyc. 787, and citing cases. There is a qualification of this rule, generally adverted to in the cases cited, to the effect that such a remarriage does not authorize a vacation of the decree for alimony, where it is given as a substitute for, or in lieu of, the wife's rights, at the time of the decree, in the property of the husband, or in the community property, or in property which he acquired from her by the marriage."

The same considerations must apply to a case where a permanent allowance in lieu of a property settlement was ordered set aside for the subsequent misconduct of the wife, as is the case here.

[4] However, this case presents a different question, for here the court reserved the right to cut off the payments upon misconduct, in accordance with the agreement of the parties. Such an agreement, when untainted by fraud, collusion, or the like, is valid (Stoff v. Erken, 25 Cal. App. 528, 144 Pac. 312; Murray v. Murray, 28 Cal. App. 533, 153 Pac. 248), and when made a part of the decree is binding on the parties as a part thereof (Duncan v. Duncan, 175 Cal. 693, 167 Pac. 141). It was clearly pointed out in the latter case that the settlement of property rights and the granting of the decree of divorce itself are separate matters which may be considered independently of each other. In Ex parte Ambrose, 72 Cal. 398, 14 Pac. 33, it was held that the court need not determine the question of the property settlement at the time the decree of divorce is granted, but may retain jurisdiction over the property in the action, and reserved jurisdiction to decide, at a subsequent time, whether the allowance should continue, depending on respondent's conduct.

[5] Having made such a condition a part of its judgment, the court has jurisdiction to enforce it as a part thereof by ordering the payments discontinued. Therefore the court was in error in refusing to grant the motion on the sole ground assigned—that it lacked jurisdiction to make the order. Since the specific acts of misconduct were found to have been committed, and this finding is not questioned by respondent, the court was at liberty to grant the relief, if in its opinion the misconduct was so grave as to justify the withholding of the allowance.

For that reason the order must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

ARGABRITE v. ARGABRITE. (Civ. 4120.)

1. Evidence § 82, 89—Judicial record, when not conclusive, presumed correct, but is disputable.

A judicial record, when not conclusive, will be presumed to correctly determine or set forth the rights of the parties; such presumption being disputable.

2. Divorce § 182—Findings on which court rendered decree against wife for cruelty held on appeal to prima facie show proper judgment rendered.

On wife's appeal from order denying her alimony pending appeal from decree granting husband divorce and attorney's fees for purposes of appeal, findings of lower court on which court rendered such decree in accordance with husband's allegations as to cruelty of wife, and with allegations of his answer to the wife's cross-complaint alleging cruelty, held to establish a prima facie showing that a proper judgment had been rendered against the wife.

3. Divorce § 182—Wife's motion for alimony and counsel fees on appeal addressed to sound discretion of court.

A wife's motion for alimony pending appeal from a decree granting husband divorce, and for counsel fees on appeal, is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court.

4. Divorce § 184(4)—Court presumed to have denied the wife's motion for alimony and counsel fees on appeal in the exercise of its discretion, in absence of showing to contrary.

On wife's appeal from order denying her motion for alimony pending appeal from divorce decree for husband and for counsel fees for purpose of appeal, it must be assumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, the court denied the motion in the exercise of its discretion, and in particular because in the opinion of the court the wife had no just grounds for an appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by William Wade Argabrite against Jessie Louise Argabrite. Decree for plaintiff, and, from an order refusing defendant alimony pending appeal and counsel fees for purposes of appeal, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert Choynski and James Raleigh Kelly, both of San Francisco, for appellant.
Perry Evans, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant for a divorce on the ground of cruelty. The trial court granted to the plaintiff a decree; thereafter the defendant made a motion in the trial court that the plaintiff be directed to pay her moneys for her support pending an appeal, moneys for her expenses on appeal, and moneys to employ an attorney to present her appeal. The trial court refused to make an order, and from the order of the trial court so refusing to make such order for maintenance, etc., the defendant has appealed. The defendant served a written notice of the time and place and nature of her motion, and thereafter made her motion for the relief above specified. At the time of the hearing of said motion the defendant read in evidence her notice of motion, and her affidavit in support thereof, and she also read in evidence the complaint, the answer and cross-complaint, the answer to the cross-complaint, an order for alimony, costs, and counsel fees in the trial court, notice of intention to move for a new trial, the findings, and the judgment. In reply the defendant read his affidavit. The plaintiff's complaint is somewhat long, and it will suffice for the purposes of this opinion to state that it purports to charge acts of extreme cruelty, specifying the nature of the acts and the time and place of the commission of said acts, and which acts extended over a period of time 1914-1917, both dates inclusive. The findings of the trial court were in favor of the plaintiff and found the facts in plaintiff's favor in the language of the plaintiff's complaint. The allegations of the defendant's cross-complaint purported to plead a cause sounding in extreme cruelty, and enumerating acts covering the same period as the complaint. The trial court's findings were in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, and the findings were in accordance with the answer of the plaintiff to the defendant's cross-complaint. In the defendant's affidavit she set forth that the income of the plaintiff was $350 per month, and in his affidavit the plaintiff set forth that his income was $215 per month. In her affidavit the defendant set forth, among other things, an affidavit of merits. The foregoing constitutes the evidence that was placed before the trial court on the hearing of the motion, which was denied. It is recited in the findings, and also in the judgment, that the case in chief was tried before the trial judge sitting without a jury; that plaintiff appeared by his attorney and the defendant appeared by her attorney; that the issues presented by the above-mentioned pleadings were tried out; and that evidence, both oral and documentary was introduced.

[1, 2] One of the disputable presumptions of law is that a judicial record when not conclusive does still correctly determine or set forth the rights of the parties. In the face of that presumption, when the motion in question was made, and the portions of the judgment roll enumerated above were offered in evidence, a prima facie showing was made that a proper judgment had been rendered against the defendant and that she had no meritorious defense. True she offered her affidavit of merits, but that affidavit of merits certainly had no more force and effect than the verified answer and cross-complaint which was more complete and specific than the affidavit of merits. No paper was introduced and no showing was made, either in the trial court or in this court, regarding errors in the reception and rejection of evidence or error, of any other nature. There is not, therefore, anything in this record to show that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the defendant's motion.

[3] It is the settled law of this state that such a motion is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. Stewart v. Stewart, 156 Cal. 651, 656, 105 Pac. 955. The appellant cites numerous cases, such as Bruce v. Bruce, 160 Cal. 28, 116 Pac. 66. Those authorities are not helpful. They are all cases in which the trial court granted the motion and all of them are to the effect that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting the motion. They do not deal with orders refusing to grant the motion. The one case that is slightly in point is Coleman v. Coleman, 23 Cal. App. 423, 138 Pac. 362. But that record differs materially from the record that is before the court in the instant case. In that case the record contained three appeals; an appeal from the judgment, an appeal refusing to allow the appellant to file a notice of intention to move for a new trial after the time for the filing of such notice had expired, and the third appeal being from an order denying plaintiff alimony, etc. The court disposed of the appeals in the order stated. When it came to the last one, it had already decided that the trial court had erred in rendering the judgment it rendered on the merits. In short, the court had a record before it showing there was merit in the appeal. We have no such record before us.

[4] Nothing to the contrary appearing, it must be assumed on appeal that the trial court denied the motion of the defendant in the exercise of its discretion, and in particular because, in the opinion of the trial court, the defendant had no just grounds for an appeal.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Where a company acting through its authorized foreman sold a crane and received the purchase price under an agreement to make delivery when dismantled, and subsequently the foreman permitted the crane to be shipped to a third party to whom it was sold by an interlocking company, acting through an agent who represented both companies and knew of the rights of the first purchaser, the two companies were jointly liable to him for conversion though they had not jointly contracted to sell to him.

2. Trover and conversion ⇨4—Act of ownership conversion.

Any act of ownership or exercise of dominion over the property of another in defiance of his rights is a conversion.

3. Trover and conversion ⇨10—Sale in defiance of owner's rights a conversion.

An unauthorized sale of the property of another in defiance of his rights is a conversion.

4. Trover and conversion ⇨9(7)—Demand for property sold held unnecessary.

An unauthorized sale and shipment of property in defiance of the owner's rights is a conversion for which he may sue without a demand.

5. Trover and conversion ⇨40(6)—Evidence held to sustain damages awarded.

In an action for conversion of machinery purchased for $400, uncontradicted testimony that it was worth $1,500 held to justify a verdict for $600, the amount plaintiff's prospective purchaser agreed to pay, but did not because plaintiff was unable to make delivery owing to the conversion.

6. Trover and conversion ⇨22—Offer to return property no defense.

Where plaintiff's property was sold without authority, and in defiance of his rights, the right to damages for conversion became complete, and no subsequent offer by one of defendants to return the property could defeat his rights.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1033(5)—Appellants may not complain of too favorable instruction.

Defendants appellants cannot complain of an instruction which was more favorable to them than it should have been.

8. Appeal and error ⇨843(2)—Complaint of instruction on what constitutes legal demand not considered where demand was unnecessary.

In an action for conversion, where the conversion by the defendants was joint, and demand unnecessary, defendants' criticism of instruction on what is sufficient to constitute legal demand does not call for discussion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by G. B. Mier against the Southern California Ice Company and another, for damages for conversion. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles J. Kelly, D. A. Stuart, and I. B. Benjamin, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for the conversion by defendants of a crane and its equipment. The complaint alleges that the crane was sold to plaintiff by defendants under an agreement to make delivery when requested. The case, which was tried before a jury, was submitted upon the evidence adduced by plaintiff, defendants having elected not to present any evidence. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing his damages in the sum of $600. From a judgment on that verdict, defendants appeal, contending that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in that there was no evidence of a conversion, or of a demand for the return of the property, or of damages to plaintiff, and that the court erred in excluding a certain document that was offered by defendants on their cross-examination of plaintiff, and likewise in giving certain instructions.

The evidence, which is without conflict, discloses the following facts: The defendant Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company—hereafter, for brevity, referred to as the Los Angeles Company—is a corporation with its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles. The other defendant, the Southern California Ice Company—hereafter, for brevity, referred to as the San Bernardino Company—is likewise a corporation, and has its principal place of business in the city of San Bernardino. W. R. Plue is the purchasing agent of the former company, as well as an agent for the San Bernardino Company. Indeed, the two companies appear to be closely interlocked. Such, at any rate, is the inference that is warranted by certain statements in appellants' brief, where we are informed that "the officers and agents of the defendant Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company were the agents of the Southern California Ice Company"; also that Louis Hill, who is the foreman of the San Bernardino Company, "attended to its business at San Bernardino, under the direction of the officers of the company mentioned in Los Angeles"—that is, under the direction of the officers of the Los Angeles Company.

Shortly prior to August 11, 1919, plaintiff received through the mail a statement put out by the Los Angeles Company purporting to contain a list of secondhand machinery which that company had for sale. Whereupon plaintiff called upon Plue, who informed him that the machinery was located at San Bernardino, and was given an order on Hill, the foreman of the San Bernardino Company, directing the latter to show plaintiff two compressors, a part of the advertised machinery. Thereupon plaintiff went to San Bernardino, saw Hill, and was shown the two compressors. At the same time Hill, on behalf of his company, told plaintiff that he had a 10-ton traveling crane that he wanted to sell. Plaintiff, on August 11, 1919, purchased the two compressors and the crane for the aggregate sum of $450. The sale was made to plaintiff by Hill, acting for and on behalf of the San Bernardino Company, if not for both companies. Plaintiff immediately paid Hill $50 on account of the purchase price, and agreed to pay the balance to the Los Angeles Company upon his return to Los Angeles. This he did on August 24, 1919, by a check for $400 payable to the order of the Los Angeles Company. When plaintiff was purchasing the crane and the two compressors, Hill, who was then engaged in dismantling those pieces of machinery, said that it would be a favor to him if plaintiff would leave the crane where it was for a short time, as it would suit him if he could dismantle it later. Plaintiff acceded to this proposition, telling Hill that when the latter should have dismantled that piece of machinery he could notify plaintiff, who would then return to San Bernardino and get the crane. It was agreed that delivery of the crane should be made on the sidewalk at San Bernardino. By this, we presume, was meant the sidewalk in front of the plant of the San Bernardino Company. Some time in the month of September following, plaintiff, having received no word that the crane was ready for delivery, wrote a letter of inquiry to Hill. No reply was made to this letter. Shortly thereafter plaintiff, while the crane was, as he supposed, still in San Bernardino in the possession of the San Bernardino Company, entered into a contract with a party in San Francisco whereby he agreed to sell the crane to the latter for the sum of $600 f. o. b. San Bernardino. Subsequently this person rescinded his agreement to buy the crane from plaintiff because the latter was unable to make delivery, owing to the fact that defendants, unknown to plaintiff, and without authority, had sold and shipped the crane to another party. It seems that some time in the middle of October, 1919, plaintiff called on Plue at the latter's office in Los Angeles, and was informed by that agent of the Los Angeles Company that he had sold the crane, that it had been shipped to the purchaser, and that he did not know where it then was. The crane, it seems, was sold by the Los Angeles Company to a third party, and was shipped out of San Bernardino on or about October 4, 1919, which was some two or three weeks after plaintiff had agreed to sell the crane for $600 to the party in San Francisco, but before that person had rescinded his agreement to purchase. When plaintiff called upon Plue and spoke to him about the crane, some time in the middle of October, 1919, Plue asked plaintiff if it would satisfy him to have the crane delivered to plaintiff's purchaser in San Francisco. Plaintiff replied that it would not, as he already had lost the sale to his San Francisco buyer. At the date of the trial, September 23, 1920, the crane was in Los Angeles in the plant of the Los Angeles Company. At that time it was not in the condition in which it was when plaintiff bought it—a number of parts had been broken and much of it was missing. On March 13, 1920, which was more than three months after this action was commenced, Plue offered to deliver the crane to plaintiff, but the latter refused to take it.

[1-3] We think it clear that the evidence is sufficient to show a conversion of the crane by both defendants. The case seems to have been tried in the lower court upon the assumption that, in order to hold both defendants liable, it must appear that they had jointly contracted to sell and deliver the crane to plaintiff. This is an entirely erroneous theory. Plaintiff is not suing for a breach of contract. He is not suing for a mere failure to comply with that part of the contract of sale whereby Hill, on behalf of his company, had agreed to notify plaintiff when the crane was dismantled and to make delivery on the sidewalk at San Bernardino. He is suing for a tort—for the conversion of the crane—which unquestionably occurred when, about a month and a half after plaintiff had purchased it, the Los Angeles Company sold it and permitted it to be shipped out of San Bernardino. To sustain the verdict against both defendants all that it was necessary to show was that plaintiff was the owner, entitled to possession of the crane, and that defendants, as joint tortfeasors, had converted it. The first of these requisites, plaintiff's title and right to possession, is conceded. It is expressly averred by defendants in their answer that the San Bernardino Company had "sold * * * to plaintiff two certain compressors and one crane and its equipment." It is of no moment how plaintiff received his title and right of possession. It matters not whether it came to him under a contract made with both of these defendants or with but one of them, or whether he received title from an entirely different source. It is enough that plaintiff had the title and the right of possession. Having the title and right of possession, he is entitled to a joint judgment against these defendants if they jointly converted his property. That defendants were guilty of a joint conversion is clear. After the crane had been sold to plaintiff, and subsequently to the time when he was entitled to have it delivered to him on the sidewalk in San Bernardino, the Los Angeles Company, wrongfully and with knowledge of plaintiff's rights, sold it to a third party, and permitted it, or all but the rails, to be shipped to that purchaser. Both Plue and Hill knew that plaintiff had purchased the crane, and both were well aware of his rights. This unauthorized sale by the Los Angeles Company was, without doubt, an exercise of dominion over plaintiff's property, in defiance of his rights, an actual conversion. Any act of ownership or exercise of dominion over the property of another, in defiance of his rights, is a conversion of that property. Reynolds v. Shuler, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 323; Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 143, 134 Pac. 1157. And the general rule is that one who sells the property of another, even though he believes he has the right so to do, is liable in trover to the true owner. Swim v. Wilson, 90 Cal. 126, 27 Pac. 33, 13 L. R. A. 605, 25 Am. St. Rep. 110; Clark v. Whiteus (Okla.) 171 Pac. 746; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 702. In this connection, see, also, Green v. Bennett, 23 Mich. 464, and Koon v. Brinkerhoff, 39 Hun (N. Y.) 130. Without doubt, therefore, the defendant Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company, by whom the unauthorized sale to the third party was made through its agent, Plue, was guilty of a conversion of plaintiff's property. Equally certain is it that the other defendant, as an aider and abettor of the Los Angeles Company, participated in this conversion, and that therefore there was a joint conversion by both defendants. As we have seen, Plue, who appears to have been an agent of each of these ice companies, sold the crane after it had been bought and paid for by plaintiff. A truckman, acting for the third party to whom Plue had thus wrongfully sold plaintiff's property, went to San Bernardino, saw Mr. Hill, told the latter that the crane had been sold by Plue, or, at any rate, showed him the bill of sale, and was permitted by Hill to cart it away on his truck. Upon these facts the San Bernardino Company unquestionably was, knowingly, a party to the transaction whereby the crane was sold and shipped away after it had been sold to plaintiff, and therefore was jointly liable with its codefendant for the conversion. Where the conversion is the result of the acts of several persons, which, though separately committed, all tend to the same end, there is a joint conversion. Cram v. Thissell, 35 Me. 86; 38 Cyc. 2055.

[4] No demand was necessary. When sold to him by the San Bernardino Company, the crane became plaintiff's property, and its subsequent unauthorized sale and shipment to another purchaser—the result of the acts of both defendants—was of itself a conversion. The rule is that, where there has been an actual conversion, a demand upon the defendant before the institution of the action of trover is not necessary. For, since demand and refusal do not of themselves constitute conversion, but are only evidence from which conversion in certain cases may be found (Steele v. Mariscano, 102 Cal. 666, 36 Pac. 920), the conversion may be established by proof of other acts on the part of the defendant, such, for instance, as selling and delivering the property to some third person in defiance of the rights of the true owner. May v. O'Neal, 125 Ala. 620, 28 South. 12; Courtis v. Cane, 32 Vt. 232, 76 Am. Dec. 174; Clark v. Whiteus, supra; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 697.

[5] Plaintiff and one of his witnesses, each of whom qualified as an expert on the value of secondhand machinery and equipment, testified that the reasonable market value of the crane was $1,500. The jury assessed plaintiff's damages in the sum of $600—the amount that plaintiff's prospective purchaser at San Francisco had agreed to pay for the crane, but did not because plaintiff was unable to make delivery owing to the acts of conversion on the part of these defendants. The uncontradicted testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses that the crane was reasonably worth $1,500 was sufficient to justify a verdict for at least $600.

[6] In the answer filed by them in this action, defendants allege that the defendant Southern California Ice Company is ready and willing to deliver the crane to plaintiff. Thereafter, namely, on March 13, 1920, which was about three and a half months after the commencement of the action, defendants served upon plaintiff a document containing a copy of the averment in their answer expressing the then willingness of the San Bernardino Company to deliver the crane to plaintiff. Defendants offered this document in evidence during their cross-examination of the plaintiff. The court sustained plaintiff's objection to the offer, and that ruling is now assigned as error. The action is not to recover the crane, but damages for its conversion. As we have shown, these defendants co-operated in the conversion of the crane when the Los Angeles Company wrongfully sold it to a third person after plaintiff had acquired the title and the right to possession by his purchase from the San Bernardino Company. When his property was thus sold and shipped to another in defiance of his rights, plaintiff's right to damages was then and there complete, and no subsequent offer to return could defeat his right of action. No such eleventh-hour repentance could undo the conversion already committed or purge it of its wrongfulness. If authority were needed for so plain a proposition, reference might be had to Reynolds v. Shuler, supra.

[7] The court instructed the jury to the effect that, if both of the defendants were parties to the contract of sale to plaintiff, the fact that one of them did not own the crane would not relieve it from liability to plaintiff. Defendants cannot complain of this instruction. It was more favorable to them than it should have been. In giving it the court evidently proceeded upon the theory that defendants could not be held jointly liable in this action unless it were made to appear that they had jointly made the contract of sale to plaintiff. With plaintiff's title and right of possession established by the sale which it is conceded was made to him by the San Bernardino Company, defendants would be jointly liable if they jointly converted plaintiff's property. That they were guilty of a joint conversion was, as we have shown, established beyond peradventure by the uncontradicted evidence in the case. The giving of this instruction, therefore, was not prejudicial error, even though it may be based upon an erroneous theory respecting the ground for defendants' liability.

[3] Finally, appellants complain of an instruction whereby the jurors were advised as to what is sufficient to constitute a legal demand. Since there was no necessity for any demand, for the reason that defendants' joint participation in the sale and delivery of the crane to the third party was itself an actual joint conversion, appellants' criticism of the instruction does not call for discussion. The judgment is affirmed.

Dismissal of indictment on motion of district attorney under Pen. Code, § 1385, on the ground that another indictment had been returned against defendant under which the district attorney desired to prosecute him under section 1387, before defendant's trial had been begun, and a jury impaneled, held not to bar prosecution under other indictment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

George Rittenhouse was convicted of embezzlement and of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Richard Kittrelle and Paul W. Schenck, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and B. W. Gearhart, Dist. Atty., and Philip Conley, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Fresno, for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is taken from a judgment of conviction of the crime of embezzlement and of the crime of forgery, charged in the third and fourth counts of an indictment against the defendant, which indictment contained five counts. Appellant was found "not guilty" on count 1, and the district attorney, prior to the trial, dismissed as to counts 2 and 5.

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The defendant, Rittenhouse, in July, 1920, was employed as a bookkeeper for the Valley Oil Company, in Fresno, Cal.; among his duties were those of keeping the books of the company and of signing checks of the company, jointly with the president, Edward L. Tobin. The Valley Oil Company kept a checking account in the Bank & Trust Company of Central California in Fresno, which bank, a short time prior to the date of the alleged commission of the crimes herein considered, had changed its name to the Fidelity Trust & Savings Bank. Mr. Tobin, as president of the Valley Oil Company, secured a loan from this bank in the sum of $2,500, and had it deposited in the bank to the credit of the Valley Oil Company. By some mistake occurring during the transfer of the bank's business from the old name to its new name, the bank inadvertently credited the Valley Oil Company with two deposits of $2,500 each. The second deposit was credited on May 12, 1920, the day after the first deposit was credited. The defendant was in a position to become aware of this error and it afforded him an opportunity for embezzlement. It was shown by the bank's ledger sheet that on July 29, 1920, $600 was drawn from the company's account; on the following day the ledger shows that $1,900 was withdrawn, making a total of $2,500, the amount of the duplicate deposit. This amount was checked out without the consent of the president. The company was a small one, and was virtually controlled by its president, Mr. Tobin. All checks required the signatures of Tobin, as president, and of the defendant, as secretary. It appears from the evidence that on some occasions Tobin signed his name as president to certain blank checks to be used in the business. The evidence was conflicting as to whether or not Tobin, as president, had left checks signed in blank which the defendant might have used for securing this $1,900 from the bank. That question was therefore submitted to the jury as to whether or not they believed that the defendant had forged Tobin's name to the $1,900 check or had utilized one of the checks which had been signed in blank by Tobin and intrusted to the defendant for company purposes. The jury determined that the defendant was not guilty of forgery, but found him guilty of embezzlement of $1,900, so that question drops out of this case. True, the prosecution was unable to produce the two checks, one for $600 and the other for $1,900, but the inference from the evidence is very strong, indeed compelling, that the defendant destroyed these checks. The card retained by the bank, which was signed by the person obtaining the canceled checks of the company, was produced. It contained two signatures of "Valley Oil Company," one on July 20, 1920, and one on August 2, 1920. The handwriting expert at the trial identified these signatures as the handwriting of the defendant. When the bank discovered the mistake, and went to check up the matter with the Valley Oil Company, the defendant had left his employment, and was not to be found, and the two checks which would have been evidence against the defendant had also disappeared. In the light of these facts, and of other evidence of defendant's guilt contained in the record, the inference that he secreted or destroyed these checks as a part of his scheme and to avoid detection is not unjustified.

The defendant is connected up with the cashing of the $1,900 check by the following facts: Miss Frances Blair, an employee of the bank, testified that on July 30, 1920, a man purchased from her, in the discharge of her duties, 19 traveler's checks of the denomination of $100 each; that this man signed his name to said checks, as was required at the time of purchase, as "George Rittenhouse," and gave, in payment for the same a check of the Valley Oil Company, bearing the names of Tobin and Rittenhouse, as president and secretary, respectively, for $1,900; that he stated that he needed these traveler's checks to go on a business trip for the company. These checks were cashed in various places, and were countersigned, "George Rittenhouse." The defendant stipulated that such signatures, appearing twice on each of said checks, were signatures of the defendant. We can perceive no gap in the proof. The employee of the bank testified to the purchase of $1,900 of traveler's checks, countersigned by "George Rittenhouse" in her presence. These checks were cashed by the defendant and returned to the bank in the usual course of business, and produced at the trial. It is stipulated that the signatures countersigned thereon are signatures of the defendant. He, then, purchased these checks from the bank, and, according to the testimony of the bank employee, he gave in payment therefor a check of the Valley Oil Company, signed with the names of Tobin and himself. He had no authority to do this, and Tobin testified that he never signed such a check. The defendant appropriated the proceeds of this Valley Oil Company check, which was exchanged for the traveler's checks, to his own use.

[2] It is argued that, as the $2,500 appropriated by the defendant was erroneously credited by the bank to the oil company's account, the oil company has not suffered a loss, and therefore the defendant has not embezzled the money. There is no merit in this contention. Under the facts in evidence, as between the bank and the oil company, the oil company would be liable to return to the bank the amount credited under a mistake, and is liable to the bank therefor. Of course, if it could be proven that the defendant had forged the signature of Tobin, the situation might be otherwise; but, under the finding made here by the jury, there was no forgery, and the oil company is the loser by the amount embezzled, at least so far as any issue in the present case is concerned.

[3] With the reference to the count for forgery, upon which the defendant was found guilty, there was introduced in evidence a check for $70.03, payable to the defendant's order, and signed with the names of Tobin and Rittenhouse, as president and secretary, respectively. Tobin testified that he had not signed this check, and had not authorized his name to be signed thereto and his signature, which is brought before this court in the record on appeal, for comparison with the forged signature, amply bears out this testimony. The handwriting expert declared that the forged signature was in the handwriting of Rittenhouse. Tobin testified that some time after Rittenhouse disappeared he went back to the office of the company at night, and made an entry in the books charging himself with the amount of this check. Appellant relies on this entry as negating an intent to defraud. The charge was not a proper one, nor one that defendant was authorized to make on behalf of the company. As the jury found that the amount was secured on a forged check, the entry which Rittenhouse later made charging himself with the same on the books of the company cannot in any way save the situation as to him. It is unthinkable that a man forging a check and receiving the money thereon should absolve himself from criminal liability by making an unauthorized entry on the books of the company on whose funds the check had been drawn, charging himself with this amount. As well might a burglar leave behind him his note for the amount of his booty.

[4, 5] It is asserted that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence a certain document found in the cell occupied by the defendant while in the county jail at Fresno. After the prisoner had been removed from his cell, the paper was found by the sheriff. The writing is not in the form of a letter, and is not addressed to any one. It is an enumeration of 16 different matters where there is an absence of proof or difficulty connected with proving the elements of the crimes charged against the defendant, which he conceived would work to his advantage. Nothing could be more eloquent of the guilt of the defendant than this expression of his carefully thought out and many-sided scheme for circumventing justice. Among other circumstances advantageous to himself, he enumerates the fact that the prosecution will find the $600 and $1,900 checks missing and that defendant cannot be identified as the man who cashed them. Counsel for defendant offered to prove that this document was intended as a letter to defendant's counsel, and as such was privileged. The rule which appellant invokes is well settled that an attorney of a party cannot be compelled to disclose papers delivered or communications made to him, or letters or entries made by him in that capacity. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) p. 373, § 237. But we find no authority for the extension of the privilege to communications or letters which are intended by the party to be later delivered or communicated to his attorney. We think such an extension of the rule would be against public policy, as, if it were so extended, it would only be necessary for a party to state that any incriminating documents, etc., discovered by third parties or officers of the law were intended for transmission to his attorney in order to tie the hands of the state. This situation comes rather within the reason of the rule that, where a third person, not within the confidential relation, overhears the communications between attorney and client, he may disclose what he hears. State v. Perry, 4 Idaho, 224, 38 Pac. 658, 659; Basye v. State, 45 Neb. 261, 283, 63 N. W. 811; Hoy v. Morris, 13 Gray (Mass.) 519, 74 Am. Dec. 650; Whiting v. Barney et al., 30 N. Y. 330, 86 Am. Dec. 385.

[6] The only other point urged by appellant is that the defendant has been twice put in jeopardy, and that this plea warranted a judgment in his favor in the present action. The claim is based upon the fact that on March 24, 1921, the grand jury of Fresno county returned and filed an amended indictment against the defendant, numbered 4565. At the time this amended indictment was filed, the defendant had not pleaded to the original indictment and he does not complain of this step in the proceedings. However, thereafter, on March 24, 1922, a demurrer to the amended indictment was interposed and overruled, and the defendant pleaded "not guilty" to each and every count of the indictment. The cause was set for trial on June 15, 1921. On June 14, on motion of the district attorney, the trial court dismissed said indictment No. 4565, and the minute entry upon the records of the court recites that—

"The district attorney came into open court and now moves the court for an order dismissing the amended indictment against defendant, George Rittenhouse, No. 4565, on the ground and for the reason that the grand jury of the county of Fresno has found another indictment against the said George Rittenhouse, No. 4645, Department No. 1, upon which indictment the district attorney desires to bring said defendant to trial; whereupon the court now orders that said action be, and is hereby dismissed on the grounds mentioned and in accordance with the motion of the district attorney."

Thereafter, the grand jury filed indictment No. 4645, upon which the defendant was convicted. We see no merit in appellant's position on this point. The action taken by the court was in accordance with section 1385 of the Penal Code. The reason for the dismissal of the indictment is stated in the order. Section 1387, Penal Code, provides that such a dismissal is not a bar to a further prosecution in the case of a felony. But appellant contends that the reason given in the order for the dismissal of the indictment does not indicate that the dismissal was in furtherance of justice. Assuredly it is in the interest of justice to have indictments drawn as carefully and correctly as possible, and in accordance with the facts, so that trials may be conducted regularly and without error. It is perfectly apparent from the record that the district attorney desired to try the defendant upon the last indictment because he considered that it better stated the facts necessary to constitute the offenses charged against the defendant, and more accurately stated the facts which could be shown by the evidence. The defendant refused to put in evidence the entire content of the first amended indictment, but read into the record one count therefrom. The district attorney admitted, and the record confirms the statement, that the count so read from the first amended indictment relates to the same transaction involved in one of the counts in the indictment upon which the defendant was tried; but the facts regarding such transaction are stated in the two indictments in different ways so as to charge different offenses, and the other counts of the two indictments, according to the statement of the district attorney, which is all that is before us, vary in statement of facts and in the offenses charged thereby. Under these circumstances, we consider it desirable and in furtherance of justice that the first indictment against the defendant be dismissed after it became apparent to the district attorney that one more in accordance with the facts could be filed. No possible prejudice could result to the defendant from this procedure under the circumstances of this case. Furthermore, defendant was not twice in jeopardy, as his trial had not begun, and no jury had been impaneled at the time the first amended indictment against him was dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a charge of assault with intent to commit rape.

3. Witnesses §283 — Objection to further cross-examination of prosecutrix after prosecution rested and defendant had introduced his evidence properly sustained.

Where defendant, after the prosecution rested, introduced all his evidence, and then recalled prosecutrix for further cross-examination, the court properly sustained an objection, though defendant, on excusing the witness following her cross-examination had stated that he reserved the right to recall her, where he re-cross-examined her after the prosecution had re-examined.

4. Criminal law §714—Reading to jury witness' testimony at preliminary examination held proper.

Where counsel for defendant, to discredit prosecutrix's testimony, called her attention to inconsistent testimony at the preliminary examination, whereupon the district attorney questioned her as to other parts of such testimony tending to qualify that read by defendant's counsel so as to make it consistent with her testimony on the stand, his reading of some of the former testimony to which the witness' attention had been directed in his argument to the jury was proper.

5. Rape §42—Exclusion of evidence as to defendant's reputation for peace and quietude held not error.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, the court's rulings sustaining objections to questions as to defendant's reputation for peace and quietude, but allowing those as to his reputation for morality and as a law-abiding citizen, were not erroneous.

6. Criminal law §678(3)—Prosecution held not to have relied on proof of earlier of two assaults.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, where evidence of a prior technical assault during the same day was not offered to prove commission of the crime charged, but to show relations between the parties and defendant's intent, contention that the prosecution must be deemed to have relied for conviction on evidence of the first assault where it did not elect between the two held without merit.

7. Criminal law §829(3)—Refusal of instructions fairly covered by those given not erroneous.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, where the court fairly instructed the jury on law relating to elements of the offense contained in defendant's proposed instructions, though not always in language so favorable to him, it did not err in refusing such instructions.

8. Criminal law §1144(15)—Court's reply to juror's question that defendant was being tried, not for rape, but for attempt, presumed proper.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, where the court instructed that an assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability to commit, the court's use of the word "attempt" in answer to a juror's question as to whether they were not trying defendant for attempt to commit rape, that such was the charge, "not rape, but attempt," must be presumed to have referred to the attempt mentioned in the instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Horace Miller was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Jennings and James L. Crittenden, both of Modesto, and J. M. Frame, of Reno, Nev., for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was charged with assault with intent to commit rape, and a prior conviction of the crime of rape. He admitted the prior conviction, but entered a plea of not guilty to the crime charged. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

At the time of the alleged offense the prosecutrix was 22 years of age, married, and the mother of one child. She was then visiting at the home of her mother in Modesto, her husband being elsewhere at the time. In the afternoon of November 11, 1920, she went riding with the defendant in his automobile. On this trip the defendant turned off the main highway into a "little road," stopped his machine, put his arms around the prosecutrix, and proposed sexual intercourse, but she refused, and protested against his conduct. He told her that he was sorry for his conduct, that he only did it to "find out what kind of a girl she really was," and asked her forgiveness. After much protestation on his part, she finally said she would forgive him. Certain witnesses for the defendant testified to having seen the parties at the place mentioned, sitting in the machine with their arms around each other. This testimony furnishes the only contradiction of the prosecutrix, the defendant declining to take the stand.

On their return to the mother's home they found no one there, and the house was locked. After searching unsuccessfully for the door key they drove about in search for some member of the family, but, finding no one, the defendant proposed that they go to a restaurant for dinner. At first the prosecutrix objected, but, upon the defendant's assurance that he desired to show her what kind of a man he really could be, she accompanied him. At the table he "grabbed" her hands twice, and she "pulled" them away. This conduct on his part made her so nervous that she did not eat anything. On leaving the restaurant she said she would walk home. He argued that she would be foolish to do so, and asked what her mother would think to see her come into the house alone after being out with him. It was raining at the time, and she finally agreed to let him take her home.

On leaving the restaurant the defendant took the road towards Empire. The prosecutrix remonstrated, and the defendant said: "I am going to take you out for a ride, and love you up a little bit." She replied, "No, you are not," and "started to open the door," but the side curtains being up made it difficult for her to do so. He "grabbed" her with such force as to tear two buttons off her coat, and speeded up the machine, and she commenced to cry. About two miles out the defendant turned off the highway, and stopped the machine at some gum trees about two blocks distant from the main road. There he "grabbed" her, drew her to him, and kissed her several times. She broke away from his embrace, and shoved him. He tried to get out from under the steering wheel, but she prevented him. He then repeatedly called her profane and vile names, and several times told her she had "got" to have intercourse with him. She said: "You have got to kill me first. * * * I want to die first." He replied: "Well, die or no die, you have got to do it." He unbuttoned his trousers, forced her hand upon his private parts, and placed his other hand on her private parts, and continued to call her vile names, and tell her she "had to do it." Finally, in an effort to get away from him, she promised to accede to his demands if he would let her out to answer a call of nature. He then allowed her to get out, but followed her and stood by her while outside. They then observed the lights of an automobile moving along the highway, and she said: "Oh, my God, look what you have done; look what the people will think." He, evidently to avoid being seen, "jumped" into his machine. The automobile on the highway passed on, and the defendant said: "Come on in. * * * If I keep you out here until 6 o'clock to-morrow morning, you have got to do it." The prosecutrix then saw the lights of another machine, and noticed the defendant's foot as if he were getting out. She thereupon ran towards the highway, the defendant following for a certain distance, and then turning back. The machine did not stop, but another approached, traveling from Modesto towards Empire, and the prosecutrix ran in front of it, screaming and waving her hands. This machine stopped and took her to Empire. The defendant followed in his own machine. The driver of the machine which picked up the prosecutrix testified that she appeared to be very much frightened and that he was compelled to swerve to one side to avoid striking her with his machine. Another witness testified that at Empire the defendant's trousers were still unbuttoned, "all the buttons opened here in front." Except as otherwise stated, the foregoing testimony was all given by the prosecutrix. It is wholly uncontradicted, except as stated, and is corroborated as to the circumstances attending her flight and escape from the defendant. It is set forth more fully than would otherwise be necessary because of appellant's insistence that it is insufficient to support the verdict.

[1] Appellant points out circumstances tending, as he claims, to discredit the prosecutrix, but there is nothing therein which would warrant an appellate court in disturbing the jury's determination that her testimony is worthy of credence. The credibility of witnesses is peculiarly within the province of the jury.

[2] The assault was not merely technical, as contended by the appellant, but was forcible and continuous from the moment the prosecutrix endeavored to leave the machine at Modesto until she finally made her escape. The jury was justified in believing that her resistance was equally continuous, and as effective as she was capable of making. The conduct and language of the defendant afford ample proof of intent. From a careful examination of all the evidence, there can be no doubt of its sufficiency to sustain the charge. The case of People v. Norrington (Cal. App.) 202 Pac. 932, is so directly in point and so well supported by reason and authority that no other citation is deemed necessary on the question under discussion.

[3] At the close of the direct examination of the complaining witness, counsel for defendant examined her at length, and then excused her, saying: "We are reserving the right to recall her for further cross-examination." The prosecution then re-examined, and the defendant recross-examined the witness. The prosecution then put on other witnesses, and rested. The defendant thereafter introduced all of his evidence, examining eight witnesses, and then recalled the prosecutrix for further cross-examination. The prosecution objected to any further cross-examination on the ground that it should have been conducted not later than the close of the plaintiff's case, and the court sustained the objection. Manifestly the ruling was not error.

[4] Counsel for defendant endeavored to discredit the prosecutrix by calling her attention to parts of her testimony given at the preliminary examination, claimed to be inconsistent with that given by her at the trial. The district attorney then, over defendant's objection, questioned her as to other parts of such former testimony tending to qualify that read by counsel for defendant, and make it consistent with that given by her on the stand. In an effort to show that there was no inconsistency, the district attorney, in his argument to the jury, read some of the former testimony to which the attention of the witness had been directed while on the stand. This was entirely proper.

[5] The defendant called several witnesses to prove his good character. The court sustained objections to questions relating to defendant's reputation for "peace and quietude," but allowed those bearing on his general reputation for "morality" and as a "law-abiding citizen." These rulings were not prejudicial. Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 59 to 62, and cases cited; Wistrand v. People, 218 Ill. 323, 75 N. E. 891; State v. Brady, 71 N. J. Law, 360, 59 Atl. 6; State v. Shultz, 177 Iowa, 321, 158 N. W. 539. Several other rulings on minor matters relating to the admission of evidence are assigned as errors, but it is sufficient to say that there is no merit in any of them.

[6] Appellant contends that the prosecution should have elected, not later than the commencement of the trial, between the assault of the afternoon and that of the evening, and that, having failed to do so, and having first introduced evidence tending to prove the former, "the prosecution is deemed to have relied on such first offense proven for conviction," and that it constituted only a "technical" assault. It is apparent from the record that evidence of the occurrences during the afternoon was not offered to prove the commission of the crime at that time, but to show the relations between the parties and the conduct of the defendant as bearing upon the intent with which he committed the later assault. The case is wholly unlike that of People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323, relied upon by appellant, where many distinct crimes of rape were proved, covering a period of four months. In that case the court said:

"A verdict of guilty could have been rendered * * * although no two jurors were convinced * * * of the truth of the charge, as to any one of these separate offenses."

In the instant case, on the evidence presented neither the jury nor the defendant could have believed that he was being tried for the acts committed in the afternoon. It may be further stated that the opening statement of the district attorney clearly indicated that the assault made in the evening was the one upon which a conviction would be asked.

[7] There is no doubt as to the correctness of the instructions given by the court, but appellant complains of the court's refusal to give certain instructions proposed by defendant. The defendant requested the court to give 28 instructions, ranging in length from a few lines to about four folios. Of these the court gave 7 and refused 21, all but 2 of the 21 being refused on the ground that they were "given elsewhere in effect." The propositions of law contained in the proposed instructions which appellant contends should have been given are as follows: (No. 3) That the words "willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, violently, and forcibly" are not mere idle words of form, but material allegations which must be proved. (6) That it is not sufficient to prove an intent to accomplish the act by persuasion, but an actual attempt by force and violence against the will and without the consent of prosecutrix must be shown. (9) That the use of actual force must be proved. (10) That the act must be accomplished against the resistance of prosecutrix. (13) That a mere technical assault is not sufficient. (15) That both the assault and intent must be proved, and some overt act must be shown. (18) That voluntary submission, though reluctantly given, is a defense. (19) That verbal resistance is not sufficient. (21) That want of consent must be actual, and not merely technical. (22) That resistance must be by acts, and not a mere pretense, and reasonably proportionate to strength and opportunity, and must persist until offense is consummated. (24) That if consent was given at any time prior to the commission of the act, though reluctantly, the verdict should be not guilty. Proposed instruction No. 23 is so clearly argumentative as to merit no discussion.

The court instructed the jury that the prosecution must prove all the material allegations of the information beyond a reasonable doubt; that if the defendant "willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, violently, and forcibly" committed the act "with the intent then and there feloniously, and by force and violence, to carnally know and ravish" the prosecutrix, "and accomplish with her an act of sexual intercourse, against her will and without her consent," then the verdict should be guilty; that "rape is an act of sexual intercourse, accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, * * * where she resists, but her resistance is overcome by force and violence"; that the act must have been committed "with the felonious intent then and there to carnally know and ravish" the prosecutrix, "and accomplish with her an act of sexual intercourse, against her will and without her consent"; that proof of threats are not sufficient to constitute an assault; that if "she failed as a matter of fact to oppose the commission of the offense charged, then you may consider such lack of opposition * * * as consent upon her part to the commission of said offense, and, if you so find such consent to so have been given, then one of the essential elements of the crime charged is lacking, and you must return a verdict of not guilty"; that general statements of the prosecutrix that "she did her utmost, and the like, will not be sufficient to establish the fact of resistance, but she must relate the acts done in order that the jury may judge whether any were omitted." Certain other instructions given are hereinafter set out. It thus appears that the court fairly instructed the jury on all propositions of law contained in the proposed instructions which were refused, though not always in language so favorable to the defendant as in those refused.

[8] After deliberating for a time, the jury returned into court and asked that certain instructions be read to them. After several instructions had been read a juror asked: "If the defendant had threatened the complaining witness to do bodily harm, is that the force?" The court replied: "I instructed you there in one place mere threats was not sufficient." Some suggestion was made as to the necessity of proving penetration, and a juror asked: "We are trying this man, are we not, on an attempt to commit rape?" The court replied: "Yes, that is the charge; not rape, but attempt." A few moments before making the answer of which complaint is made, the court had reread to the jury defendant's instruction number 2, as follows:

"An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another. There are three essential elements necessary to constitute an assault, to wit: First. In assault the intent must be to commit a violent injury on the person of another. Second. A present ability to do so. Third. The actual attempt to accomplish such injury. The intent to commit a violent injury on the person of another is necessary to constitute an assault in all cases, and this intent is always a question of fact, to be proved, but it may be inferred, however, from the circumstances of the assault, if an assault has been proved."

It must be presumed that, in the answer given, the court referred to the "attempt" so used in the instruction, and that the jury so understood. The attorneys for both sides must also have so understood; otherwise, in fairness to the court, they would have called attention to the alleged error. The court gave no instruction relative to the crime of attempt to commit rape. Immediately prior to answering the juror's question the court had reread defendant's instruction No. 14, as follows:

"Before you can convict the defendant of the crime charged by the complaint, you must find beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that, not only was an assault committed by the defendant upon the person of the prosecutrix, but also that the defendant at the time of said assault intended to gratify his passion on the person of the prosecutrix, and that he intended to do so, in all events, notwithstanding any resistance on her part; and if you do not so find, then you must acquit the defendant of the crime charged."

From the juror's question and the court's answer it is apparent that the object of both was to make it clear that the defendant was not on trial for a consummated rape, not that the jury might convict of attempt to commit rape. Under such circumstances it is highly improbable that any juror was misled by the answer. The fact that the verdict was "Guilty of assault with intent to commit rape, as charged in the information," indicates that the jury was not so misled.

An examination of the whole case, including the evidence, not only fails to show a miscarriage of justice, but, giving credence to the testimony of the prosecutrix, there is no basis for a contrary verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

56 Cal. App. 572

PEOPLE v. AHERN et al. (Cr. 591.)(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 21, 1922.)1. Larceny §55 — Evidence held to prove identity of defendants as persons who stole mare.

In prosecution for larceny of a mare, in which defendants denied being the persons who stole the mare, evidence held to sustain conviction.

2. Larceny §57—Evidence held to prove intent to steal mare.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for larceny of a mare, as against contention that defendants did not intend to steal the mare, but merely took her for a joy ride with the intent to return her.

3 Criminal law §1168(4)—Refusal to strike out testimony held harmless in view of other evidence.

In prosecution for larceny of a mare, involving the issue of the identity of the defendants as the persons who stole the mare, refusal to strike out testimony as to their identity on the admission of the witness that he had not recognized the defendants, but had obtained his information from others, held harmless, in view of testimony of other witnesses, conclusively proving defendants' identity.

4 Criminal law §404(1)—Evidence held sufficient to connect revolver admitted in evidence with that used by defendant.

In prosecution for larceny of a mare, in which a witness testified that, on discovery of one of the defendants in possession of the mare, the defendant had threatened witness with a revolver, testimony of other witness that she had seen the defendant drop something, and in searching therefor had found the cylinder of a revolver and several cartridges, and that later a revolver without a cylinder was found near the same spot, held sufficient foundation for the admission of such revolver cylinder and cartridges in evidence; the objection thereto going to its weight, and not its admissibility.

5. Criminal law §1186(4)—Admission of evidence harmless, in view of testimony proving defendant guilty.

In prosecution for larceny of a mare, the admission of a revolver and cartridges, if erroneous because of the insufficiency of evidence, was harmless, where there was ample, competent proof that defendants stole the mare, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversal for technical error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

William J. Ahern and Melvin Major were convicted of larceny, and from the judgment of conviction and from the order refusing to grant their motion for new trial, they appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

John A. Wall, of Mariposa, for appellants.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants were charged by information filed in the superior court of the county of Merced with the larceny of a "sorrel mare," alleged to be the property of one David Saling, and upon a trial upon said charge were convicted. They appeal from the judgment and the order refusing to grant their motion for a new trial.

They object to the verdict on these general grounds: That the verdict is against law and against the evidence, and that the court committed prejudicial error in the allowance, over their objection, of certain evidence.

Both defendants were, at the time of the commission of the crime charged, convicts on parole, and were employed as laborers on what is known as the "Holland Farm," in Merced county, the property of Miller & Lux.

David Saling, owner of the alleged stolen animal, resided with his father and mother on a farm about a mile and a half from the town of Dos Palos, in Merced county. The evidence introduced by the people disclosed that the alleged larceny was committed under the following circumstances: On Sunday, July 10, 1921, in the middle of the afternoon of said day, one Charles Griffin, who was then stopping at the home of the Salings, desiring to go to Dos Palos, borrowed the sorrel mare referred to from said David Saling to ride to said town. Thus proceeding to Dos Palos, he reached that town about 3 o'clock p. m., dismounted and hitched the mare to a hitching rack on the main street of said town. Just as he was engaged in doing this act, he saw the two defendants, in a cart, drawn by a single horse, passing along the street. After hitching the mare as indicated he went into a pool room and remained therein for some 10 or 15 minutes, when he stepped to the door and looked out and down towards the place where he had hitched the animal and observed that she was missing. He immediately started an investigation and, looking towards the west, he saw a man riding the mare. This man proceeded a short distance until he came to another road leading in a westerly direction and there joined the defendant Major, who was still in the cart. Griffin started after the two men, and the defendants observing that they were being pursued, started the horses in a rapid gait and went towards the west; the two horses, the mare ridden by Ahern, and the horse hitched to the cart and driven by Major, being then abreast. After going a short distance they turned to the south on a road which leads to the home of the Salings. Henry Saling, father of David Saling, and Mrs. Saling, the mother of David, were sitting on the front porch of their home, from which they could see the road on which the defendants were traveling. David Saling and a young lady were out in the yard engaged in conversation. The mother of David, being attracted to the lively gait at which the horses were traveling towards their place, recognized the sorrel mare of her son and she thereupon called his attention to the fact that some one was riding his mare. David Saling immediately started towards the road, at about which time the horses reached the entrance to the Saling premises and the sorrel mare lessened her gait and attempted to go into the yard, the defendant Ahern, who was riding the mare, reining her into a different direction, not, however, until young Saling stated to him that the mare belonged to him, and attempted to take hold of the bridle. Upon this statement and act by David, Ahern drew a revolver, cautioned young Saling not to come near him, and threatened that if he did he "would blow his (Saling's) head off." The defendant then proceeded on his way, riding the mare. Young Saling immediately procured and mounted another horse, and followed Ahern to South Dos Palos, in which direction Ahern was traveling, and made a search for the animal. He finally saw one of the defendants standing in a planing mill in South Dos Palos, and, approaching him, asked where his mare was. The defendant stated that he knew nothing at all about his mare. Making a further search, Saling saw the mare standing inside the planing mill, and approximately at the same time the defendants opened a door to the mill and again started out on the road; Major driving the cart and Ahern riding the mare, going at a rapid gait. They went out side by side on the road leading to a place called Ora Loma, and after they had gone about half a mile Ahern rode out into a field, and Major went on toward the canals in a different direction. Young Saling then returned to South Dos Palos to obtain assistance. He started back with some men who had consented to help him in securing possession of his mare and when about a half a mile out they saw Major driving the horse and cart, traveling towards them. They asked Major what had become of the man who was riding the mare, and he said he "did not know anything about it." Proceeding a little farther, Saling observed Ahern riding the mare through the field. They then started after him, and Ahern, apparently observing them, rode the mare to the headgate of one of the canals and into the canal, evidently intending to cross the ditch at that point. The water, however, was running over the headgate, and after the mare got into the canal and he saw Saling and his companions closing in upon him he left the animal in the canal, and proceeded to crawl along the ditch as if to prevent being seen. Young Saling, assisted by the men who accompanied him, got the mare out of the ditch, and thereafter caused the defendants to be arrested and charged with the crime of which they stand convicted.

It should be added to the above statement of the facts that at the time Ahern drew his weapon and threatened to take the life of David Saling the young lady who was at the Saling home saw something drop from the former's hand to the ground. After the defendant started on his way from the Saling place, the young lady referred to went out to the spot where Ahern was at the time he drew his weapon, and made a search for the object which she had seen drop, and found the cylinder of a revolver and several cartridges. Later a revolver without a cylinder was found near the same spot.

The story of the defendants was, in substance, that they went to Dos Palos on the day above mentioned in a cart drawn by a horse which they had borrowed from the superintendent of the farm on which they were working; that at said place they stopped, bought some tobacco, took a number of drinks of liquor and then returned to the farm. They denied having taken the mare of David Saling, and positively declared that they knew nothing whatever about the mare or about any horse of any kind having been taken by anybody that day. Ahern added, however, that if he did take the mare it was not with any intention of stealing her. He further stated that he had no revolver in his possession that day, and that he made no threat against young Saling. They also testified that young Saling, a few days after the alleged taking of his mare under the circumstances above indicated, approached them with the proposition that he would not pursue their prosecution for the theft if they would pay him $15 for the damages which he claimed to have sustained by reason of the taking of his animal.

The contention that the verdict is against law is not pressed by the defendants, or, at any rate, there is no complaint made by them against the charge of the court to the jury or any portion thereof.

[1, 2] As to the contention that the verdict is against the evidence, it is only necessary to refer to the above recital of the facts as they were brought out by the evidence, to show that the point is not well taken. David Saling's testimony from which said facts are taken was corroborated in all vital particulars by the testimony of his father, his mother, and the young lady referred to above and some other witnesses. It is, however, with apparent earnestness insisted by the counsel for the defendants that, viewing the circumstances of the case as a whole, it is clear that the defendants had no intention of stealing the animal, but that they took her as indicated for no other purpose than to have a little sport—a sort of "joy ride" we may suppose. In support of his position as to the effect of the evidence as thus stated counsel cites the case of People v. Brown, 105 Cal. 69, 38 Pac. 519, in which a boy was charged with the crime of burglary, in that he entered a building and took a bicycle therefrom, and in his defense stated that he took it only to get even with the boy who owned it, there having been previously some quarrel or misunderstanding between the two, and that he had no intention of keeping the bicycle, but intended to return it within a few hours. The trial court instructed the jury that, even if it were true that a party should take property under the circumstances as disclosed by the boy's testimony in that case—that is, with the intention only of temporarily retaining it or of not permanently depriving the owner thereof—he would, nevertheless, be guilty of larceny. The case was reversed for the giving of that instruction, the Supreme Court declaring that it not only involved an erroneous statement of the law, but, since the hypothetical case stated therein squared exactly with the facts as they were testified to by the boy, it impinged upon the province of the jury; that is, that it involved an instruction upon a question of fact. The court further said that—

“The authorities form an unbroken line to the effect that the felonious intent must be to deprive the owner of the property permanently.”

It is, of course, plainly manifest that the above case is no authority here. The point made by counsel does not involve the giving of an instruction. It simply involves the claim that the evidence does not show a criminal intent, but it is very clear that that question has been foreclosed by the verdict of the jury. It was for them to determine, from all the circumstances of the case whether the act of the defendants in taking the mare was or was not with a criminal intent or an intent to steal the animal, and it is equally clear that this court cannot say that the determination of the jury upon that question is not correct.

[3] The defendants assign two errors in the ruling of the court with respect to the evidence. The first objection in this particular involves the action of the court in refusing to strike out certain portions of the testimony of the witness Charles Griffin. This witness, after testifying on direct examination that he recognized the defendants as the parties who were driving down the road, the one riding upon the mare and the other riding in the cart, as above described, admitted on cross-examination that he did not at that time recognize the defendants as the men, but obtained from other persons the information that they were the men who took the mare away. The counsel for the defendants thereupon moved to strike the testimony from the record. The court denied the motion. This was error, inasmuch as it developed on cross-examination that the testimony of the witness on direct examination that he recognized the defendants at the time referred to was pure hearsay, and, consequently incompetent; but four or five other witnesses identified the defendants as being the persons who had possession of the mare, and that Ahern was riding her, and thus the evidence appears to be conclusive of the fact that the defendants were the persons who took the mare from the town of Dos Palos and to the place on the Holland Farm where she was found, and conclusive of the guilt of the defendants. It is therefore clear that no miscarriage of justice resulted from the erroneous ruling.

[4, 5] The second assignment against the rulings is based upon the action of the court in admitting in evidence, over protest by the defendant, the revolver, the cylinder, and the cartridges. The ground of the objection at the trial was and here is that those articles were not properly or in any way connected with the defendants or their conduct at the time that they were accosted by David Saling, and by him told that the mare was his property. It is true that Ahern testified that he had no revolver in his possession on that occasion, and that he was not in the habit of carrying a weapon, but, notwithstanding this testimony, we think that, considering the circumstance that the articles were found near the place and time where and when the alleged threat was made and the further circumstance that some article was seen by one of the witnesses to drop from the hand of the defendant at that time and place, the testimony was admissible for what it was worth, and that consequently the objection thereto goes more to its weight than to its competency. It may also be suggested that the evidence regarding the revolver, etc., or even that of the threat, while important in that it might tend in some measure to show that the taking of the mare was with a criminal intent, was not indispensable to the justification of a verdict of guilty of the crime charged in the information, and that, even if erroneous, in view of the fact that there is ample competent proof of guilt, the ruling allowing said evidence is without prejudice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

We have found no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and the order are therefore affirmed.

1. Evidence ⇨242(4) — Communications between plaintiff and brokers with whom defendant dealt as plaintiff's agent are inadmissible.

In an action for goods sold to defendants, who dealt only with a broker and not with plaintiff directly, correspondence between plaintiff and the broker, not shown to have been communicated to defendants, is inadmissible against them, notwithstanding plaintiff's claim the broker was defendants' agent.

2. Sales ⇨202(6) — Bill of lading to seller's order attached to draft evidences intention to retain title until payment.

The fact that the seller took bill of lading to his order and sent it with draft attached to a bank with instructions to deliver to the buyer on payment of the draft, clearly evidences an intention by the seller to reserve title and possession until payment of the draft.

3. Sales ⇨202(1) — Title does not pass on cash sale until payment.

When the terms of the sale are cash, title does not pass until payment of the price.

4. Sales ⇨197 — Risk of loss is on title holder.

In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the risk of loss during shipment of the goods sold is assumed by the party having the title.

5. Sales ⇨82(2) — Delivery and payment deemed concurrent in absence of agreement.

Where the contract of sale specified no time of payment, delivery of the goods and payment of the price are deemed to be concurrent acts.

6. Principal and agent ⇨169(2) — Delivery of goods with knowledge of terms of unauthorized contract adopts contract.

Though a seller was not bound by the terms of a contract which its agent was not authorized to make, it adopted the unauthorized contract by delivering the goods to the buyer, with full knowledge of all the circumstances, and must take the contract subject to its burdens as well as its benefits.

7. Sales ⇨445(1) — Evidence held to warrant submitting to jury whether sale was by sample.

Evidence that the broker, through whom nuts were sold to defendants, wrote a letter to defendants stating that the nuts ran better than the sample submitted, with testimony by plaintiff's agent that they submitted a sample with negotiations for the entire lot, warranted submitting to the jury the question whether plaintiff recognized the agreement was one for sale by sample.

8. Sales ⇨288(5) — Buyer by sample can inspect to ascertain conformity to sample.

Under Civ. Code, § 1766, making a sale by sample a warranty, the bulk was equal to the sample, and section 1785, giving the buyer on a sale with warranty the right to inspect, a buyer of goods sold by sample was entitled to an opportunity to inspect the goods to ascertain whether they conformed to sample before he was obliged to pay for them.

9. Sales ⇨288(5) — Buyer can remove for inspection which is impossible at railroad station.

A buyer of nuts by sample can remove the shipment from the carrier, without waiving his right to inspect to ascertain conformity to sample, where the evidence sustains a finding that the inspection was impossible at the railroad station.

10. Sales ⇨177 — Buyer can reject goods if there was no meeting of the minds as to terms of the contract.

Where the sale of goods was through brokers and the minds of the parties never met as to the terms of the sale, so that there was no contract, the buyer was at liberty to reject the goods when delivered, if he acted promptly.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Puritas Coffee & Tea Company against L. De Martini and another, co-partners doing business under the firm name of the L. De Martini Supply Company, to recover damages for breach of contract and for goods sold. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, following verdict in favor of defendants in this action to recover the purchase price of shelled walnuts.

The complaint alleged that, on January 15, 1919, plaintiff contracted to sell to defendants, and defendants contracted to purchase of plaintiff, 5,507 pounds of broken pieces of walnut meats and 5,002 pounds halves of walnut meats, then owned and in the possession of plaintiff, at Los Angeles, at a price of 40 cents per pound, or a total of $4,203.60, f. o. b. Los Angeles, and plaintiff agreed to make delivery thereof to defendants by loading the same on board the cars at Los Angeles, consigned by rail to defendants at San Francisco, payment of the whole of the purchase price to be made upon presentation of sight draft therefor to defendants at San Francisco; that defendants refused to accept or pay the draft when presented, but agreed on or about said date that, if plaintiff would deliver to defendants the bill of lading so that defendants might obtain delivery of said shipment, defendants would immediately upon the arrival of the car pay the purchase price to plaintiff; that the car arrived and the goods were accepted and received by defendants, but that they refused to pay the purchase price or any part thereof. The complaint contained a second count that, on or about January 21, 1919, defendants became indebted to plaintiff for goods, wares, and merchandise purchased from plaintiff of the reasonable value of $4,203.60. Defendants' answer admitted the making of the contract, on January 15, 1919, for the quantity and at the price alleged in the complaint, but denied that the payment of the whole or any part of the purchase price of the walnuts was to be made upon presentation of sight draft, or any draft therefor, and also denied that plaintiff made delivery to them of the walnut meats on board cars at Los Angeles, consigned to defendants at San Francisco, and also denied the allegations of the second count, above referred to. They set up, by way of defense, that they had refused to accept or pay for the walnuts because (1) the goods were sold by sample and the walnut meats shipped were not in accordance with the sample, but were different from and inferior thereto; (2) that the walnuts which defendants agreed to buy were to be sweet and merchantable, but that the walnuts shipped were bitter and unmerchantable; and (3) that they were rancid and wormy and unfit for human consumption.

[1] There was no formal contract and the difference between the parties regarding its terms is due to the fact that defendants' negotiations for the purchase of these nuts were all had with one Ranniger, a broker in San Francisco, whose authority to represent it plaintiff repudiates. Ranniger was not a witness in the action, being out of the country at the time of the trial. It was admitted, however, that neither plaintiff, plaintiff's Los Angeles brokers, nor the latter's San Francisco correspondent, had directly communicated with defendants or had any negotiations whatever with them. Consequently all evidence relating to conversations or communications passing between these parties and between plaintiff's San Francisco representative and Ranniger, with whom plaintiff claims the latter dealt as defendants' representative, and all instructions to them, which it was not shown were communicated to defendants, were properly excluded. On the other hand, defendants were permitted to show their agreement with Ranniger. L. De Martini, the partner who conducted this transaction for defendants, insisted on the trial that Ranniger was not defendants' agent, and there was no evidence tending to prove any such relation. It was indisputably shown that defendants dealt with Ranniger and with no one else, in negotiating for and ordering these goods, and that thereafter plaintiffs shipped the walnuts to them. L. De Martini also testified that all his negotiations with Ranniger were oral and that he never submitted to Ranniger any offer or statement in writing concerning any transaction, and Ranniger never submitted to him any writing, either correspondence or otherwise, in connection with any of these transactions. Ranniger, being the only person with whom defendants made any agreement regarding the nuts in suit, they were entitled to show this. While plaintiff could not be bound by an unauthorized agreement without a subsequent ratification, neither could plaintiff impose upon defendants terms to which they had not consented. L. De Martini testified that, about the 1st of November, 1918, Ranniger solicited him for an order for walnut meats; that he stated he was representing somebody in the south, but did not mention the name, and produced two samples, halves and pieces, which were white, sound, sweet, merchantable walnut meats; that he said they were from the new crop, that there was no more old crop; that he (De Martini) then requested Ranniger to send a sample of about 100 pounds of each, halves and pieces, stating, "if they are the same as the sample I will take the lot"; that Ranniger consented, and, on December 24, 1918, plaintiff shipped this order to defendants at 60 cents for halves and 58 cents for pieces, sending their invoice for same; that these were sweet, sound, merchantable nuts; that, on account of a delay in shipment, it was then too late to get the balance for use for the holiday trade; that defendants, therefore, on December 31, 1918, sent check direct to plaintiffs covering the December 24th invoice, with a letter stating:

"Please do not ship any more, as we cannot use them. The best we could have used them near the price you are asking, was before the holidays, and that trade is giving to other commodities, as all commodities are dropping pretty fast. If you have a better offer to make for the lot, let us know."

This was the only direct communication with plaintiff, or any one else other than Ranniger, and L. De Martini testified he later agreed with Ranniger upon 40 cents a pound, and that Ranniger told him the nuts were new, sweet, sound, and merchantable.

On January 21, 1919, plaintiff shipped the nuts, the price of which is the subject of this action. The goods were consigned to the order of plaintiff at San Francisco, with instructions in the bill of lading to "notify L. De Martini Co." Plaintiff indorsed the bill of lading in blank and forwarded it, with sight draft attached, to a San Francisco bank, with instructions to deliver to defendants upon payment of draft. Defendants refused to pay the draft, stating to the bank that they had never agreed to pay a draft and that they wished to inspect the goods before paying for them. It then became evident that there was a misunderstanding regarding the terms of the contract. Plaintiff's brokers in Los Angeles, on January 25, 1919, wrote to defendants, urging them to pay the draft, stating that they had confirmed the order mentioning that the terms were "sight draft with B/L attached, payable on presentation." The evidence, however, was that these terms were never communicated to or accepted by defendants. February 4, 1919, defendants replied:

"* * * In reference to the walnut meats there is no misunderstanding. We are prepared to take the walnut meats but not against sight draft. * * *"

Other matter followed relating to their prejudice against drafts, and the names of certain business people were mentioned to be used for references regarding their financial responsibility, but nothing was said about inspection, and the letter concluded:

"Now it is an option to yourself, whether you want to ship or not. We will pay for same as soon as we receive them."

Upon receipt of that letter and, as plaintiff's president, Mr. Glascock, testified, in reliance upon this promise of payment upon receipt of the goods, plaintiff authorized the release of the bill of lading without payment of the draft. Defendants had them taken from the railroad company's possession about February 14, 1919, to their place of business, as L. De Martini testified, for examination, because there were not the facilities at the former place for opening and properly examining a shipment of this kind. Upon inspection they found them to be unmerchantable, many of them being decayed and wormy and full of weevil. It is admitted that they were cold storage nuts from the old crop. Defendants promptly notified plaintiff that, because of their condition, they would not accept the nuts and asked for instructions regarding their disposition. Plaintiff disclaimed ownership and declined to give any instructions regarding their disposition. They remained in defendants' possession, where they were examined and quarantined a few weeks later by the pure food inspector and thereafter condemned and destroyed. Both parties insist that it was not intended, by releasing the bill of lading without payment of the draft, to extend credit, but was understood and agreed at that time that the terms were to be cash, payment to be made upon defendants' receipt of the goods, although to support a directly opposite position, plaintiff also argues that the sale was on credit.

Appellant raises no point on appeal regarding the condition of the nuts, in view of the verdict and the state of the evidence, but assumes that a substantial part of them were in bad condition when received at defendants' place of business. The question here is whether defendants were entitled to reject the walnuts or, as plaintiff asserts, were liable for the price regardless of their damaged condition. On the trial, appellant's theory of the case was that the goods were sold to the defendants f. o. b. cars at Los Angeles, examination and inspection there; that the title passed to the defendants at the time the goods were loaded on the cars; that all risks of deterioration in transit were assumed by the purchaser; that they were to pay for these goods upon presentation of sight draft without awaiting the arrival of the goods; and that they had waived the right of inspection. The theory that delivery to defendants was accomplished by loading on the cars at Los Angeles and that, at that point of time, title passed to defendants, they then assuming all risk of deterioration in transit, has been practically abandoned by plaintiff on appeal. Plaintiff also concedes defendants' claim that they never agreed to examine and accept the goods at Los Angeles. There was an entire failure of proof to establish this theory.

[2-4] On the contrary, the fact that the bill of lading was made to the order of plaintiff, with instructions to notify defendants, and that it was forwarded with sight draft attached to a San Francisco bank authorized to deliver to defendants only upon payment of the draft, clearly evidenced an intention on the part of plaintiff to reserve title and possession until payment of the draft. When the terms are cash, title does not pass until payment of the price. People v. Sing, 42 Cal. App. 385, 183 Pac. 865, 867; Katzenbach & Bullock Co. v. Breslauer (Cal. App.) 197 Pac. 967, 968. And in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the risk of loss is assumed by the party having the title. Henderson v. Lauer & Sons, 40 Cal. App. 696, 698, 181 Pac. 811; Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 334, 104 Pac. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609.

[5] It may be that plaintiff did not authorize Ranniger to contract with defendants. However, both parties believed there was a valid contract between them, and plaintiff and defendants both acted on this assumption. This being true, it seems unlikely that defendants' letter of February 4th was intended by them as an offer to supersede the agreement made with Ranniger by another and different arrangement. It seems rather to have been written in reliance on that agreement. Nothing was said when the order was given as to time of payment, in which event delivery of the goods and payment of the price are deemed to be concurrent acts. Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 215, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199; Gilfallan v. Gilfallan, 168 Cal. 23, 29; United Canneries Co. v. Seelye (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 341, 342. The statements, then, in this letter: "In reference to the walnut meats there is no misunderstanding. We are prepared to take the walnut meats, but not against sight draft," and "We will pay for same as soon as we receive them," might reasonably have meant no more than that they were willing to perform in accordance with the terms of the contract. The letter does not purport to set forth the agreement in full. It does not, for instance, mention quantity or price—although the quantity bargained for with Ranniger was shipped and at the price agreed—but deals only with the method and time of payment. Under the circumstances a failure to mention other terms would not amount to a waiver of performance as to them.

[6, 7] Plaintiff could not have been bound by these terms, if unauthorized, and might have refused to deliver the goods. But it consented to them, delivered the bill of lading, and permitted defendants to take the goods from the carrier without payment of the price, which it then attempted to collect. If this was done with full knowledge of all the circumstances and conditions under which defendants had ordered the goods, it amounted to an adoption of the contract by plaintiff, which it would take subject to its burdens as well as its benefits. There is evidence that plaintiff recognized that the agreement was one for sale by sample. The brokers referred to the subject in their letter written to defendants urging them to pay the draft, stating: "These nuts run infinitely better than the sample that was submitted to you." Plaintiff's Mr. Glascock testified:

"We packed five barrels or five drums of these walnut meats and sent them up there as a sample, with negotiations for the entire lot, and they were received by the De Martini Company."

[8, 9] The question whether or not the sale was one by sample was submitted to the jury under proper instructions. "One who sells or agrees to sell goods by sample, thereby warrants the bulk to be equal to the sample" (Civ. Code, § 1766); and "on an agreement for sale, with warranty, the buyer has a right to inspect the thing sold, at a reasonable time, before accepting it * * *" (Civ. Code, § 1785). Assuming the jury concluded that plaintiff did adopt the contract purported to have been made for them by Ranniger with defendants, an opportunity to inspect the goods to ascertain whether or not they were in conformity with those ordered was a condition precedent to defendants' obligation to pay for them. If they were not, defendants were entitled to reject them and to refuse payment. Newmark & Co. v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 339, 146 Pac. 1064. Appellant insists that defendants waived their right to inspect by failure to do so, prior to removing them from the carrier's possession. De Martini testified that the goods were hauled to defendants' establishment for the purpose of inspection, because it was impossible to examine them at the railroad station—that there were not the facilities for properly examining a shipment of this character there—that the walnut meats were packed in small barrels or fiber containers, 59 in all. While the proof was not very full on this subject, it cannot be said that the jury were not entitled to conclude that inspection at the station was impossible. If so, removing the goods to their place of business for that purpose did not amount to a waiver of the right or an acceptance of the goods. Wall Rice Milling Co. v. Continental Supply Co., 36 Utah, 121, 103 Pac. 242, 140 Am. St. Rep. 815. The goods were promptly examined, and, as heretofore stated, found to be defective, inferior to the sample, and totally unfit for the purpose for which they were ordered, or for any other purpose. Under these circumstances, defendants were entitled to reject the goods and to refuse payment.

[10] Assuming that there was no contract at all because there was no meeting of the minds of the parties and that the goods were delivered under a mutual mistake as to the facts, then clearly defendants were not obligated to keep and pay for the goods, they having acted promptly in the matter.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

YOUNG v. SHRIVER et al. (Civ. 2389.)

1. Mechanics' liens —Source of right is constitutional, not statutory.

Liens of mechanics, materialmen, etc., are not strictly statutory; the source thereof being in Const. art. 20, § 15, enjoining the Legislature to provide by law for the enforcement of such liens.

2. Mechanics' liens 33(1)—No lien for plowing or breaking farm land, even for first time; "tract of land."

Under Const. art. 20, § 15, enjoining the Legislature to provide for the enforcement of mechanics' and materialmen's liens, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, as amended by St. 1913, p. 333, § 1, giving a lien to any one who grades, fills in, or otherwise improves any lot or "tract of land" or the street or sidewalk adjoining same, etc., or "makes any improvements in connection therewith," construed ejusdem generis, no lien lies for plowing or breaking farm lands, even for the first time, though a "tract of land," as generally understood, is much more extensive in area than the ordinary town or city lot, and may be used for the usual agricultural or other rural purposes; the phrase "or makes any improvements in connection therewith" necessarily referring to work like that precedently enumerated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; William M. Conley, Judge.

Action by R. J. Young against John D. Shriver and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sherwood Green, of Madera, for appellant.

G. W. Raburn and J. J. Coghlan, both of Madera, for respondents.

HART, J. This action is for the foreclosure of a lien of the certain real property described in the complaint for the sum of $926.67 for labor performed on said property by the plaintiff. The court sustained a demurrer to the complaint on the general ground, and this appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment entered after and upon the order sustaining said demurrer.

The labor performed by the plaintiff, and for which he claims the right to a lien upon the property in question as security for the payment therefor, consisted of the plowing of several tracts of land, theretofore in a wild and uncultivated state, and which belonged to the defendant Dunbar; the contract for doing the work having been made by the defendant John D. Shriver, alleged to be the agent of Dunbar, with one M. S. Foss, who in turn subcontracted with the plaintiff to perform the work. The complaint proceeds upon the theory that the right to a lien for the work of plowing said land is authorized by section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said section thus provides:

"Any person who, at the request of the owner of any lot or tract of land, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the street, highway, or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, or constructs any areas, or vaults, or cellars, or rooms, under said sidewalks, or makes any improvements in connection therewith, has a lien upon said lot or tract of land for his work done and materials furnished; provided, that in cases where the improvements made or work done is subject to acceptance by any municipal board or officer, the time for filing claims of lien shall not commence to run until after such acceptance shall have been made."

It is conceded, and in fact an examination of the several sections of the lien law, as embraced in the Code of Civil Procedure, will show to be true, that if a lien is at all permissible for labor performed in plowing agricultural land, whether for the first time or otherwise, the authority therefor must be found in the above section. It is, however, contended by the respondents that said section cannot properly be so construed as to educe therefrom authority for a lien for labor so bestowed. It is further likewise contended that, even if it were true that a lien would lie in such a case, still the lien in this case cannot be allowed for two reasons, viz.: (1) That the section expressly declares and undoubtedly intends that the work or labor for which a lien is allowed under its terms must be done in person by the party himself taking the contract to do the work; (2) that the party doing the work must be the party directly employed by the owner of the land to perform the labor. In other words, it is the contention that a lien will not lie under said section, either where the party employed to perform the labor has not himself done all the work in person or where the work or labor is done by one who is not directly employed by the owner to perform.

We are, however, of the opinion that a lien will not lie for the performance of the work of plowing or breaking of lands used or to be used for agricultural or like purposes, whether such plowing or breaking was or was not the initial work of that character done upon the lands, and it will therefore not be necessary to consider the two points last above stated, although, in passing, we are not reluctant to say that we are not impressed with the argument offered in support of either of the propositions. We have been referred to no California cases, and, after some independent investigation, have found none, in which the point now to be considered was directly presented and decided. The question, so far as we are advised to the contrary, is entirely new in this state. There is, however, a case from the Iowa Supreme Court, to which we will hereafter refer, which has a direct bearing upon the question involved herein and holds contrary to the position of the appellant.

[1] The counsel for the respondents declare, in one of their briefs, that the right of mechanics, materialmen, artisans and laborers of every class to a lien upon property upon which they have bestowed labor or for which they have furnished materials for the value of such labor done and materials furnished, is strictly statutory. This is not altogether true. The source of that right is in our organic law. Const. art. 20, § 15. By that provision of the Constitution the Legislature is enjoined to provide by law "for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens." Of course, the right to compensation for such labor and materials arises out of contract, and the Constitution merely selects such classes of contracts as those for the enforcement of which an equitable remedy may be invoked. When the Legislature established the means or procedure whereby the remedy vouchsafed in such cases by the Constitution might be brought into action, it did all that it was authorized to do by the Constitution, and we presume that no one will say that the right to the remedy expressly authorized by the organic law can be frittered away by any legislative action or enactment. These observations, however, may be rather academic to the discussion pertinent to the question to be decided here. They are ventured here simply because not only counsel here, but other attorneys whose briefs in other similar cases have come under our observation, seem to be of the opinion that we must look entirely to the provisions of the mechanics' lien law as enacted by the Legislature for the right of the persons for whose benefit such law has been established to invoke the remedy by lien for the enforcement of their contracts.

[2] The only question here is, as above suggested, whether it may reasonably be held that to such work or labor as that involved in this case it was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution and the people that section 15 of article 20 should apply. It is conceded by counsel for the appellant that a lien will not lie for labor performed in plowing lands which had previously been plowed and cultivated, but he contends that where the land is plowed or broken for the first time the situation is entirely different—that is, that such work amounts to a distinct improvement of the land, while succeeding work of that character upon the land after it has once been plowed and cultivated cannot be reasonably said to be an improvement. We are unable to perceive any distinction between the two situations suggested, or at the least cannot conceive of any principle upon which the two should be differentiated in this particular. But even if there is some distinction in the matter of the effect of such work upon the land as to its improvement, yet we cannot persuade ourselves to believe that either the provision of the Constitution or section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure contemplates or was intended to mean that in any case farm lands should be made subject to liens for labor performed thereon.

It seems to us that there are substantial reasons why a lien should not lie for labor performed in preparing lands for use for agricultural purposes in any case. If a lien were allowable for plowing the land, by analogy a lien would be allowable for labor performed in fertilizing and cultivating and planting it to crops or in harvesting the crops or any other labor necessarily incident to the business of farming or of fruit raising or any other purpose to which large bodies of agricultural lands may be adapted and put. Thus it is readily to be seen that lands used for farming purposes might be perennially plastered with such incumbrances, some perhaps for very small amounts, to the great annoyance of farmers and in many cases detrimental to the farming interests, and such a condition we do not think the law would allow, in view of the just solicitude that the public and the law-making power necessarily have for the prosecution of those industries which constitute the very fundamental of all industrial and material prosperity. Indeed, it is not going too far to say that to allow liens upon farming lands for labor performed thereon would not be consistent with sound public policy.

The Legislature of 1913 amended section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure by including therein the words "or tract of land." Previous to said amendment there was no statutory authority for allowing a lien for labor of any kind or character performed on a "tract of land," assuming as we may that that phrase was intended to bear the same meaning in the section as it is generally or colloquially understood—that is, a body of land much more extensive in area than the ordinary town or city lots, and which may be used for the usual agricultural or other rural purposes. This amendment was perhaps inspired by the fact, which is a matter of common notoriety, that in recent years large bodies of lands have been subdivided into smaller tracts and sold to and occupied by tenants who conduct thereon farming or fruit raising on a comparatively limited scale, and that many of these smaller tracts are within the suburban zones of towns and cities and which appropriately demand improvements similar to those which characterize city property, such, for instance, as the maintenance of sidewalks and like conveniences, etc. For work bestowed upon or materials furnished for these or upon or for any of the buildings or other structures upon the land a lien would undoubtedly be permissible.

We think that this must be the correct conclusion as to the motive or purpose prompting the amendment. At any rate, it seems to us that the language of the section itself, in the very nature of the case, negatives the idea that the work of plowing or any other work necessary to the cultivation of farm lands was intended to fall within the purview of its terms. It will be observed that it provides that any person who grades, fills in, or otherwise improves any lot or tract of land or—

"the street, highway, or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, or constructs any areas, or vaults, or cellars, or rooms, under said sidewalks, or makes any improvements in connection therewith, has a lien upon said lot or tract of land for his work done and materials furnished."

Construing that section by the light of the rule of construction, ejusdem generis, as thus it should be viewed, it seems to us to be clear that the phrase, "or makes any improvements in connection therewith," must necessarily refer to work or labor of like character to that precedently enumerated; that is to say, that the improvements contemplated by said phrase must in a general way be similar to those described in the section immediately preceding said phrase.

The conclusion at which we have arrived in this case is sustained by the case of Brown v. Wyman, 56 Iowa, 452, 9 N. W. 344, 41 Am. Rep. 117, above adverted to. In that case a lien was claimed for the labor performed in breaking or plowing virgin prairie land. The claim of lien was based upon section 2130 of the Iowa Code, which secures a lien to—

"every mechanic, or other person who shall do any labor upon, or furnish any materials, machinery or fixtures for any building, erection or other improvement upon land."

The word "land" is as comprehensive as the words "tract of land," even if not more so, inasmuch as it embraces within its usual signification any body of land, whether large or small. The court, denying that a lien would lie in such case, said:

"The breaking of the prairie is necessary to the growth of crops, but not more necessary than the annual plowing which precedes the planting of crops. If a lien should be allowed for the first breaking of the prairie, we are unable to see upon what principle it would be denied for the subsequent plowings which are indispensable to the proper cultivation of the soil. Fertilizers greatly improve land. It would probably not be claimed that a lien would be acquired for hauling manure upon land. It is not proper for us now to undertake to determine to what classes of improvements section 2130 applies. The only question which is before us is, does it apply to the plowing of the soil? We think that to give it such an application would extend it beyond what was contemplated by the Legislature, and beyond what its language, fairly construed, justifies."

The foregoing language expresses our views with reference to the provision of our Constitution and section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to liens. Our conclusion is that, as in the Iowa case, so it is true here, to accept the construction of section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure ascribed to it by appellant would be to extend the language of said section as well as that of section 15 of article 20 of the Constitution beyond what was contemplated by either or which is justified by a fair and reasonable construction thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

SWEETNAM v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.
(Civ. 3648.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 27, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞185(5)—Board of police commissioners of city held not authorized to remove police officers.

Under the charter of the city of Los Angeles, § 93, the board of police commissioners had no power to remove a police officer, the power to remove or suspend being conferred upon the chief of police.

2. Municipal corporations ☞185(13) — Petition for writ of review of petitioner's dismissal from police department by police commissioners held insufficient.

Petition for writ of review by police officer alleging that petitioner was dismissed from the police department by the board of police commissioners held insufficient, since the board was not vested with power to remove a police officer, and its action in so doing was not the exercise of judicial power.

3. Certiorari ☞21—Proceedings of body not judicial tribunal reviewed only when of a judicial or quasi judicial character.

Where the inferior body is not a judicial tribunal, its proceedings will be reviewed on certiorari only when its acts are of a judicial or quasi judicial character.

4. Certiorari ☞21 — Removal of officer involves exercise of judicial functions only when notice and hearing of charge was condition precedent to removal.

The removal of an officer involves the exercise of judicial functions within rule that proceedings, to be reviewable on certiorari, must be of a judicial character only when the law by which that power is conferred requires notice and a hearing of the charge as a condition precedent to the removal.

5. Municipal corporations ☞186(4)—Board of police commissioners' attempted removal of police officer inoperative as to compensation.

Since the board of police commissioners of the city of Los Angeles was not empowered to remove a police officer, its purported order of removal was inoperative, and would not deprive officer of right to receive salary.

6. Certiorari ☞1—Matter sought to be reviewed must have some semblance of vitality.

To justify the writ of certiorari, it must appear that the matter sought to be reviewed has at least some semblance of vitality; that, as long as it stands, it affects some right or interest of the party applying for the writ.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Petition for writ of review by Sidney Sweetnam against the Board of Police Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles, state of California, and others to review the action of the defendants in dismissing petitioner from the police department. From judgment refusing to review the action of the defendants, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams and Seymour S. Silvertown, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Robert Hanley, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court rendered after a demurrer had been sustained to a petition for a writ of review, the petitioner having declined to amend. The facts essential to be mentioned for the purposes of this decision are as follows: The petitioner was a police officer of the city of Los Angeles, and had been acting in that capacity for a considerable period prior to June 8, 1920. The defendants and respondents are the board of police commissioners of the city of Los Angeles, and the individual members of this board. The petition alleges that on or about the 8th day of June, 1920, the petitioner was dismissed from the employ of the police department of said city of Los Angeles by the respondents and defendants herein. It then continues to recite that in making said order of dismissal the respondents acted in excess of their jurisdiction; that no charges of any nature were preferred against the petitioner; that no cause or ground was assigned as a reason for his dismissal, and that no investigation was conducted relative to his dismissal. Both sides agree that the sole question presented upon this appeal is to be determined by a construction of section 93 of the charter of the city of Los Angeles, and that we are required to determine whether or not this section of the charter provides for a quasi judicial or an executive proceeding when the board of police commissioners makes an order removing a member of the police department. It is agreed that, if such a proceeding is quasi judicial, the action of the board is subject to review, and that if it is executive in its nature, the courts have no jurisdiction to review the action of the board. However, as we view the matter, our decision must be based upon other grounds.

Section 93 of the charter provides:

"The chief of police shall have the power to suspend or remove any officer or employee in the police department; but no such suspension or removal shall be made except for cause, which shall be stated in writing and filed with said board, with certification that a copy of such statement has been served upon the person so suspended or removed personally, or by leaving a copy thereof at his last known place of residence if he cannot be found. Upon such filing the suspension or removal shall take effect. Within fifteen days after such statement shall have been filed, the said board, upon its own motion, may, or upon written application of the person so suspended or removed, filed with said board within five days after service upon him of such statement, as above provided, shall proceed to investigate the grounds for such suspension or removal. If, in the case of a removal, the said board, after such investigation, shall find in writing that the grounds stated were insufficient, or were not sustained, and also finds in writing that the person removed is a fit and suitable person to fill the position from which he was removed, the said board shall reinstate him in such position, and if, in the case of a suspension, the board, after such investigation, shall find in writing that the grounds stated were insufficient, or were not sustained, the said board shall restore the person so suspended to duty. The order of said board with respect to such suspension or removal shall be final and conclusive."

It will be observed that the procedure provided by the foregoing section for the removal of an officer contemplates first, the making of an order for removal by the chief of police. It is definitely stated that "upon such filing the suspension or removal shall take effect," so that an officer is removed when the chief of police shall have filed with the board of police commissioners the order for removal with a statement of the cause for such action having been taken. Counsel for appellant assumes that the charter requires the board of police commissioners to make an investigation to determine whether or not the action of the chief of police was justified, and the ground of removal stated sufficient. This assumption is erroneous. Unless the officer removed makes application for an investigation it is not incumbent upon the board to investigate of their own volition. To be sure, they are permitted to do so, but there is no requirement that they shall conduct any investigation unless requested by the officer whose removal has been ordered by the chief of police. Of course there are instances where the word "may," as used in statutory enactments, has been construed to mean "must," but it is too plain to require argument that in this instance such a construction cannot be placed upon the use of the word "may" where it is provided in the section here under consideration that the board "may, or upon written application of the person so suspended or removed * * * shall proceed to investigate the grounds for such suspension or removal." The petitioner, therefore, has no cause to complain that the board of police commissioners did not see fit to hold an investigation unless he filed with said board an application asking that such an investigation be made. The filing of such an application by the petitioner is expressly made a condition precedent to his acquiring a right to demand an investigation. It nowhere appears in the petition that such an application was filed, and hence it fails to state a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly sustained. The petition does aver that the board of police commissioners made an order removing him, and that this was done irregularly, but it is not every order of a board constituted as this one is that is subject to review upon certiorari. The petition does not allege that the action of the board of police commissioners was preceded by any order of the chief of police.

Indeed, assuming the facts stated in the petition to be a complete recitation of the entire transaction, the action of the board cannot be said to be an attempt to exercise the authority delegated by section 93 of the charter, but rather the making of an order so entirely in excess of its jurisdiction as to be null and void upon its face. The board of police commissioners is, of course, one whose ordinary duties are ministerial rather than judicial. If it were to make an order clearly beyond its authority, as, for instance, to remove the city attorney, no one would suggest that a writ of certiorari would issue as a remedy against such usurpation of authority. Assuming the facts stated in this petition to be true, and considering these allegations only, which we must do upon this appeal the order of removal alleged to have been made must be regarded as so completely unsanctioned and beyond the authority of the board as not to suggest an attempted exercise of any authority actually belonging to the board under the charter.

Counsel assume in their briefs that the chief of police had made an order of removal of the petitioner, but this fact, if it be a fact, does not appear in the transcript and we cannot therefore properly consider it.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1-4] I concur in the judgment. It seems to be conceded by counsel that the only provisions relating to the removal of a police officer are those which are contained in section 93 of the city charter. That section nowhere vests the board of police commissioners with the power of removal. The power to remove or to suspend is conferred upon the chief of police. The board is vested with the power to review the action of that officer, but not with the power to make an order of removal or suspension. Nowhere in the petition is it alleged that petitioner was removed from office by the chief of police. The allegation is that petitioner "was dismissed from the employ of the police department * * * by the respondents and defendants herein"—the board of police commissioners of the city of Los Angeles and the individual members thereof. If, as seems to be conceded, the sole authority for the removal of a police officer is such as may be discovered in section 93 of the city's organic law, and if, as is alleged in the petition, the board of police commissioners undertook to remove or dismiss petitioner, such action on the board's part was but a bald usurpation of power that is vested elsewhere, namely, in the chief of police. Where the inferior body is not a judicial tribunal its proceedings will be reviewed on certiorari only when its acts are of a judicial or quasi judicial character. The board of police commissioners is not a judicial body, and the mere act of removing a person from office does not necessarily involve an exercise of judicial power. Rather is it an act of the executive department. The removal of an officer involves the exercise of judicial functions only when the law by which the power is conferred requires notice and a hearing of the charge as a condition precedent to the removal. Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 316, 74 Pac. 997. It follows, therefore, that, if a board that has no power whatever to make an order of removal in any event shall, nevertheless, assume to remove one from office, no judicial function is exercised or assumed, since, as I have shown, the mere act of removing one from office involves the exercise of an executive, rather than a judicial, power.

[5, 6] Moreover, if the board of police commissioners is not vested with the power to remove a police officer, but only with the power to review the action of the chief of police after the latter has removed or suspended the officer, then the board's purported order of removal, being wholly without force determines no right. It is in legal contemplation as inoperative as though it had never been promulgated. It would not stand between petitioner and his right to receive the salary that goes with the office from which, if the allegations of the petition be true, the defendants ineffectively endeavored to remove him. To justify the allowance of a writ of certiorari it must appear that the matter sought to be reviewed has at least some semblance of vitality; that, as long as it stands, it affects some right or interest of the party applying for the writ. Clay v. Civil Service Commission, 89 N. J. Law, 194, 98 Atl. 312.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 1, 1922.)

1. Sales 77(2)—Dealer agreeing to sell old car and credit owner with "net balance" can make necessary repairs.

Where an automobile dealer took plaintiff's old car in exchange for a new one at a stipulated price, and agreed to sell the car for as much more than the stipulated price as possible, and credit the plaintiff with the net balance after making such sale, the term "net balance" means the balance of the proceeds after deducting the expenses incident to the sale, so that the dealer is entitled to deduct from the sale price the cost of repairs necessary to effect the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Net Balance.]

2. Sales 181(11)—Evidence held to show repairs on old car made by dealer were necessary to sale.

Evidence by an experienced automobile man that a used car could not be sold unless it was first put in running order is sufficient to show that the repairs necessary to put it in such order were necessary for the sale, so that the dealer was entitled to deduct the cost of such repairs from the sale price before crediting the owner with the net balance.

3. Sales 77(1) — Dealer need account to owner only for actual not agreed value of car taken in trade.

Where an automobile dealer had agreed to sell plaintiff's old car for as much above the stipulated price as possible, and traded the car for part cash and another used car taken at an agreed valuation, the dealer need account to the plaintiff only for the actual value of the used car taken by him, not the value agreed upon for the purposes of the trade.

4. Appeal and error 760(2)—Reference to transcript for ruling on evidence objected to is insufficient.

A statement in brief that the court erred in evidence rulings, followed by a reference to the transcript, leaving to the appellate court the task of following up the reference to ascertain the nature of the question, objection, and ruling, is not adequate presentation of the points, and does not require consideration of them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Shirley E. Meserve against Smith Bros. and another, doing business under the firm name of Smith Bros. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William A. Sumner, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newby & Palmer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS. J. Defendants are dealers in automobiles. Plaintiff purchased from them a "new" car, turning in his "old" car in part payment to the amount of $1,900. The contract evidencing the deal was in writing, and contained the provision: "Old car to be sold for as much more than $1,900 as possible, and net balance to be credited to" plaintiff. Defendants then transferred the old car to a third party for the sum of $1,600 in cash and a used Chevrolet car, which, to quote from appellant's brief, "was taken in by defendants at the agreed figure" of $750. Before making this deal defendants expended the sum of $162.65 in repairs on the old car. As the sum of $1,600, representing the cash received by defendants on the old car, and the sum of $750, the "agreed figure" placed on the Chevrolet, together make the sum of $2,350, plaintiff brought this action against defendants for the difference between $1,900 and $2,350, or $450, basing his claim upon the ground that the old car had been sold under the writing above mentioned for $450 more than the $1,900 specified therein. Defendants made their defense upon the theory that, although the Chevrolet car was taken by them at the agreed price of $750, it was worth but $350. They also contended that their expenditure of $162.65 on the old car was necessary to put it in condition for the market. They insisted, therefore, that the old car had not been sold for more than $1,900, and that plaintiff could not recover. Defendants had judgment that plaintiff take nothing, and the latter appeals.

Although the points argued in the briefs are many, they really depend in the main upon the settlement of but two questions: (1) Had respondents the right to make expenditures on the old car in order to render it fit for sale or exchange? (2) Can appellant insist that as between him and respondents the Chevrolet car shall stand as the equivalent of $750?

[1] We take these questions up in their order. It is to be remembered that the contract between the parties provided that the old car was to sold for as much more than $1,900 as possible, the "net balance" to be credited to appellant. The expression "net balance" is not difficult to understand. Moreover, it has been defined in terms which fit sufficiently the present case. The phrase was employed in a telegram concerning a sale of stocks, the wire reading, in part:

"We will give you net balance tomorrow in Philadelphia."

It was said by the court before which the transaction came for consideration:

"As applied to the proceeds of the sale of stock, the phrase 'net balance' means, in commercial usage, the balance of the proceeds after deducting the expenses incident to the sale." Evans v. Waln, 71 Pa. 69.

[2] Taking this just definition for our guide, we are to determine whether respondents' expenditures in repair of the old car were expenses incident to its sale. As a preliminary to the settlement of this question, it is to be observed that the interests of the parties to be subserved by a sale of the car were identical, at least to the extent that a sale for no less than $1,900 was desirable. The parties must have contracted with that idea in mind. The particular interest of appellant was that the car should sell for more than $1,900, and he must have contracted with that idea in mind. All this in effect means that, if the car was in such condition that without repair it would not sell for $1,900, considering the common interest of the parties, nor for more than that amount, considering the particular interest of appellant, such repairs as would be necessary to make it sell at the highest possible price must have been contemplated by appellant when the term "net balance" was inserted in the contract. Therefore are the repairs which were actually made upon the car to be considered as "necessary" repairs within the terms of the contract as thus understood? This question must be answered from the evidence, or, rather, from any part of the evidence which operates as a support to the finding of the trial court that the repairs were necessary, for the court did so find. On this subject a witness for respondents was asked:

"In your experience as an automobile man, were those repairs necessary in order to sell this Peerless roadster [the old car]?"

His answer was:

Upon this evidence we have no hesitation in asserting that the finding of the trial court is supported, that the repairs were necessary, and that the net balance in favor of appellant which was to result from the sale could be ascertained only after a deduction of the cost of the repairs.

[3] The second question is even easier of solution. Appellant makes no contention that the old car should have been disposed of for cash. He seems entirely satisfied with the fact that it went for $1,600 cash and the Chevrolet car, if he be permitted to insist that as between him and respondents this latter piece of road rolling stock should stand at $750, although, as we have already observed, the assertion of his own brief is to the effect, only, that the Chevrolet was taken in by respondents at the "agreed figure" of $750. This agreed figure, it is to be understood, of course, was agreed between respondents and the taker of the old car, at the same time the one who bade adieu to the Chevrolet. What they may have agreed to as the value of the latter car is of no concern to appellant. It is obvious to us that as to him the question is as to the actual worth of the Chevrolet. There was ample evidence to support the finding of the trial court that the car was worth but $350. We are convinced, then, that appellant can consider it only as the equivalent of that amount, not of $750.

[4] Appellant asserts that the trial court erred in respect to various rulings admitting and rejecting evidence, but we assume from certain remarks in the brief that all the questions thus attempted to be raised are disposed of by what we have said above. If they are not, however, we need not be concerned about them for the reason that they are not adequately presented. Counsel merely states in each instance that the court erred, and follows the statement with a reference to the transcript, leaving us to follow up the reference and thus ascertain the nature of question, objection, and ruling. In a somewhat similar situation we said:

"Such a casual presentation of points, if followed up, would impose upon us a labor which is within the peculiar province of counsel, and which does not come within the range of our duty. We are not called upon to consider points so presented." People v. Zarate (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 955.

Judgment affirmed.

A. MEISTER & SONS CO. v. HARRISON et al. (Civ. 4115.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 1, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1922.)

1. Sales $\S$ 480(5)—Seller who reserved title could recover full value against third parties who took possession of goods from buyers with notice of seller's rights.

Where seller reserved title with the right to retain installments paid in event of buyer's default, the seller, in action for possession or their value against third parties who with notice of seller's rights took possession after buyer's default, could recover the full value of the goods, without having deducted therefrom the amount the buyer had paid, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 667.

2. Subrogation $\S$ 1—Sellers of trucks, who took possession thereof on buyer's default, not subrogated to buyer's rights against seller of motor bus bodies attached.

Where sellers of trucks took possession thereof after motor bus bodies had been attached, on buyer's default but the seller of the bus bodies, who had reserved title, was entitled to the bodies because of buyer's default in payment of installment upon purchase price, the sellers of the trucks were not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the buyer against such seller of motor bus bodies.

3. Subrogation —22—Sellers of trucks not subrogated to the rights of buyer against seller of motor bus bodies on default in payment of price, in absence of tender to seller of bodies of the balance due.

In action for conversion by seller of motor bus bodies, who had reserved title and was entitled to possession because of buyer's default against defendants who had sold buyer trucks and had taken possession because of buyer's default, the defendants, not having tendered the balance due upon the purchase price of the bodies to the plaintiff, were not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of buyer against plaintiff, even if they would otherwise have been entitled thereto.

4. Sales —480(5)—Seller of automobile bodies, suing sellers of trucks, who had retaken possession with bodies attached, for possession or the value, held not chargeable with expense incurred by defendants in recovering the automobile busses.

Seller of motor bus bodies, who had reserved title and was entitled to possession because of buyer's default, suing sellers of trucks, who had retaken possession of the trucks, with bodies attached, on buyer's default, held not chargeable with a part of the expense incurred by defendants in recovering the automobile busses, in the absence of evidence that plaintiff would have been put to expense in recovering its bodies.

5. Sales —480(2)—That defendants lost money in transaction despite appropriation of plaintiff's property no defense.

In an action for possession or the value of motor bus bodies, brought by the seller, who had reserved title and was entitled to possession because of buyer's default, against defendants, who had sold buyer the trucks and had retaken possession of the trucks with bodies attached because of buyer's default, it was no defense that defendants had lost money on their contract with the buyer, despite the appropriation of plaintiff's property.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by A. Meister & Sons Company, a corporation, against H. O. Harrison and J. W. McAlister, copartners, doing business under the name and style of the Harrison Motor Car Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles B. Harris, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them for $2,500 in an action brought by plaintiff to recover two 23-passenger motor bus bodies, or their value, alleged to be $3,- 000. The trial court found that the plaintiff was the owner of said motor bus bodies, and that the defendant had, on June 13, 1918, wrongfully taken possession of them; that plaintiff had demanded their return, which demand was refused; that plaintiff was entitled to be restored to the possession of said motor bus bodies, or, in the event that defendants were unable to deliver them to plaintiff, plaintiff was entitled to judgment for $2,500, said sum being the value of said articles of personal property. Judgment was given accordingly.

The facts are: Defendants, doing business in San Francisco, sold to one Hark, a resident of Reno, Nev., two Republic motor trucks. Hark secured from plaintiff the motor bus bodies in controversy, and had them attached to the trucks. In doing this, some minor alterations were made in the trucks, such as changing the location of the gasoline tanks, etc. The motor bus bodies were secured by Hark under a lease contract with Meister & Sons Company. This contract recited the receipt of $1,000 by Meister & Sons Company, and provided for monthly payments of $166.67 until the sum of $3,000 should be paid by Hark. It also recited that no agreement of sale was to be implied until the payment of all the installments under the contract, and that upon default in any payment, Meister & Sons Company might, at its option, and without notice, terminate the agreement, and with or without legal process take and retain said automobiles wherever situated, and in the event of such termination of said contract all money paid by Hark prior to such default should be compensation for the use of said automobiles prior to such default. Hark defaulted in the first payment due under the contract. Mr. Meister, the vice president and superintendent of the plaintiff company, then directed his attorney to take possession of the motor bus bodies. However, plaintiff had not recovered possession of the bodies in July, 1918, when defendants, through their attorneys, sought to recover possession of their trucks because of the default of Hark in his payments under his contract with them. Defendants took possession, not only of their trucks, but of the motor bus bodies attached thereto, and had the automobile busses sent from Reno, Nev., to San Francisco, Cal. Plaintiff demanded its bus bodies, and offered to remove the same from the trucks and to place the trucks in the condition in which they were before the attachment of the bodies, but defendants refused to surrender the bodies and sold them on the trucks.

[1] Appellant complains that the judgment rendered is inequitable because the plaintiff has already been paid $1,000 on its bodies, which were to be sold for $3,000, and that by this judgment of $2,500 against the defendant, the plaintiff has gained $500 more than it would have had if Hark had completed his contract. We cannot see that this matter has any relevancy in this action. The plaintiff had protected itself under its contract so that it was possible, in the event of Hark's default, for plaintiff to realize much more for the trucks than the price at which they were to be sold to Hark. For instance, if Hark had paid $2,500 of the $3,000 purchase price of the bodies and had then defaulted, plaintiff might have recovered possession of the bodies, and might, conceivably, have sold them for $2,000, or some other sum larger than the amount unpaid on the contract. Defendants are unconcerned with this phase of the matter. They had no right to sell this property, which belonged to plaintiff. They had notice of plaintiff's rights, and if they chose to sell property belonging to another, they must respond to the owner for its value, regardless of the price at which they may choose to sell it. Section 667, Code Civ. Proc.; Pelberg v. Gorham, 23 Cal. 349, 352; Faulkner v. First National Bank, 130 Cal. 258, 62 Pac. 463; De Thomas v. Witherby, 61 Cal. 92, 97, 44 Am. Rep. 542; Burke v. Koch, 75 Cal. 356, 17 Pac. 228; Hisler v. Carr, 34 Cal. 644, 645; Phillips v. Sutherland, 2 Cal. Unrep. 241, 2 Pac. 32.

[2, 3] We think there is no merit in the contention that defendants should be subrogated to the rights of the vendee Hark. The defendants were not even attaching creditors. But even if we were to concede that the defendants might have acquired the rights of Hark in his contract with the plaintiff by tendering the balance due upon the purchase price of the bodies to the vendor, defendants would be in no better position; for they made no tender or offer to pay the money due by Hark under the contract, but denied plaintiff's right to the bodies, and, as in the cases of Morris v. Allen, 17 Cal. App. 684, 121 Pac. 690, and King v. Cline, (Cal. App.) 194 Pac. 290, defendants would be without right to subrogation for this reason alone, if for no other.

[4] As to the claim that the plaintiff should have been charged with a part of the expense incurred by defendants in recovering the automobile busses, we see no merit in this point. There is no evidence that the plaintiff would have been put to any expense in recovering its bodies. Its contract provided that upon default it might retake the bodies with or without legal process. If defendants had not taken possession of the bodies and sent them to San Francisco, without the consent of plaintiff, Hark might have surrendered them willingly to plaintiff. The record is without proof on this question, and defendants were without authority to recover the bodies for the plaintiff, and were mere volunteers even though we were to take the position, contrary to the facts, that the recovery was for the benefit of plaintiff. Defendant, therefore, cannot recover for any expense incurred in securing possession of its trucks with plaintiff's bus bodies attached thereto. Hisler v. Carr, 34 Cal. 644. The bodies were attached to the trucks in a manner which permitted an easy separation, without damage to the trucks. Plaintiff was entitled to the possession of its property upon Hark's default, and the defendants were without right in their entire dealings with the plaintiff's property. De Thomas v. Witherby, supra, 61 Cal. 98, 44 Am. Rep. 542.

[5] Appellants contend that they should have been permitted to show that they lost money on their contract with Hark for the sale of the trucks, despite the appropriation of plaintiff's property. That is entirely immaterial in this action; defendants may not recoup their losses out of any possible advantage which plaintiff may have gained by reason of having made a more advantageous contract with Hark than defendants made.

The court has found that $2,500 was the value of the bodies taken by defendants. This valuation is based upon testimony in the record, and there is no testimony showing a lesser value.

HATHAWAY v. MCGILLYCUDDY. (Civ. 4121.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 3, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent ⇨103(6)—Agent to sell stock has no authority to agree to give additional stock.

An agent authorized to sell plaintiff's corporate stock to defendant has no implied authority to make a supplemental agreement with defendant that plaintiff would give to defendant other stock in addition to that sold.

2. Gifts ⇨49(1)—Evidence contradicting defendant's testimony as to agreement with deceased agent held to sustain finding for plaintiff.

Defendant's testimony that plaintiff's agent, dead at the time of the trial, had agreed that plaintiff would give to defendant corporate stock in addition to that sold, and that the stock delivered was that given, not that sold, is contradicted by evidence that, when the note for the stock matured, plaintiff claimed only an agreement for extension of the time, and that the agent wrote plaintiff that he knew no reason why plaintiff should not then pay the note, so that the court's finding against the agreement for gift was sustained by evidence.

3. Evidence 258(2)—Evidence held to sustain finding deceased agent represented both parties.

Evidence that the agent through whom plaintiff sold stock to defendant for which the notes in suit were given was a stockholder in the corporation, and that he made the sale to induce defendant to remain as manager of the corporation, and persuaded the plaintiff to sell the stock for that purpose against the plaintiff's desires, held to sustain the trial court's conclusion that the agent represented both parties, so that communications between the plaintiff and the agent were admissible against defendant.

4. Appeal and error 1050(1)—Improper admission of cumulative evidence does not compel reversal.

The admission of evidence, even if erroneous, does not compel a reversal of the judgment where such evidence was only cumulative of other evidence.

5. Costs 238(3)—Appellee offering to reduce judgment by improper amount can recover costs notwithstanding modification.

Where the judgment for plaintiff inadvertently included an allowance of interest to which he was not entitled, but plaintiff offered to stipulate that the judgment might be reduced by that amount, to which stipulation defendant refused consent, because it might prejudice his rights on appeal, plaintiff can recover costs on the appeal notwithstanding the modification of his judgment by eliminating that item.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $5,000 and interest, upon two promissory notes.

Defendant's answer admits the execution of the notes, but alleges that they were delivered to the defendant without the authority of the maker and contrary to his express direction; that defendant has never received anything of value for said notes, and that they were given without consideration. Defendant also filed a "supplemental answer" in which he alleged that the notes were made and delivered by the defendant to be delivered to the plaintiff as and for the purchase price of 15,000 shares of the Los Verjels Land & Water Company; that the certiates of stock claimed to have been delivered by plaintiff as a consideration therefor were delivered on or about June 18, 1913; that, at the time of the delivery of said stock to the defendant, the plaintiff did not own the said shares, but the said corporation was the true owner thereof; that the plaintiff was one of the promoters and organizers of the said corporation, and caused the said 15,000 shares of stock to be issued to himself, with other shares, as a secret profit to himself, without giving any consideration therefor; that since the filing of the amended answer the said corporation rescinded the said issue of said shares because of said fraudulent acts of plaintiff; that the defendant has received no consideration or thing of value for the promissory notes.

After a very thorough examination into all the facts surrounding the entire transaction by means of the testimony of numerous witnesses and the letters written by various parties connected with the matter, the trial court found: That the defendant executed and delivered the notes to plaintiff for a valuable consideration; that at the time of the commencement of the action the plaintiff was the owner and holder thereof; that no part of the principal or interest due upon said notes has been paid; that the plaintiff gave to the defendant valuable and ample consideration for each of said notes, and received possession of the same upon giving such consideration; that said notes were executed and delivered to plaintiff as and for the purchase price of certain shares of the capital stock of Los Verjels Land & Water Company; that defendant received such stock and still holds the same as and for the consideration of said notes. It was also found that, at the time of the delivery of the stock by plaintiff to defendant, the Los Verjels Land & Water Company was not the owner of said stock, and that the plaintiff was the owner and holder thereof; that after the commencement of this action the Los Verjels Land & Water Company attempted to rescind the issue of certain shares of stock issued to plaintiff, but that said company did not rescind said contract; that no shares of stock were ever issued to plaintiff by reason of any fraud on his part, or without any consideration moving from him.

The principal attack made by appellant is that the findings relating to the delivery of the notes, the consideration therefor, and the delivery to defendant of the stock for which they were given, are not supported by the evidence. We have carefully read the reporter's transcript, and find that this contention is entirely without merit, in view of the rule that this court will not interfere with findings made upon conflicting evidence. The testimony of the plaintiff, the letters between the plaintiff and defendant, the letters of defendant to the bank, and to one to whom the notes had been intrusted for collection, all support the conclusions of the trial court.

It is admitted that defendant agreed to purchase from plaintiff 15,000 shares of stock in said company for $5,000, to be paid for with his notes. The negotiations were carried on principally through one Kelly, although there also appears in the record direct correspondence between the parties hereto covering the transaction, and they discussed the matter personally on at least one occasion.

However, defendant asserts that at the time he made this agreement with Kelly, who was representing the plaintiff, he and Kelly also made another agreement. In order to understand the contention regarding the second agreement, it is necessary to state that it had been agreed among the parties interested that the defendant was to assume the management of the Los Verjels Land & Water Company, in which he was one of the original stockholders; that he was to receive a monthly salary for such services, payable in stock of the company. Defendant testified that, as an additional inducement to him to assume the management of this company, several of the stockholders were to donate various amounts of stock, amounting in all to 20,000 shares, which were to be turned over to the defendant without any consideration; that of this 20,000 shares to be so given to defendant Kelly represented and agreed that the plaintiff, Hathaway, would contribute 10,000 shares. This constituted the alleged second agreement. Defendant maintains that he executed and delivered the notes in controversy to Kelly, to be delivered to plaintiff when plaintiff should have delivered the 15,000 shares of stock which he had agreed to sell defendant, and not before; that Kelly took the notes upon that understanding. He admits that Kelly delivered to him at the time of receiving the notes for Hathaway certificates for 15,000 shares of stock, which certificates were shown to have belonged to Hathaway. These 15,000 shares were found by the court to have been delivered in execution of the agreement of sale, and as the consideration for the execution and delivery of the notes. Defendant contends that they were delivered in partial execution of said alleged second agreement between himself and Kelly by which he was to get 20,000 shares of stock as a bonus, and that the remaining 5,000 shares of this bonus stock were delivered to him directly by Turner, another stockholder who contributed the same, and that the 15,000 shares to be delivered by plaintiff under the agreement of sale and for which the notes were executed were never delivered at all.

Mr. Kelly, who negotiated the sale of the stock, died before the commencement of this action. Mr. Hathaway, the plaintiff, denied absolutely that he ever agreed to give defendant any stock, or that he authorized any one to make such an agreement for him. He stated that the only agreement between himself and the defendant was the agreement for a sale; that the first understanding between the parties was for a sale of 12,500 shares for $5,000, as shown by the correspondence between them; that later, upon the solicitation of Kelly, and the representation that Kelly and other stockholders, personally, would have to give 2,500 additional shares to defendant to satisfy him and induce him to act as manager of the company, Hathaway reluctantly consented to give the additional 2,500 shares without additional consideration in order to prevent his associates from parting with their more meager holdings. This resulted in the transfer of 15,000 shares instead of 12,500, in consideration of the notes.

[1] But plaintiff's positive denial of the agreement to give his stock to McGillycuddy without consideration is met by appellant with this argument: Defendant has testified that Kelly made the two agreements with him, and plaintiff was not present at the interviews, and cannot contradict this; Kelly is dead and cannot speak with reference to the matter. The testimony of defendant, therefore, stands uncontradicted that Kelly made these two agreements with defendant on behalf of Hathaway, and that, on behalf of Hathaway, Kelly executed only the agreement for a gift, and not the one for a sale. Regardless of plaintiff's testimony that he never made this second agreement, Kelly was his agent, and, it appearing without contradiction in the record that he made this agreement for a gift as the representative of plaintiff, plaintiff is bound thereby. The answer to this contention seems obvious. In the first place, if we concede that Kelly was the agent for Hathaway in the matter of the sale of this stock to McGillycuddy, this does not embrace, by implication, a further agency to make agreements for a gift of such stock. By no possible method of reasoning can an agency for the sale of stock be construed to include authority to give the same away. There is nothing in the record that could fasten upon Hathaway, by the law of either express or implied agency, any agreement that Kelly might have made with defendant—conceding that he did make one—to give away the property of Hathaway.

[2] But, even if this were not true, the finding of the trial court would be conclusive against defendant as to the making of this gift agreement, because McGillycuddy's testimony regarding this bonus stock agreement made with Kelly does not stand absolutely uncontradicted in the record, as he contends, even though Kelly was dead at the time of the trial. The contradiction of defendant's testimony appears from the following facts: After the notes involved here became due, they were sent to a bank for collection. The bank wrote McGillicuddy, demanding payment. McGillicuddy did not state then that he had received no consideration for the notes, nor that the stock for which they were given had not been delivered. On the contrary, he wrote the bank on June 13, 1914, stating that he could not make payment at that time; that the notes had been given under a verbal agreement with Kelly, as agent for Hathaway; that the time of payment was not important, and that ample time would be given in extensions, etc.; that a demand for payment was not in keeping with said agreement. Kelly was alive at this time, and on May 22, 1914, McGillicuddy wrote to him as follows:

"I will be unable to meet this note at the time indicated. About a year ago, you, acting as agent for Mr. Hathaway, entered into a certain business arrangement with me. Certain notes were given by me, and of the inducements used by you to secure said notes was a promise on behalf of Mr. Hathaway, which was virtually an agreement 'that time of payment of the notes was not important, and that the time would be extended.' Some time prior Mr. Hathaway, in conversation with me, stated the same. I am not asking for an accommodation, but expect that the agreement entered into will be lived up to."

We then find in the record a letter from Mr. Kelly to McGillicuddy which contradicts, by implication at least, the defendant's testimony regarding the gift agreement between Hathaway and himself, through Kelly's agency. For in this letter Kelly disclaims knowledge of any agreement or anything which would justify the refusal to pay these notes. This letter is dated May 30, 1914, and reads as follows:

"I have read with some surprise copy of letter which you recently addressed to the Bank of California regarding the note for $2,500 due June 15, 1914, drawn in Mr. Hathaway's favor wherein you state that I can tell them why you cannot take up the note when due, and this is to advise you that I know of no reason why you should not, and every reason why you should, particularly as you stated to me most positively that you would take up these notes when they were due, and I so informed Mr. Hathaway."

In view of the fact that McGillicuddy testified that Kelly knew that the stock for the notes had not been delivered and that the stock actually delivered was delivered in execution of the gift agreement, this letter of Kelly's furnishes a flat contradiction of his testimony.

Our discussion of the evidence is not intended to be exhaustive. It is our intention merely to point out that there was ample justification for the finding of the trial court that the stock was delivered to defendant by Kelly as agent of Hathaway in consideration of the execution and delivery of the notes by defendant. In view of this situation, the elaborate discussion by appellant of the evidence appearing in the record which supports defendant's contention regarding this matter is quite immaterial.

[3] The next objection of appellant is to the admission of certain testimony of Mr. Hathaway, the plaintiff. This had reference to conversations between Hathaway and Kelly. Hathaway testified that, after he had written the first letter to McGillicuddy offering him the stock for $5,000, and after all arrangements had been made, he sent Kelly with the two notes to McGillicuddy for signatures; that in an hour or so Kelly returned and stated that McGillicuddy had said that he would not sign the notes until he got the stock. There was other testimony regarding the conversations between Kelly and Hathaway, and statements made by Kelly as to what McGillicuddy had said and done. Appellant contends that this testimony was hearsay, and was improperly admitted, as it was not binding upon McGillicuddy. Defendant introduced similar hearsay testimony by McGillicuddy regarding statements made by Kelly to him with reference to Hathaway's statements and actions concerning the transaction. But appellant seeks to differentiate the two cases by contending that, as to Hathaway, Kelly was an agent, and therefore his statements were binding upon Hathaway; but, as to McGillicuddy, he was not an agent, and could not bind him by any statements. The situation here was peculiar. All three men were interested in the success of the company. They were all original stockholders, and apparently working earnestly to achieve success. Kelly appears to have been actuated as much, if not more, by a desire to satisfy McGillicuddy, and keep him as the manager of the company, than by any desire or duty to sell stock belonging to Hathaway. Indeed, Hathaway stated very positively that he did not desire to sell his stock, and only agreed to do so upon the repeated solicitations of Kelly and upon his representations that McGillicuddy would not be satisfied to work with the company unless he owned more of its stock. The full circumstances concerning Kelly's activities were disclosed to both parties. Under such a state of facts, he might well be the agent of both; indeed, a reading of the entire record induces such an opinion. The trial court evidently so concluded, and upon this theory admitted the testimony of which complaint is made. We cannot say that such a conclusion was unwarranted, and, consequently, we do not think it is one with which we are called upon to interfere.

[4] However, though we were to concede that the testimony was improperly admitted against McGillicuddy, we should still be bound to say that we do not consider it prejudicial under all the facts disclosed by the record. At the most, it was but cumulative evidence of matters upon which the record contains some other evidence. It would not therefore compel a reversal of this judgment.

[5] The only other point discussed by appellant is with reference to the allowance of interest. The notes provide on their face that they are to bear interest from "due date," which was June 15, 1914. They are dated June 15, 1913. The trial court in its judgment, by an inadvertence, allowed interest from the date of the notes. This makes the judgment excessive to the extent of $300. Respondent does not oppose appellant's contention upon this matter, but asserts that upon discovery of the error he offered to enter into a stipulation with defendant to reduce the judgment by $300. Appellant admits this, and states that he declined to enter into such stipulation fearing to prejudice his rights upon appeal. These matters are recited herein merely as affecting the question of allowance of costs upon appeal in modifying the judgment.

The judgment appealed from is modified by reducing the interest allowed by the sum of $300, so that the same will read, "two thousand dollars as interest from the 15th day of June, 1914." In all other respects the judgment is affirmed; the respondent to recover his costs upon this appeal.

WILBUR v. GRIFFINS. (Civ. 3948.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 28, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1922.)

1. Interest — 14.8 per cent. interest held not so excessive as to constitute transaction unconscionable one.

The charging of interest on $60,000 loan at the rate of 14.8 per cent. per annum, prior to the repeal of Civ. Code, § 1918, entitling the parties to agree in writing for the payment of any rate of interest, held not so excessive as to constitute the transaction an unconscionable one.

2. Bills and notes — 92(4) — Giving lender bonus of 14.8 per cent. of loan held based on consideration.

Note giving lender bonus of 14.8 per cent., where only security was corporate stock in a land company, which would not be accepted as security by banks, held based on a consideration.

3. Bills and notes — 92(4) — Inadequacy of consideration no defense.

Under Civ. Code, § 3391, a note for which there is a consideration must be held valid in the absence of fraud and undue influence, though the consideration is inadequate, since it is not necessary that the consideration of a note shall equal in pecuniary value the obligation.

4. Corporations — 123(10) — Evidence held not to show that pledgee of stock in requiring a bonus of 14.8 per cent. of loan took an unfair advantage of pledgor.

In action to enjoin the sale of corporate stock pledged for a loan, evidence held not to show that defendant, in requiring a bonus of 14.8 per cent. for making the loan, took an unfair advantage of the plaintiff.

5. Bills and notes — 114 — Additional loan held a sufficient consideration for ratification of previous loan.

Where maker obtained additional loan from payee and executed a new note for amount thereof, and amount previously borrowed, the additional loan was a sufficient consideration for the ratification of the original loan.

6. Bills and notes — 114 — Forbearance to sue a sufficient consideration for ratification.

Forbearance to sue held a sufficient consideration for the ratification of note.

7. Corporations — 123(10) — Complaint seeking to enjoin sale of corporate stock pledged for a loan held insufficient for failure to plead tender of amount due.

In an action to enjoin sale of corporate stock pledged for a loan, complaint held insufficient for failure to plead tender of amount due, notwithstanding defendant's refusal during the trial to accept plaintiff's offer to pay amount less than claimed by defendant to be due.

8. Corporations — 123(10) — Pledgor required to tender amount due as condition to action to enjoin sale of pledged stock notwithstanding dispute as to amount due.

Pledgor, as a condition precedent to an action to enjoin sale of corporate stock pledged for a loan, was required to tender amount due notwithstanding dispute as to amount.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Edith M. Wilbur against B. H. Griffins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. This is a suit in equity, brought for the primary purpose of enjoining the sale of corporate stock pledged as security for a loan. Judgment was awarded to defendant, and plaintiff appeals. The complaint is a lengthy one, and more than half of it is devoted to the allegation of matters which in our opinion are utterly foreign to the real controversy between the parties. The record on appeal is also voluminous, consisting of some 1,960 typewritten pages, the greater portion of which is made up of evidence received in support of those immaterial issues. Stripped of extrinsic matters, the facts of the case may be stated as follows:

On September 3, 1915, plaintiff borrowed from defendant the sum of $38,000, for which she gave him a promissory note for $45,000. The amount of the note in excess of the amount of the loan was a bonus demanded by defendant at the rate of $2,000 for every $10,000 loaned. The note was secured by a pledge of 2,500 shares of the capital stock of the Harbor Center Land Company, which stock plaintiff valued at $500,000. On November 3, 1915, plaintiff applied to defendant for an additional loan of $12,000, which the defendant granted, and at that time defendant exacted a new note for the sum of $60,000, which included a bonus of $10,000 for the making of the loan. That note was made payable two years and ten months after date, with interest at 7 per cent., compounded monthly, and provided that if the interest was not paid as agreed the entire principal sum should forthwith become due and payable. The stock was again pledged as security for the second note. On February 18, 1918, the interest on the loan was fourteen months in arrears. Defendant demanded payment of the note, and thereupon plaintiff, for the purpose of obtaining an extension of time until September 3, 1918, assigned to defendant as additional security the sum of $14,072.60, owing to her from said Harbor Center Land Company and appearing on its books. On September 26, 1918, the plaintiff, then being in arrears about one year and ten months in the payment of the interest, was served with a notice by defendant to the effect that he would, under the terms of the note and collateral agreement proceed to sell the stock so pledged. This action was then brought to enjoin the sale of the stock and for an accounting to determine the amount due. During the trial of the action and just before it concluded, to wit, on October 1, 1919, upon the joint demand of plaintiff and defendant, the Harbor Center Land Company paid its indebtedness to plaintiff, which then amounted to the sum of $23,168.46, and defendant credited that amount as a payment on the said note, leaving a balance due on March 1, 1920, of the sum of $51,296.90, with accruing interest from that date.

At the time of the commencement of the action, plaintiff made no pretense that the note was not due or that she had paid anything thereon, but her suit in equity was based upon these principal propositions: First, that the bonus of $10,000 was void and may not be collected; secondly, that defendant took an undue advantage of plaintiff in obtaining the collateral agreement; third, that defendant purposely failed to collect the book account due from the Harbor Center Land Company, and thereby prevented her from obtaining part of the money to pay off the loan; fourth, that the defendant and George S. Wall, the president of the Harbor Center Land Company, acted in collusion to prevent plaintiff from obtaining money due her from said land company, and also to prevent her from ascertaining the true condition of the company's affairs.

While in this state the precise question of the validity of a bonus as it has arisen and is being presented on this appeal has apparently never been passed upon, yet in a number of cases similar questions, such as excessive rates of interest and agreements to pay "premiums" for making loans, have been considered, and in all of those cases it has been consistently held that in the absence of fraud, duress, undue influence, or confidential relations courts of equity will not interfere with the agreements made by the parties.

Norris v. Wright, 36 Cal. App. 278, 171 Pac. 1087, was an action for damages claimed to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of an alleged inequitable sale of plaintiff's interest in an estate. Plaintiff borrowed money from defendant at various times, for which she gave her promissory notes, secured by mortgages on her interest in the estate. The notes were executed for much larger sums than the actual amount of the loans, and besides bore interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per month. When the total amount of those notes reached the sum of $900, defendant refused to loan more money, but purchased plaintiff's interest for $1,500, by paying plaintiff an additional $400, and the balance of the $1,500 was made up of "expenses," etc., including the payment to the defendant of a commission of $75 for making the sale to himself. The court said:

"It is perfectly apparent that the plaintiff was unfamiliar with business affairs and that the defendant imposed unconscionable burdens upon her; but it is not claimed that at the time of the transactions she was an infant, or incompetent, or that the relations between her and the defendant were confidential. No evidence was introduced to show that the defendant made any misstatements or misrepresentations of fact to the plaintiff, or that he practiced upon her any deceit or fraud."

It was held that the appellate court was powerless, as was the court of first instance, to afford plaintiff any relief.

In Boyce v. Fisk, 110 Cal. 107, 42 Pac. 473, plaintiff sought to be relieved of a mortgage given to secure a small loan bearing interest at the rate of 48 per cent. per annum, and compounded monthly. It was held that where the parties agree by a contract in writing for the payment of any rate of interest it must be allowed according to the terms of the agreement, and the fact that the bargain is a very hard and unreasonable one is not sufficient per se to induce the court of equity to interfere with the contract of the parties, for the reason that courts of equity are as much bound by the laws of the land as courts of law.

In McNamara v. Oakland B. & L. Ass'n, 131 Cal. 345, 63 Pac. 670, the question arose in an action brought by plaintiff to cancel a mortgage. Among the other points urged by the plaintiff was one that while he had signed a note for $1,200 he actually received a loan of only $960. The balance, $240, was retained as a "premium" by the building and loan association of which plaintiff was a member. The court held that plaintiff entered into the transaction knowingly and that he was consequently bound by the terms of his contract.

The case of Long v. Newman, 10 Cal. App. 430, 102 Pac. 534, was also a building and loan case in which plaintiff agreed to pay as a "premium," in addition to the interest, $10.50 per month for a period of 120 months, or $1,260, on a loan of $4,200. The suit was one for an injunction and accounting and the court held that the terms of the contract were themselves clear and plain and that plaintiff was bound thereby.

[1] In states where usury laws exist the courts treat the question of bonus as additional interest by adding it to the normal rate of interest provided for in the contract. Where the sum of the normal rate of interest, plus the bonus, is above the legal rate, the contract is held to be tainted with usury; where it is below the legal rate the contract is upheld. 39 Cyc. 972; Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co., 141 U. S. 384, 12 Sup. Ct. 1, 35 L. Ed. 786; Id., 141 U. S. 409, 12 Sup. Ct. 7, 35 L. Ed. 793; Id., 141 U. S. 411, 12 Sup. Ct. 8, 35 L. Ed. 794. If the bonus here be regarded as interest the contract must be upheld, for the reason that section 1918 of the Civil Code as it stood at the time of these transactions and up to the time of its repeal in November, 1918, provided that—

"Parties may agree in writing for the payment of any rate of interest, and it shall be allowed, according to the terms of the agreement, until the entry of judgment."

Applying the rule of computation followed in the states having usury laws to this case and adding to the rate of interest thus found additional interest on the bonus of $10,000 at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and fixing the period of the loan at three years, the total rate of interest on the amount actually loaned, to wit, $50,000, would be 14.8 per cent. per annum, providing the loan was paid at maturity. If not paid at maturity the rate of interest would, of course, be less. Bearing in mind that in Boyce v. Fisk, supra, the rate of interest was 48 per cent. per annum, and in Norris v. Wright, supra, it was 24 per cent. per annum, and that the contract in each of those cases was sustained, we are unable to say here that the rate of interest of 14.8 per cent. per annum is so excessive as to constitute the transaction an unconscionable one.

[2] Treating the question of bonus as one of consideration we are unable to see that plaintiff's position is any stronger. The consideration for the execution of the note for $60,000 was admittedly the loan made by the defendant of the sum of $50,000. The stock pledged as security was issued by a company whose business was that of subdividing a large tract of land and disposing of it in smaller parcels. Defendant explained that his reason for exacting the bonus was that the security offered by plaintiff was not bankable and that it would necessarily take time to realize upon it; that is, that banks would not loan money on that character of security and therefore borrowers would be obliged to obtain loans either from private lenders, who would necessarily take the chance either of a loss or of a long delayed repayment. This assertion seems to find support in the allegations of the plaintiff, for it is there alleged that while the pledged stock has a value of $500,000, plaintiff has been unable to obtain sufficient money thereon from others to redeem the stock, and that she verily believes that if the stock is sold by defendant either the defendant or some confidential agent of his will become the purchaser, thereby preventing plaintiff from recovering the same.

[3] There being a consideration for the note, the note must be held valid, even though the consideration is inadequate for the reason that it is not necessary that the consideration of a note shall be equal in pecuniary value to the obligation incurred, and mere inadequacy of consideration, except as a circumstance bearing upon the question of fraud or undue influence, is not a defense to the note. Daniels on Negotiable Instruments, § 180; Earl v. Peck, 64 N. Y. 598. The only effect of inadequacy of consideration is that the contract cannot be specifically enforced in equity. Section 3391, Civ. Code.

In support of the contention that the bonus is void appellant relies mainly upon two cases, neither of which in our opinion is controlling here. In More v. Calkins, 85 Cal. 177, 24 Pac. 729, and Id., 95 Cal. 435, 30 Pac. 583, 29 Am. St. Rep. 128, the sole question involved was whether or not a mere naked promise in a deed of trust to pay the trustee the sum of $10,000 in addition to the other sums therein agreed to be paid, was supported by a consideration. By the terms of the deed the trustee was empowered under certain conditions to sell the property conveyed to him and from the proceeds to deduct first, the reasonable expenses of the management of said lands and of the execution of the trust; secondly, to deduct the sum of $15,000 with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, which amount the grantor had borrowed from the trustee, "together with the additional sum of $10,000 without interest"; and, third, to reimburse the trustee for any sums advanced by him in satisfying a mortgage with which the property was incumbered. It was claimed by the plaintiff and alleged in the complaint that said sum of $10,000 was intended to be paid to said trustee only in the event that an option then outstanding for the purchase of the property for $103,000 was not exercised, and that the trustee should thereafter sell the property to some other purchaser for that amount. The Supreme Court held, on the first appeal, which was an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, that—

"The fact that it appears upon the face of the instrument that payment for all loans and advances, and compensation for all services, with extraordinary interest, is provided for, exclusive of the promise to pay ten thousand dollars without interest, tends to corroborate the averment that there was no consideration for the promise to pay the ten thousand dollars."

And the Supreme Court goes on to say:

"But for the presumption that there is a consideration for every promise in writing, there would appear to be no consideration for the promise to pay the ten thousand dollars without interest."

Upon the second appeal, which was after the action had been tried on the merits, the Supreme Court, after quoting the above language, held that—

"The construction thus placed upon the deed had become the law of the case, and the question of its correctness is not open to consideration upon this appeal."

And it was further held that because it had not been shown that the trustee had furnished any other money, or assumed any other obligations, or rendered any other services, than appeared from the deed itself, there was no consideration shown for the promise to pay the $10,000. It will thus be seen that the provision for the payment of the $10,000 was, in the agreement and by the Supreme Court treated as a transaction having no connection either with the loan of the $15,000 or with the management of the trust property. It presumably was intended, as alleged in the complaint, to be paid as a commission to the trustee in the event he sold the property for the sum of $103,000, which admittedly he did not do.

In the case of Bridge v. Kedon, 163 Cal. 493, 126 Pac. 149, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 404, also cited by appellant, plaintiff sued to enforce an assignment of the expectant interest of the defendant in the estate of his mother, who at the time of the assignment was living, but who died prior to the commencement of the suit. The assignment was taken to secure a loan made by plaintiff to defendant bearing interest at the rate of 2½ and 3 per cent. per month. The main question involved in the case and on the appeal was whether or not a court of equity, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 700-703 and 1045 of the Civil Code, would enforce a release by an heir of his expectancy in the estate of his ancestor after it had devolved upon him by the death of his ancestor. The trial court decreed the enforcement of the assignment, but before doing so, reduced the interest on the loan to an amount it believed was reasonable. Such power in a court of equity is unquestioned. It cannot be disputed that a court of equity has not ample power to eliminate from a contract, sought to be enforced in equity any unfair and inequitable elements contained therein, provided it may be done without making a new contract for the parties. But in this case it was not the holder of the contract, who was dissatisfied with the exercise of the court's power in this respect. It was the defendant who appealed, and his appeal was not taken upon the ground that the court had no power to reduce the interest, but upon the ground of the invalidity of the assignment itself, and that was the real question considered by the Supreme Court on appeal.

The case of Reed v. Bernal, 40 Cal. 628, cited by plaintiff, is not in point. The court there merely held that a penalty inserted in a promissory note for its nonpayment was void. None of the other cases cited by plaintiff are similar in their facts to the case at bar and therefore they cannot be held as controlling here.

[4] The contention made by appellant that an unfair advantage was taken of her by the defendant in this transaction, both at the time of and subsequent to the execution of the promissory note and collateral agreement, might well be dismissed with the statement that the evidence bearing upon these points shows that at best there is a mere conflict of proof. But we have, nevertheless, examined the evidence, and find that there is no merit in appellant's claim and we are entirely satisfied that the findings of the trial court are fully supported by the facts.

[5, 6] The plaintiff was a woman of much business experience. She had been the owner of a great deal of property, both real and personal, and had bought and sold much property extensively. She had also borrowed and repaid much money. She was the owner of a one-half interest in the Harbor Center Land Company and frequently examined its books and discussed and participated in its affairs. While it is alleged in the complaint that the defendant had been the attorney for appellant's mother and that she (plaintiff) trusted and had confidence in him, no fiduciary relation between plaintiff and defendant is alleged or claimed. When plaintiff first applied for the loan and defendant stated his terms, she flatly rejected them. Subsequently she returned and accepted the loan on the terms stated. Several weeks elapsed between those two periods of time, during which she was in active consultation with various attorneys. At the time the loan was made defendant stated that it was a loan of money on a speculative stock at highly inflated values. It is evident that plaintiff was unable to obtain the loan from others, on better terms, because she had ample time to do so. If she believed that she had been victimized by an "unconscionable" contract, she took no steps to relieve herself from it by a rescission or repudiation. But, on the contrary, she ratified the transaction in various ways. She borrowed the first $33,000 on September 3, 1915, at which time she agreed to the terms. Sixty days afterwards she borrowed $2,000 more on the same terms, and more than two years thereafter again ratified the transaction by assigning to defendant upon his demand additional security. The subsequent ratifications were supported by a sufficient consideration—the first by the additional loan and the second by a forbearance to sue. Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242; Burkle v. Levy, 70 Cal. 252, 11 Pac. 643. If she desired to rescind, she should have done so promptly (section 1691, Civ. Code), and her failure to rescind promptly after a knowledge of the facts must be regarded as a ratification (Schmidt v. Mesner, 116 Cal. 271, 48 Pac. 54).

So far as concerns the charge that defendant refused to assist plaintiff in certain proceedings she desired to take against the Harbor Center Land Company and its selling agency, the New Richmond Land Company, we are entirely satisfied that the conclusions of the trial court in favor of the defendant are sound. The complete answer to this charge is that defendant did not agree with plaintiff in her interpretation of the matters involved, nor did he support her inclination to start proceedings, legal or otherwise, against those companies, but, on the contrary, declined to lend his aid to proposed litigation against either company, for the reason that he believed such proceedings and litigation would result in disaster to his security.

Another reason why, in our opinion, plaintiff cannot prevail in this action, is that the allegations of her complaint and the proof offered by her would not support a judgment in her favor if granted.

[7, 8] It is admitted in the complaint that at the time of the commencement of the action plaintiff was indebted to defendant in the sum of $59,000. No sufficient tender of that amount, however, is alleged or proved. Without making such tender plaintiff will not be heard to complain in equity. 1 Joyce on Injunctions, § 607; Buena Vista F. & V. Co. v. Tuohy, 107 Cal. 243, 40 Pac. 386; Mad-dock v. Russell, 109 Cal. 425, 42 Pac. 139;

Wolfe v. Titus, 124 Cal. 264, 56 Pac. 1042. Nor will a dispute about the amount excuse a tender. Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 94 Pac. 889. True, there is an attempt made to plead a tender in the complaint, but upon an analysis of it, it will be found to contain certain conditions and limitations which completely destroy its usefulness and purpose as a tender. Perkins v. Maier, etc., 134 Cal. 372, 66 Pac. 482. Appellant endeavors to justify the failure to plead a tender upon the ground that it would have been useless and it is argued that the rejection by defendant of appellant's offer made during the trial to pay $36,000 in addition to allowing defendant to take the book account of $24,000 was sufficient to prove defendant would not have accepted any amount which did not include the bonus of $10,000. But whether or not defendant refused to accept such offer in court did not relieve appellant from pleading in the beginning a tender of the amount she admitted was due and of afterwards offering proof of her ability to perform. Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 Pac. 1001. The immaterial matters first mentioned herein relate to various transactions between plaintiff and the Harbor Center Land Company, which occurred prior to the making of this loan. They throw no light on the controversy concerning the loan, and we have therefore refrained from discussing them.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte KOESTER. (Cr. 603.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 24, 1922.)

1. War ⚡32—Military jurisdiction over soldier within states not exclusive even in time of war.

Notwithstanding Articles of War, art. 74 (U. S. Comp. St. § 2308a), requiring a soldier to be delivered to civil authorities for trial for an alleged crime except in time of war, the jurisdiction of the military courts over a soldier is not exclusive of the civil court even during time of war, if the soldier was stationed within one of the states where the civil courts were functioning and where no actual hostilities were in progress.

2. Habeas corpus ⚡54—Allegation in petition by one in the military service held not to establish fact defeating jurisdiction.

An allegation, in a petition for habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from confinement under sentence by the superior court, that petitioner at the time he was sentenced was a soldier in the United States army in time of war, does not entitle petitioner to discharge, even if the court had no jurisdiction over a soldier at that time, in the absence of any showing in the record on which the judgment was rendered of that fact, since the petition is a collateral attack upon the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, which can not be nullified by statement of facts outside of the record.

3. Habeas corpus §85(1)—Presumed consent of military authorities to trial of soldier was given if necessary.

If it was necessary to give the superior court jurisdiction to try a soldier for a felony in time of war that permission of the military authorities be given, it must be presumed, in support of a conviction of such soldier, that the permission was given.

Original application for habeas corpus by Edward Chesley Koester, to be directed to the Warden of Folsom State Prison to secure the release of the petitioner on the ground that he was illegally restrained. Writ denied.

Robert H. Schwab, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner is a prisoner confined in the state prison at Folsom, under a judgment of sentence for an indeterminate term, rendered by the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco on the 25th day of February, 1920, for the crime of the forgery of a telegraphic money order. Claiming that his restraint under said judgment is illegal and void, he has applied to this court for his release from the custody of the warden of said prison through the writ of habeas corpus. The ground upon which he bases the contention that he is illegally restrained of his liberty may be gathered from the language of the petition for the writ, as follows:

"That your petitioner was from the 25th day of April, 1919, to the 24th day of March, 1920, a soldier in the army of the United States, and stationed at Ft. Rosecrans; that on the 7th day of October, 1919, your petitioner was arrested in the city and county of San Francisco, and that thereafter, and on the 25th day of February, 1920, by judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, sentenced to an indefinite period by said superior court upon a charge of forgery of a telegraphic money order; that at the time of his arrest he requested permission to send a telegram to his commanding officer, which request was denied; that at no time thereafter was your petitioner permitted to notify his commanding officer at Ft. Rosecrans of the fact that he was in custody upon said alleged charge; that your petitioner during all of said times was under the control of and subject to the military laws and regulations of the United States, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the state of California, except by permission of the Army of the United States; that the enforcement of said military laws and regulations fall within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War; that at the time the judgment was rendered by the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, said court did not have jurisdiction over the person of this defendant, and that said judgment is null and void."

[1] Briefly stated, the specific contention is that, the petitioner, being, at the time of the alleged commission of the crime for which he is now suffering punishment and also at the time of his prosecution for and conviction thereof, a soldier in the army of the United States, in time of war, the jurisdiction to try him for the said crime was exclusively in the military department of the government, unless jurisdiction of his person was yielded by the military to the civil authorities for that purpose, and that, therefore, since (as is the claim) permission to try him for the offense by the civil courts was not granted by the military authorities, his trial and conviction by the civil authorities was void ab initio, and wholly nugatory. It is argued that, notwithstanding that at the time that the petitioner committed the crime, and also at the time he was tried therefor, there had been and was a complete cessation of actual or active hostilities between this country and Germany, yet, in contemplation of law, this country was still in a state of war with Germany, and remained so until peace was officially declared, which declaration was not made until a date subsequent to the commission of the crime, and that, such being the case, the jurisdiction to try the petitioner for the offense charged against him was as much within the exclusive jurisdiction of the military department of the government as though actual or active hostilities were being prosecuted at the time of the commission of the offense. In support of this position reliance is placed largely upon the language of article 74 of the Articles of War (U. S. Comp. St. § 2308a), to the effect that when a person subject to military law is accused of a crime or an offense committed within the geographical limits of the states of the Union and the District of Columbia, and punishable by the laws of the land,

"the commanding officer is required, except in time of war, upon application duly made, to use his utmost endeavor to deliver over such accused person to the civil authorities, or to aid the officers of justice in apprehending and securing him, in order that he may be brought to trial."

There are conceivable circumstances under which it no doubt could and should be held that the military department of the government is vested with exclusive jurisdiction to try and punish soldiers of the United States army for offenses committed by them against the law of the land. For instance, if the armies of the United States were in the enemy's country, the military tribunals would then undoubtedly and, for obvious reasons, should have, under the Articles of War as established by our government, exclusive jurisdiction of trying and punishing offenses of every grade committed by persons in the military service. Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U. S. 509, 24 L. Ed. 1119. But we would not say that, where our armies are not in the enemy's territory and where there is an absence of actual hostilities at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, such exclusive jurisdiction exists, albeit a state of war may still exist in contemplation of law between this and another country, only, however, because peace has not been formally declared. In such a situation it seems to be the view of the cases that the jurisdiction of the military and civil tribunals is concurrent. Ex parte McRoberts, 16 Iowa, 600; Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U. S. 509, 24 L. Ed. 1119; Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S. 348, 27 Sup. Ct. 749, 51 L. Ed. 1085, 11 Ann. Cas. 640; United States v. Clark, (C. C.) 31 Fed. 710, 712; 6 Op. Atty. Gen. 419; State v. Rogers, 37 Mo. 367, 368.

In Grafton v. United States, supra, it is said:

"While, however, the jurisdiction of general courts martial extends to all crimes, not capital, committed against public law by an officer or soldier of the army within limits of the territory in which he is serving, this jurisdiction is not exclusive, but only concurrent with that of the civil courts."

In Coleman v. Tennessee, supra, speaking of a section of the articles of war, which is in language similar to that of section 74, above referred to, it is said:

"But the section does not make the jurisdiction of the military tribunals exclusive of that of the state courts. It does not declare that soldiers committing the offenses named [murder, robbery, arson, burglary, and the like] shall not be amenable to punishment by the state courts."

Again, in the same case, it is said:

"We do not mean to intimate that it was not within the competency of Congress to confer exclusive jurisdiction upon military courts over offenses committed by persons in the military service of the United States. * * * All we now affirm is, that by the law to which we are referred, the thirtieth section of the Enrollment Act, no such exclusive jurisdiction is vested in the military tribunals mentioned. No public policy would have been subserved by investing them with such jurisdiction, and many reasons may be suggested against it. * * * In denying to the military tribunals exclusive jurisdiction, under the section in question, over the offenses mentioned, when committed by persons in the military service of the United States and subject to the Articles of War, we have reference to them when they were held in states occupying, as members of the Union, their normal and constitutional relations to the federal government, in which the supremacy of that government was recognized, and the civil courts were open and in the undisturbed exercise of their jurisdiction. When the armies of the United States were in the territory of insurgent states, banded together in hostility to the national government and making war against it; in other words, when the armies of the United States were in the enemy's country, the military tribunals mentioned had, under the laws of war, and the authority conferred by the section named, exclusive jurisdiction to try and punish offenses of every grade committed by persons in the military service. Officers and soldiers of the armies of the Union were not subject during the war to the laws of the enemy, or amenable to his tribunals for offenses committed by them."

[2] Thus we think a definitive answer is returned to the claim of the petitioner that he is entitled to be released from his present restraint upon the ground upon which he relies, as stated above. But, even if we were compelled to yield the position above taken, there is still another and, indeed, a conclusive reply to the petitioner's claim for release in this proceeding. It does not appear from the record before us, except only by the averments of the petition, that the petitioner was a soldier of the United States armies at the time of the commission of the offense of which he was convicted; nor, if such soldier, that jurisdiction of his person for the purposes of his trial was not yielded to the civil by the military authorities. Neither the information nor a copy thereof is before us, and we may assume that, since an averment in that pleading that he was a soldier would have been wholly unnecessary and, indeed, supererogatory, in the statement of the offense charged, the fact that he was a soldier, if it was a fact, was not stated therein, nor that if a soldier his trial in the superior court was not with the permission of the military authorities. Nor is it made to appear in the warden's return to this writ, accompanying which return is the commitment which, as a matter of fact, is a copy of the judgment, that the petitioner was a soldier in the army of the United States.

[3] There is no proposition in law better understood or more thoroughly settled than that, where a person has been tried and convicted of an offense so denounced by a valid law, in a court of competent jurisdiction, the judgment of conviction, being, in all respects valid upon its face, cannot, in a collateral attack thereon, be nullified or disturbed, and it therefore follows that the mere statement of facts in a petition for a jurisdictional writ impeaching such judgment cannot of themselves have the effect of countervailing the legal force of such judgment. And in every collateral attack upon a judgment valid on its face, all presumptions and intendments must be indulged to support it, and it is therefore to be presumed in this collateral attack upon the judgment against the peitioner that he presented every defense against the crime charged against him and every excuse against the right of the superior court to proceed with his trial which were available to him, and that the issue thus presented was tried and determined against him at the trial. At any rate, assuming that the petitioner was at the time of the commission of the crime a soldier in the United States army in time of war, it is to be presumed that, if necessary, the permission of the military authorities to try him for the offense with which he was charged was granted to the civil authorities, or that the petitioner himself submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the superior court, waiving any right that he might conceive that he had to be tried by a military tribunal by failing to set up the plea that the jurisdiction to try him was exclusively in the latter tribunal. Of course, it is not questioned, and, indeed, it could not be, that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco has under the law jurisdiction of the offense of which the petitioner was convicted, and that it also had jurisdiction of his person, so long as such jurisdiction was not ousted by the timely interposition of some authority having superior jurisdiction over his person with regard to the offense charged against him.

No reason has been shown why the prisoner should be enlarged, and the writ is therefore discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the warden of the state prison at Folsom.

PEOPLE v. TOMASOVICH. (Cr. 587.)

1. Criminal law §163(2)—Denial of challenge to juror must be shown prejudicial.

An accused must show that he was prejudiced by denial of challenge to juror for cause, though in peremptorily challenging such juror he exhausted his full legal quota of challenging.

2. Jury §85—Action on challenge of juror held discretionary.

Where juror upon his voir dire in a prosecution for a violation of a liquor law stated that, while he entertained a strong feeling of hostility against intoxicating liquors, he could and would, if accepted as a juror, give the defendant a fair and impartial trial, but answered in the affirmative to the question, "You do not feel that you can sit in a case of this kind as a fair and impartial juror, do you?" it was entirely within the discretion of the court to determine whether or not the juror was subject to challenge for cause.

3. Criminal law §1152(2)—Determination of qualification of juror conclusive upon reviewing court.

Court's determination that a juror challenged for implied bias, under Pen. Code, § 1072, was not subject to challenge for cause, was a discretionary matter, and is as conclusive upon a reviewing court as is any other question of fact decided at nisi prius upon evidence in which there is substantial conflict; the juror having given contradictory replies to questions upon his voir dire.

4. Witnesses §267—Not abuse of discretion for the court to stop inquiry on cross-examination by defendant on its own motion.

It was not an abuse of discretion for the court to stop an inquiry on cross-examination by the accused which could avail nothing, though prosecuting attorney had not objected.

5. Criminal law §404(4)—Sufficient foundation laid for introduction of liquor in evidence.

In a prosecution for violation of a prohibition law, there was a proper foundation for permitting introduction in evidence of jugs of liquor where testimony showed that they, with their contents, were delivered by defendant to witness, who delivered them to the sheriff and were placed in a vault in the latter's office and kept locked there until removed for analysis.

6. Criminal law §656(9)—Improper for court to state that fact is proved.

It is not proper for a trial court to state in the presence of the jury that any material or important fact has been proved.

7. Criminal law §656(9)—Statement of court that fact was proved held not misleading.

Accused cannot complain that the court stated in the presence of the jury that a certain fact was proved where the court intended to say that there was testimony tending to establish such fact, and the matter was explained to the jury.

8. Criminal law §1166½(12)—Statement of court held not to require reversal.

Statement of court to defendant's attorney, "You cannot trap me, sir," held not to have prejudiced the accused.

9. Criminal law §1166½(12)—Misconduct of court must have prejudiced accused.

A statement of the court tending to place accused's attorney in an unfavorable light in the eyes of the jury must have been such as to make it manifestly plain that it brought about a result in the trial which would not otherwise have been effected before a reviewing court will nullify a conviction.

10. Criminal law §1172(6)—Instruction concerning intent not prejudicial where intent not material.

An instruction: "The word 'willfully,' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law or to injure another or to acquire any advantage"—if error, could not have prejudiced defendant in prosecution for sale of liquor where all that there was necessary for the jury to find was that defendant sold the liquor.

11. Criminal law ⚭1172(2)—Instruction on reasonable doubt not prejudicial.

An instruction on reasonable doubt that the law "prohibits you from going outside of the evidence to hunt up doubt upon which to acquit the defendant," if it transcended the province of the jury by instructing upon a question of fact, was not prejudicial.

12. Criminal law ⚭304(8)—Doubtful whether judicial notice is taken of particular places in city.

While the courts take judicial notice of the existence and bounds of a city (St. 1889, p. 372), it is doubtful whether they may take judicial notice of the fact that any particular place or locality is not within the limits of an incorporated city.

13. Criminal law ⚭1168(1)—Taking judicial notice of location held not prejudicial if error.

If the court erred in an instruction in taking judicial notice of the fact that a particular locality was not within the limits of an incorporated city, there was no prejudicial error where the uncontradicted evidence was that such place was not within the limits of an incorporated city.

14. Criminal law ⚭37, 772(6) — Defendant held not enticed to commit crime by officers, and instruction thereon was unnecessary.

Where officers were informed that accused was bootlegging, and went to his place out of the county and purchased whisky, to be delivered in the county on the following day, there was no improper enticement, and his conviction for the sale of whisky was not opposed to public policy, and court did not err in refusing to instruct concerning enticement.

15. Criminal law ⚭112(1)—Whether title to liquor passed one of intention of parties.

Where three jugs of whisky were ordered in one county, and part of the purchase price paid, and on the following day the defendant delivered the jugs in another county, the question as to whether the title to the liquor passed in the first county was one as to the intention of the parties to be gathered from the language of the parties, considered in the light of all the circumstances, under Civ. Code, §§ 1140, 1141.

16. Criminal law ⚭564(7)—Finding that sale was within county held warranted.

In a prosecution for sale of intoxicating liquor, partially paid for in another county and delivered within the county, held, that the jury were warranted in finding that there was no completed sale until the delivery of the liquor within the county.

17. Intoxicating liquors ⚭132—County ordinance imposing greater penalty than federal statute not invalid.

A county ordinance concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors is not in conflict with the Volstead Act and invalid because it imposes a greater or less penalty.

18. Intoxicating liquors ⚭13, 132—County may adopt ordinances prohibiting traffic notwithstanding Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Act.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, a county may adopt and enforce ordinances prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation, or unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, notwithstanding the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution and the Volstead Act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Michael Tomasovich was convicted of a violation of a county liquor ordinance, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant, under an indictment returned by the grand jury of the county of Sutter, was tried for and convicted of the violation of certain provisions of an ordinance of the said county penalizing the "sale, manufacture, unlawful possession or transportation of intoxicating liquors" within the limits of said county. Said ordinance, which was introduced in evidence, and which was regularly passed by the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter on the 8th day of March, 1921, is in its provisions fashioned after the law passed by Congress to enforce the inhibition of the Eighteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution against the sale, transportation, and unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, and known as the "Volstead Act." 41 Stat. 305.

The appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The verdict is assailed on a number of different grounds, which may be stated as follows: (1) That there was error, prejudicial to the rights of the accused, in the order denying defendant's challenge of Juror Noyes for cause; (2) that the court, of its own initiative, improperly interfered with and thus curtailed the cross-examination by the defendant's counsel of one of the witnesses for the people; (3) that prejudicial error was committed by the admission of certain evidence; (4) that the court prejudiced the rights of the defendant by making a certain comment upon the testimony during the progress of the trial; (5) that the court erred, to the serious detriment of the rights of the accused, in giving and also in refusing to give certain instructions; (6) that the conviction of the defendant is against public policy, and cannot, therefore, be upheld, inasmuch (so it is asserted) as the evidence discloses that the accused would not have committed the act constituting the foundation for his prosecution, conviction, and punishment but for the inducements originated by the public officers themselves, and by them held out to him, to commit said act; that, in other words, he was trapped into the commission of the act by said officers; (7) that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, in that it was thereby shown that, if any crime at all was committed by the defendant, it was committed within the limits of Butte, and not within the limits of Sutter county; and (8) lastly, that the ordinance upon which the indictment is based is in conflict with a "general law," and is consequently invalid, in that the penalty therein prescribed for the violation of its provisions is in excess of or greater than that prescribed for the same act by the Volstead Law.

The specific charge against the defendant is that, on the 9th day of June, 1921, in the said county of Sutter, and outside the limits of any incorporated city or town therein, he sold intoxicating liquors, to wit, "whisky and liquor containing one-half of one per cent. and more of alcohol by volume, which was then and there fit for beverage purposes," etc.

From the evidence it appears that, a few months prior to the day on which the defendant was arrested upon the charge stated in the indictment, one M. A. Carpenter had been appointed a deputy sheriff, and as such charged with the special duty of "rounding up bootleggers." Carpenter had received information through various sources that the defendant, who resided in Butte county, "about two-tenths of a mile above the Sutter county line," was engaged in bootlegging or in the illicit traffic of intoxicating liquors. After obtaining this information, Carpenter called at defendant's house on several different occasions prior to the date of the arrest, and on one of said occasions—May 21, 1921—in the course of a conversation with the defendant the subject of intoxicating liquors arose and was discussed by and between them. Carpenter asked defendant if he had any wine, to which the former replied: "No, I haven't got any, and if I had I would not be afraid to sell it to you. * * * I could get you some jackass brandy." The officer answered that he did not like such liquor, but preferred wine, and ventured the suggestion that he could buy wine at Napa at $2 a gallon, to which suggestion defendant retorted: "You ought to get some, and you can sell it for $4 a gallon." On another visit of Carpenter to the defendant's home, Carpenter, having taken some wine with him, invited the defendant to take a drink of the liquor and the latter accepted the invitation, taking two or three drinks. There is, however, no evidence that the wine so drunk by the defendant made him intoxicated, or had any perceptible effect upon him. Early in the month of June, 1921, Carpenter, accompanied by another deputy sheriff of Sutter county, named Baker, and one A. A. Laskey, again visited the defendant at his home. These parties took with them three half gallon empty jugs, which they left with the defendant. At this time, it appears, Carpenter and his companions entered into an arrangement with the defendant whereby the latter was to deliver to them, on the 9th day of June, 1921, at a point near "Dago Corners," in Sutter county, the three jugs filled with whisky. The price agreed upon for the liquor was $30, or $10 per jug, and Carpenter gave to the defendant the sum of $5 as in part payment for the whisky.

On the day appointed for the delivery of the whisky (the day after the agreement for the purchase of the liquor was made) the defendant, accompanied by his wife and a young son, appeared in his automobile at "Gomez Station," located on the Northeastern Railway, in Sutter county, and near "Dago Corners," at about 8 o'clock in the morning. Carpenter, Laskey, and Baker, in accordance with a prearrangement with the defendant, were at "Gomez Station" at the hour named, having arrived there before the defendant made his appearance at that point. The defendant, upon reaching Gomez Station, saw the officers in an automobile at said station, and at the same time the officers saw him, and one of the latter signaled the defendant to follow them. The officers then drove the machine in which they were riding from the highway onto a private road a short distance from the station and stopped, the defendant following, and upon reaching the point at which the officers had stopped saying that he had "the stuff" in a suit case in his machine. Carpenter thereupon stepped to the defendant's automobile and took therefrom the suit case, and handed it to Baker, who removed therefrom the jugs, which were filled with what the defendant then said was "corn whisky," and placed them in their own machine, then returning the suit case to the defendant. Thereupon the officers paid the defendant the sum of $25, being the balance due for the liquor according to the arrangement made with the latter at his home the preceding day, Carpenter paying the defendant $15 and Laskey paying him, by check, $10 for the jug of whisky which he (Laskey) was, under the arrangement, to receive. On one occasion on which Carpenter, Baker, and Laskey together visited the defendant's home—whether the day they contracted for the purchase of the whisky or some previous occasion does not appear clear from the record, these three parties having on more than one occasion visited the defendant together—the defendant proposed to sell to the officers a recipe that he claimed to have for making whisky, stating to them that they could make their own whisky "and sell it for $25 less than he gave for it." It should also be stated that Carpenter testified that he, Baker, and Laskey had bought liquor of the defendant at his home previously to the day on which the agreement to sell and deliver the liquor at "Gomez Station" was made. And it may further be added that the test made by a pharmacist of the contents of the jugs as they were delivered to the officers by the defendant showed that the liquid therein contained was "corn whisky," which registered "90 proof," or "45 per cent. alcohol."

The above statement of facts is gleaned from the testimony of witnesses introduced by the people. As a matter of fact, the defendant did not take the witness stand in his own behalf, or otherwise introduce any testimony in opposition to that presented by the people in support of the charge.

[1-3] 1. Juror Noyes, in reply to questions upon his voir dire, and touching his qualifications to sit as a juror in the case, repeatedly stated to the district attorney and to the court that, while he entertained a strong feeling of hostility against intoxicating liquors and the traffic therein, he nevertheless could, and would, if accepted as a juror, give the defendant, with whom he was not personally or otherwise acquainted, and as to whom he entertained no feeling of personal prejudice, a fair and impartial trial, according to the evidence adduced and the law as declared to the jury by the court. Upon being questioned at considerable length by the counsel for the defendant, and after repeating that he could try the case fairly and impartially, notwithstanding that he had "always had a very strong prejudice against liquor," he returned an affirmative answer to this question: "As a matter of fact, you do not feel that you can sit in a case of this kind as a fair and impartial juror, do you?" Thereupon counsel challenged the juror for implied bias as defined by the second subdivision of section 1072 of the Penal Code. The court then questioned Noyes further, and brought from him a repetition of the statement he had made to the district attorney that he could try the accused fairly and impartially, and that he would not favor his conviction in the absence of proof of his guilt to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt. The court denied the challenge, and counsel for the defendant later peremptorily challenged and so excused the juror from sitting in the case. Even if it were necessary to hold that the denial of the challenge was erroneous, it is not shown that, although exhausting his full legal quota of peremptory challenges, the defendant was prejudiced by the order denying the challenge, since it is not made to appear that, by reason of the denial, an objectionable juror was forced upon him. In other words, it is not shown by the record that the defendant "desired to exercise any additional challenge, or that he had the slightest objection to any juror sworn to try the cause, or any disposition to have any such juror excused." Peo- ple v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 520, 157 Pac. 599, 602; People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 577, 119 Pac. 920, 921; People v. Tinnen (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 557, 560. But we think that the examination of the juror was such that it was entirely within the discretion of the court to determine, upon a consideration of said examination as a whole, whether the juror was or was not subject to a challenge for cause upon the ground upon which the challenge was interposed, and the court's determination of that matter in this case is as conclusive upon a reviewing court as is any other question of fact decided at nisi prius upon evidence in which there is substantial conflict.

[4] 2. There is no substantial merit in the assignment that the court interfered with and thereby cut off legitimate cross-examination of a witness for the people by defendant's counsel. The incident about which the defendant complains in this particular arose in this way: The witness Carpenter was asked by defendant's attorney if he was not at the request of the district attorney appointed as a deputy sheriff a short time prior to the arrest of the accused, and before an answer was returned by the witness, the court interrupted to say that the question called for immaterial testimony, and that the witness would not be permitted to answer the same. The attorney thereupon stated that he desired "to get down to the approximate date of the appointment," and insisted that he was entitled to have the formal appointment in writing produced in court. The court replied that the appointment was on file in the clerk's office, and that counsel could procure and introduce it in the case if he so desired. Subsequently the same witness, having given as his reason for stopping at the house of the defendant some time during the winter preceding the date of the latter's arrest that the automobile of a party with whom he had no personal acquaintance had broken down near defendant's house, and that the owner of said machine desired to ride "to town" with the witness, was asked on cross-examination to state to whom said machine belonged, to which question the witness replied that he did not know; that he did not inquire as to whom the machine belonged. Counsel then asked, "It was not your machine?" the witness replying in the negative; and again the witness was asked, "What kind of a machine were you driving?" the witness replying that it was a Ford. The court then interrupted this cross-examination with the statement: "That is immaterial. I will stop it. If the district attorney does not object to this line of questions, I will myself." The attorney for the defendant did not offer any sound explanation as to the particular purpose he had in view in asking the questions to which the court, sua sponte, objected, nor was it shown what, if any, relevancy the testimony thus sought to be elicited would have to the ultimate question to be determined by the jury. Upon their face the questions called for testimony that was neither relevant nor material to the issue. We cannot perceive wherein the fact, if it were a fact, of the district attorney's request for the appointment of Carpenter as a deputy sheriff would show or tend to show when said appointment was made, which was the only reason counsel gave for asking that question. If the date of the appointment was important, it could easily be shown, as was later developed, by the introduction of the written appointment itself in evidence. Nor are we able to see that whether the machine which was broken down at defendant's house was that of the witness Carpenter or some other person, a stranger to Carpenter, could shed any light on the issue before the jury. Since the prosecuting attorney failed to object to the examination, as it was his duty to have done so far as anything to the contrary appears from this record, it was not an abuse of discretion or authority on the part of the court to stop an inquiry which could avail nothing but a useless or purposeless consumption of time.

[5] 3. This assignment brings into question the propriety of the action of the court in admitting in evidence and as exhibits against the accused the three half gallon jugs containing the whisky alleged to have been sold by the defendant. The ruling allowing this evidence was over objection by the attorney for the defendant, upon the ground that no proper foundation was laid for the evidence, in that it was not shown that the jugs, as they were introduced in evidence, were in the same condition as when delivered to the sheriff by the witness Carpenter. The complaint against this testimony is not supported by the record. The testimony shows that the jugs with their contents were delivered by the witness Carpenter to the sheriff in the same condition that they were in when the witness received the same from the defendant, and that the sheriff immediately placed them in a vault in his office, kept them locked therein, and did not remove them from the time that he received them until the time the trial was called and was proceeded with, save on one occasion when they were taken by the witness Carpenter to a druggist in the city of Marysville for the purpose of having their contents analyzed and tested with the view of determining the character and the extent of the alcoholic content of the liquid contained therein. It is reasonably clear from all the testimony upon this proposition that the contents of the jugs were precisely what they were when sold and delivered to the officers by the defendant.

In connection herewith we may dispose of assignment No. 4 in the order in which the assignments are above enumerated, involving the charge that the court virtually instructed the jury upon a question of fact when ruling upon the offer of the district attorney to have the jugs with their contents admitted in evidence. The attorney for the defendant, as above stated, objected to the introduction of the jugs in evidence on the ground that a proper foundation had not previously been laid therefor, and the court in ruling said:

"It has been proven that he (witness Carpenter) got them out there in that machine and the sheriff made no change in them, and here he says he delivered them to the sheriff and he said he never made any change in them and the sheriff said they were locked in the cell there and they never made any change."

The following colloquy then occurred between court and counsel:

"Mr. Davies: Your honor said it was proved.

"The Court: That is the testimony before the court.

"Mr. Davies: Did you say it was proved?

"The Court: I said it was the testimony.

"Mr. Davies: I thought your honor said it was proved.

"The Court: You cannot trap me, sir.

"Mr. Davies: I am not trying to.

"The Court: I advise you not to try it."

[6, 7] Of course it is not proper for a trial court to state in the presence of a jury during the progress of the trial that any material or important fact has been proved. Such a statement would clearly involve a trespass upon the domain of fact and an invasion of the function of the jury. Undoubtedly the statement made by the court that the facts referred to were proved was wholly inadvertent. What the court really intended to say, as it explained was its purpose, was that there was testimony before the jury tending to establish those facts. The explanation by the judge that he intended merely to refer to the testimony in the case, and not to what was proved by the testimony, supplemented by the instruction embraced in the charge of the court that whether any fact essential to the conviction of the defendant was or was not proved was a matter solely for the jury's determination, may well be supposed to have been sufficient to demonstrate to the jury that they were not to be influenced in arriving at a verdict by any chance remark of the court involving what might appear to be a suggestion as to what was proved in the case. The fact is that the explanation of the judge was itself in effect an admonition to the jury that they were not to consider or be influenced in their deliberations by the remark referred to, and assuming, as we certainly may, that the jury was composed of persons of common intelligence, we think they must have heeded such admonition. At any rate, considering the entire record, we do not believe that a miscarriage of justice followed from the making of the remark.

[8, 9] It is further contended, in connection with the present consideration, that the court's statement in addressing the defendant's attorney, "You cannot trap me, sir," had the effect of placing the attorney in an unfavorable light in the eyes of the jury, with the result that the defendant was likewise prejudiced. The court perhaps should not thus have censured the attorney, or insinuated that he was attempting to mislead it, but it too often happens that during the trial of a case, particularly where it is zealously contested by counsel, both counsel and the court will stray away from that cool and calm mental attitude which should characterize both in the performance of duties of such grave importance, but, if cases were to be reversed, and sent back for retrial for such a reason, there would be very many reversals which would not accord with justice. The misconduct of a court in that particular must be such as to make it manifestly plain that it has brought about a result in the trial which would not otherwise have been effected before a reviewing court will, solely for that reason, nullify the judgment or the order.

[10] 5. The latter clause of the following given instruction is complained of:

"The word 'willfully' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implied simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law or to injure another or to acquire any advantage."

This instruction is in the precise language of subdivision 1 of section 7 of the Penal Code. It is contended, however, that said instruction is inconsistent with the instruction given by the court that "in every crime there must exist a union of act and intent." In the case of People v. Stennett (Cal. App.) 197 Pac. 372, the particular language here criticised was under review, and it was therein said that said language, although embodied in the Code section, would, in the ordinary criminal cases, tend to mislead or confuse the jury, and therefore should not have been given. We still adhere to the suggestion so made. But in this case the instruction could not in any view have the effect of confusing the jury or leading to an unjust result; for it is not necessary to the consummation of the crime charged in the indictment in this case that there should exist and be shown an intent to commit the act. All that it was necessary for the jury to find was that the defendant sold the liquor as charged in the indictment to justify them in arriving at a verdict of guilty. People v. Pera, 36 Cal. App. 292, 304, 171 Pac. 1091, 1096. In the case just cited it is said:

"The decisions appear to be quite uniform upon the proposition that where, in invoking and applying the police power, the Legislature has prohibited certain acts and denounced them as criminal, the mere commission of such acts, regardless of the intent with which they were committed, is sufficient to constitute the crime so denounced. There are, perhaps, certain exceptions to this rule, as, for instance, where the statute itself uses language in describing or defining the crime indicating that scienter or a specific intent to do the act was essential to constitute it a crime. But particularly in cases interdicting the traffic in intoxicating liquors the rule generally is that the mere commission of the act is sufficient to consummate the offense, and in the present case the law authorizing the establishment of 'no license territories' uses no language indicating an intention in the Legislature to make the intent with which the act of keeping a resort for the purpose of selling intoxicating liquors is committed an ingredient of the offense"—citing Commonwealth v. Holstine, 132 Pa. 357, 19 Atl. 273, wherein it is expressly held that to sustain a conviction for selling intoxicating liquors under a statute of the state of Pennsylvania penalizing the sale thereof it is not requisite to prove a criminal intent.

These observations, of course, answer the criticism here made against the instruction to the effect that—

"The commission of the offense constitutes the crime and the specific intent or intention with which it is done is immaterial."

[11] The legal soundness of the instruction read by the court upon the rule of reasonable doubt is challenged upon the ground that therein the court transcended its province by instructing upon a question of fact, in that it was declared in said instruction that the law "prohibits you (the jury) from going outside of the evidence to hunt up doubt upon which to acquit the defendant." An instruction containing precisely the same statement, but otherwise even more vulnerable than the one here complained of, was considered in the case of People v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 770 et seq., 100 Pac. 887, and, while the opinion in that case condemned the instruction, and cautioned, as the Supreme Court had repeatedly done previously, trial judges, in instructing on the doctrine of reasonable doubt, to adhere to the statement of that rule as it was given in Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711, held upon a careful analysis of the instruction that it was not so far afield in the statement of the rule as to compel a reversal of the case. We refer to the Del Cerro Case and others therein cited as a reply to the complaint urged against the instruction under consideration.

[12, 13] The next assignment under this head is that the court erred in taking judicial notice of the fact that the place where the liquor was sold in Sutter county was not within the limits of an incorporated city, and so instructing the jury. While the courts take judicial notice of the existence and bounds of a city (Stats. 1889, p. 372; People v. Mueller, 168 Cal. 521, 524, 143 Pac. 748, L. R. A. 1918B, 788), it is extremely doubtful whether the courts may take judicial notice of the fact that any particular place or locality is not within the limits of an incorporated city. But there is no evidence in this case or any pretense that either Gomez Station or Dago Corners is situated within the limits of any municipal corporation, or that either is itself a municipal corporation. To the contrary, the uncontradicted evidence is that those places were not within the limits of an incorporated city. It is therefore manifest that the instruction, even if erroneous, could not have operated prejudicially against the rights of the accused.

The court refused the following instructions requested by the defendant:

"I further instruct you that unless you find that this defendant originated the criminal design of which he is accused and with the criminal attempt to carry out the crime of which he is charged after it was suggested to him you must find him not guilty."

"I further charge you that a person entrapped into the commission of a wrongful act without any original criminal design upon his part, and without any attempt to carry out a criminal purpose of his own conception, does not therefor become guilty of crime."

[14] The foregoing instructions bring up the point assigned as No. 6 in the order in which the points are stated above, to wit, that the defendant was enticed, upon a design initiated by the officers of the law themselves, into the commission of the act of selling the liquor, and that, as a consequence, his conviction and the punishment to follow, if the conviction be sustained, are opposed to public policy.

There are many decisions upon the proposition to which the refused instructions are addressed by both the state and the federal courts, and in many instances the judicial views crystallized from facts substantially similar are rather divergent.

The theory of the rule thus sought to be invoked by the defendant is that it is as well the duty of peace officers to prevent as to detect and punish crime, and that therefore, where a crime is entirely of the creation of such officers, and not that of the person by whose direct act the crime has been committed—that is, where the officers themselves have originated the design to have a crime committed, and have by some artful means induced another, wholly innocent of criminal intent until by such officers his mind has thus been corrupted, to execute such design—it is in such case the policy of the law to condemn rather than to encourage convictions thus brought about.

The rule is not, however, uniformly applicable to all cases of crime, but it is unnecessary here to enter into an examination of the reasons for the distinction (they being obvious on reflection), since we are convinced, not only from the evidence, but from the nature of the offense charged in the indictment, that the rule cannot be applied in this case. In the first place, it is to be remarked that it is commonly known that everybody of normal intelligence is fully cognizant of the fact that the act constituting the crime charged against the defendant is and has been unlawful ever since the enactment of the congressional legislation the purpose of which was to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. Indeed, the evidence in this case very clearly shows that the defendant well knew that the traffic in alcoholic liquors or the possession thereof not for a purpose allowed by the law was in direct violation, if not of a county ordinance, of the provisions of the so-called "Volstead Act." His statement to the officer that he would not be afraid to sell him intoxicating liquor, accompanied by his offer to sell the officer "jackass brandy," was itself sufficient to show that he had full knowledge of the wrong involved in the act of selling such liquor. Also his proposition to sell the officer a recipe for manufacturing such liquor showed that he knew that the matter concerning which he was negotiating with the officer, if carried out, would involve a violation of the law and an act denounced as criminal. The evidence further shows, as we have seen, that prior to the first visit of any of the officers to the home of the defendant the former had received information that the defendant was engaged in the business of bootlegging, and it is a fair and reasonable inference from all the evidence that the officers took no steps towards arresting the accused until they had received such information, and then they, as it was their duty to do, proceeded to make an investigation and to use any reasonable means for securing evidence against the defendant. The manner in which they prosecuted their investigation was consistent with the usual legitimate methods adopted by detectives in ferreting out crime. The fact that the officers purchased liquor from the defendant does not tend to show that the defendant was improperly induced or enticed by the officers to commit the crime. If he was engaged habitually in the unlawful business of dispensing alcoholic liquors, as the officers appeared to have probable cause for believing that he was, then it may be said that his purpose to commit the crime was not the result of anything that the officers did or said. As was said in State v. Spiker, 88 Kan. 644, 129 Pac. 195:

The fact that "purchases of liquor were made by persons seeking to ascertain if the seller was engaged in the unlawful sale thereof constitutes no defense to the charge, nor does it render their testimony incompetent."

[15] 7. The proposition that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict involves, it is manifest, a question of venue or jurisdiction. The contention is that the transaction at the defendant's home between the latter and the officers, in which the arrangement was made for the delivery of the whisky to the officers at the point above indicated in Sutter county, amounted to a completed or absolute sale of the whisky, and that title thereto passed to the officers in Butte county. Of course, if this were true, the venue of the defendant's crime would be in Butte and not in Sutter county.

The testimony does not show just what occurred, or precisely what the conversation was, at the defendant's house between the latter and the officers on the day preceding that on which the liquor was delivered near Gomez Station. It was shown, however, that the officers visited the defendant at his house on said day; that they left the three empty half gallon jugs with the defendant; that Carpenter paid the former five dollars in cash; that the defendant on the following morning, according to prearrangement, as may well be inferred from the fact that the circumstance occurred at a very early hour in the day, met the officers near Gomez Station and returned to them the jugs filled with whisky, and that the balance of the purchase price of the whisky, $25, was paid by the officers to the defendant. From these circumstances the jury were clearly warranted in finding that the defendant had agreed to sell to the officers three half gallon jugs of whisky for the sum of $30, and was to deliver the same to said officers on the morning following the 8th day of June at or near Gomez Station, in Sutter county. There still remains, though, the question whether the transaction above explained involved a sale or a mere agreement to sell. There was no testimony showing or tending to show that at the time the officers arranged with the defendant for the delivery of the whisky to them at Gomez Station there was any whisky in the possession of the latter at his home. In other words, there is no evidence to show that the defendant had whisky in bulk from which the officers could have purchased or agreed to purchase any quantity of the article. On the other hand, it was shown, as we have seen, that a short time prior to the 8th day of June, 1921, at the home of the defendant, the latter, upon being asked by Carpenter if he (defendant) had any wine for sale, replied that he did not have wine, but that he could get some "jackass brandy" for the officer, and that the latter said that he did not want that kind of liquor, from which statement it is to be inferred that the defendant did not keep liquor at his home in stock. Furthermore, the liquor was not measured out, and therefore the particular whisky proposed to be purchased by the officers was not identified. Civ. Code, § 1140. And thus, moreover, there is no evidence that at the time the officers delivered the jugs to the defendant the latter had so prepared the liquor or put it in such condition as to make it capable of being delivered. Nor is there any evidence that he offered to deliver it at that time to the officers, or otherwise showed any intention of then vesting in them the title thereto. Civ. Code, § 1141. Indeed, there is no evidence that at the time referred to the officers saw any liquor in the possession of the defendant, or had reason to believe that the defendant then had in his possession any liquor from which he could have furnished them that article. It hence appears that there was still something to be done in connection with the whisky proposed to be purchased to put it into a deliverable state or condition.

In Benjamin on Sales, b. 2, c. 3 (7th Ed.) p. 270, it is said:

"Where by the agreement the vendor is to do anything to the goods for the purpose of putting them into that state in which the purchaser is to be bound to accept them, or, as it is sometimes worded, into a deliverable state, the performance of those things shall, in the absence of circumstances indicating a contrary intention, be taken to be a condition precedent to the vesting of the property."

Again the same learned author gives the following rule:

"Where anything remains to be done to the goods for the purpose of ascertaining the price, as by weighing, measuring, or testing the goods, where the price is to depend on the quantity or quality of the goods, the performance of these things also shall be a condition precedent to the transfer of the property, although the individual goods be ascertained, and they are in the state in which they ought to be accepted."

It is well settled that the question as to whether the title has passed is one as to the intention of the parties, and such intention is, as a matter of course, to be gathered from the language of the parties, considered in the light of all the circumstances of the case. There are, however, certain circumstances which have a controlling force where the intent is not clearly shown by other evidence or by the express language of the parties to the transaction. In Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 216, 18 Pac. 248, 250 (9 Am. St. Rep. 199), it is said:

"If the condition of payment is not waived, the title does not pass until the price is paid. Peabody v. Maguire, 79 Me. 585; Evansville R. Co. v. Erwin, 84 Ind. 464, 465; Turner v. Moore, 58 Vt. 456; Adams v. O'Connor, 100 Mass. 515, 1 Am. Rep. 137; Hoffman v. Culver, 7 Bradw. 454. It frequently happens that the seller will deliver the goods notwithstanding the failure to fulfill the condition of payment; and in such cases the question arises as to whether such delivery is not to be considered a waiver of the condition. Some courts hold that, in the absence of circumstances showing a contrary intention, the condition is waived, and that the title passes. But where, as here, there was neither delivery nor payment, there can be no doubt but that the title does not pass. Dixon v. Duke, 85 Ind. 435, 436."

Again, in the same case, 76 Cal. at page 217, 18 Pac. 251, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199, the court said:

"So far as concerns the proposition that where weighing or measuring is necessary to the identification of the goods, the title does not pass until they have been weighed or measured, the American cases are generally in accord with the above rule. * * * Some of the American cases are not in accord with the rule laid down by Mr. Benjamin in this: That if the goods are identified, it does not matter that weighing or measuring is necessary to ascertain the price or the quantity and this seems to be the law in California for the Civil Code contains the following: [Here quoting section 1140 of said Code.] This section does not dispense with identification. On the contrary, it requires it. It only dispenses with segregation when the property is otherwise identified. Therefore, where the identification consists in the segregation, weighing, or measuring, they are still necessary."

See, also, Horr v. Barker, 8 Cal. 608; McLaughlin v. Piatti, 27 Cal. 463; Caruthers v. McGarvey, 41 Cal. 15; Gianelli et al. v. Globe Grain & Milling Co. (Cal. App.) 191 Pac. 720, and cases therein cited.

[16] Our conclusion upon this branch of the discussion is that, from all the circumstances of the case, tested by the terms of the above-named Code sections as they are expounded by our own courts, there can be no doubt that the jury were warranted in finding that, notwithstanding that Carpenter paid $5 cash down at the time that the agreement was made, the payment of the remaining portion of the total price of $30 for the whisky was intended as a condition precedent to the vesting of title, that therefore there was no sale of the liquor effected on the 8th day of June, 1921, and that, consequently, the venue of the crime was in Sutter county. In other words, applying to the evidence the touchstone of the legal principles which must govern in the solution of the question now before us, it cannot justly be declared, as a matter of law, that there was a completed sale of the liquor prior to the delivery thereof by the defendant to the officers on the morning of June 9, 1921, at or near Gomez Station, in Sutter county, and therefore the implied finding of the jury, from the circumstances as revealed by the evidence, that the sale was effected in Sutter county is conclusive upon this court.

[17, 18] 8. The contention that the ordinance under which the defendant was prosecuted, in so far as the penalty prescribed is concerned, is in conflict with the Volstead Act, and is therefore invalid, is conclusively answered by the recent case of In re Volpi (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 1090, decided by this court. It is therein said:

"The fact that the statute or ordinance of the lesser jurisdiction is more exacting, or that the penalty imposed is more or less severe, than that of the greater, does not constitute a conflict. If prosecuted under the one, a defendant is entitled to the protection which that law affords him; if under the other, his rights are governed by its provisions. In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114."

Of course, it will be conceded, as is clearly pointed out by Presiding Justice Finch in the case of In re Volpi, supra, that counties, in the exercise of the power of police conferred upon them by the state Constitution (article 11, § 11), may adopt and enforce ordinances prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation or unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors. This power has not been taken from them by the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, and the fact that the Congress has passed a law for the enforcement of that provision does not impair the right of the states to put into action the power of police for the same purpose. Indeed, the Eighteenth Amendment expressly provides that the federal and state governments shall have concurrent power in the enactment of legislation for the enforcement of its terms, and an ordinance of a county designed to accomplish that purpose, whatever the penalty prescribed therein may be, does not conflict with any general law within the meaning of section 11 or article 11 of our state Constitution merely because the penalty so prescribed is greater than that prescribed by the act of Congress designed for the same purpose.

We have examined this record with much care, and thus we have been persuaded to the conviction, after a painstaking investigation of all the points urged for a reversal, that the verdict should remain undisturbed.

Accordingly the judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

FAHEY v. MADDEN et al. (Civ. 2412.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 24, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨933(4)—Motion presumed not to have been granted for insufficiency of evidence.

Where defendant's motion for a new trial was made on all the statutory grounds and the order granting the new trial did not specify the ground on which it was granted, it must be presumed, under Code of Civ. Proc. § 657, that it was not based on the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict.

2. Appeal and error ⇨241—Sufficiency of evidence to be reviewed where motion for nonsuit or request for instructed verdict was denied.

On appeal from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial which did not specify the ground, the sufficiency of the evidence can be reviewed where defendant had moved for a new trial at the close of plaintiff's evidence and moved for a directed verdict in his favor at the close of the entire case, which motions were denied.

3. Master and servant ⇨332(1)—Evidence of automobile driver's agency for owner held insufficient for jury.

Where the evidence was undisputed that the driver of an automobile, though he was driving it with the consent of the owner, was doing so for his own purposes, and had never been the agent or the employee of the owner, the inference of agency from the fact of ownership and consent to use of the automobile is not sufficient to contradict that evidence so as to justify refusal of a directed verdict for the owner.

4. Master and servant ⇨330(1)—Automobile driver's agency for consenting owner not presumed.

The conclusion which the jury may draw from the fact that the driver of an automobile with the owner's consent was the agent of the owner is only an inference which they may draw, and not a presumption which they must follow in the absence of conflicting evidence.

5. Master and servant ⇨332(4)—Instruction on evidence of automobile driver's agency for owner held erroneous.

An instruction that proof that defendant was the owner of the automobile which caused plaintiff's injury made a prima facie case that the driver was engaged in his service, and that if the jury found the automobile was not loaned by the owner to the driver they must find for plaintiff, was erroneous, as requiring the jury to draw an inference which they might or might not draw, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1961, and imposing the burden of disproving agency on the owner.

6. Master and servant ⇨330(1)—Automobile driver's agency for owner must be proved.

In an action for personal injuries against the owner of an automobile driven by another, the plaintiff has the burden of proving the driver was the agent of the owner, and the fact that the jury may infer such agency, in the absence of other evidence, from proof of ownership and consent to the taking of the automobile, does not relieve the plaintiff of his burden of establishing that fact by a preponderance of all the evidence on the issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by T. H. Fahey against Winfield Madden and Robert Boen to recover damages for personal injuries. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting the motion of defendant Madden for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Morrissey, of San Francisco, and P. B. Lynch, of Vallejo, for appellant.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. [1] Plaintiff appeals from the order of the trial court granting defendant Madden's motion for a new trial. The motion was made on all the statutory grounds. It appears from the briefs that the only ground argued in support of the motion was the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The order granting a new trial does not specify the ground upon which it was granted and, therefore, under the provisions of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it must be presumed that it was not based upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict.

[2] At the close of plaintiff's case, the respondent moved for a nonsuit, and, after all the evidence of both parties was concluded, he renewed his motion and also requested the court to instruct the jury to find for respondent. Both motions were denied, and the request for an instructed verdict was refused. In reviewing these rulings, notwithstanding the provisions of section 657, the evidence may be examined to ascertain whether it is sufficient to make a prima facie case for the plaintiff. Carter v. Cauty, 181 Cal. 749, 186 Pac. 346; Beeson v. Schloss, 183 Cal. 618, 192 Pac. 292; Williams v. Bullock Tractor Co. (Cal. Sup.) 198 Pac. 780.

The judgment is for personal injuries to plaintiff alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. While walking along the highway the plaintiff was struck by an automobile owned by defendant Madden and being then driven by defendant Boen. It is admitted that Madden was the owner of the automobile and that Boen was driving it with Madden's knowledge and consent. The plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that his injuries resulted from Boen's negligent driving and the amount of damages suffered by plaintiff and then rested.

From the testimony of Boen, Madden, and the persons riding in the car with the former, it appears without contradiction that Boen had arranged to take some young women and their chaperon from Dixon to a basket ball game at Suisun on the evening of the accident; that the automobile in which he intended to take them "got out of commission" after he had made such arrangements; that he endeavored to secure another machine and tried unsuccessfully to hire one from the garage; that he then called Madden on the telephone, explained the circumstances to him, and asked to borrow the latter's car, and that Madden loaned it to Boen for the use stated; that Madden was not invited to go and did not accompany Boen on the trip; that those who rode in the machine did so at Boen's invitation; that Boen had never been employed by Madden and had never driven the latter's machine prior to the time in question; that in driving the car Boen was not on any business for Madden; and that the latter had nothing whatever to do with the matter further than to loan his machine.

[3] The question is whether Boen was operating the automobile as Madden's agent at the time of the accident. It is conceded that such agency may be inferred from proof of Madden's ownership of the car and Boen's operation thereof with the knowledge and consent of the former. Appellant contends that the testimony introduced by the defendants in rebuttal of such prima facie case merely created a conflict, and that it was for the jury to determine whether or not such testimony was sufficient to overcome the inference arising from proof of ownership and operation as aforesaid. The language of some of the decisions lends support to appellant's contention, but the facts stated therein are essentially different from those of the instant case. In McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 Pac. 417, no attempt was made to rebut the inference of agency arising from proof of ownership and permissive use. In denying a hearing the Supreme Court said:

"As we understand the opinion as to the effect of proof that the car in question was owned by the appellant and was being operated by his wife at the time of the accident with his express consent and permission, it is simply that a prima facie case was thereby established, authorizing an inference by court or jury, in the absence of substantial proof to the contrary, that the wife was using the car as the agent of the husband."

In Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 182 Pac. 73, the operator of the car was in the employment of the owner and the testimony tending to rebut the inference of agency was not "free from justifiable doubt." In Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 Pac. 358, the owner was riding in the machine at the time of the accident, but claimed that he had loaned it to the driver and was riding as the latter's guest. The Supreme Court denied a hearing on the single ground that the question of agency "was resolved against appellant on conflicting evidence." In Dierks v. Newsom (Cal. App.) 194 Pac. 518, the evidence offered to rebut the inference of agency was conflicting.

There is no distinction in principle between the case under consideration and that of Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323, 183 Pac. 198. There the plaintiff proved "that the automobile belonged to the appellant and was being operated by its employee at the time of the collision." To meet the prima facie proof of agency so made, the defendant introduced evidence to the effect that at the time of the accident the driver of the automobile "was engaged in a pursuit wholly his own," and that his use of the machine for such purpose was without the consent and against the instructions of the defendant. Respondent there contended that the inference of agency arising from proof of such ownership and use "remained in the case in spite of the clear, positive, and uncontradicted evidence" to the contrary, "and created a substantial conflict in the evidence, with the result that the action of the court in denying a motion for a new trial must be sustained upon appeal." The District Court of Appeal held to the contrary and reversed the judgment. In denying a hearing in the Supreme Court it was said:

"We desire to point out that respondent's prima facie case was based solely on an 'inference,' and not on any 'presumption' declared by law. When we say that a certain inference is warranted by certain facts proved, we mean no more than that the jury is reasonably warranted in making that deduction from those facts. Code Civ. Proc. § 1958. In this case the direct uncontradicted evidence introduced in response to the prima facie case as to the circumstances under which the employee of appellant was driving appellant's automobile was of such a nature as to leave no reasonable ground for an inference based solely on the fact of appellant's ownership of the automobile and the further fact that the person driving was an employee of appellant, that the driver was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident. The verdict, therefore, was contrary to the evidence."

In that case the defendant admitted its ownership of the automobile and that the driver was its employee, but denied that the driver was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident or using the machine for a purpose for which the owner had consented. In this case the respondent admits ownership of the automobile and its use by the operator with respondent's consent, but denies that the operator was acting as respondent's agent at the time of the accident. The principle of law involved is the same in both cases. The question is whether the inference on which the prima facie case of agency is based creates a substantial conflict as against clear, positive, and uncontradicted evidence to the contrary. Evidence could not well be more clear and positive than that given by defendants' witnesses relative to the subject under discussion, and it is apparently free from suspicion. Under such circumstances, it must be held, on the authority of Maupin v. Solomon, supra, that, as to the defendant Madden, it was error to submit the case to the jury. See, also, Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., 39 Cal. App. 738, 179 Pac. 697; Gousse v. Lowe, 41 Cal. App. 715, 183 Pac. 295; Martinelli v. Bond, 42 Cal. App. 209, 183 Pac. 461; Gates v. Pendleton (Cal. Sup.) 195 Pac. 664.

[4] The foregoing authorities establish the proposition that the deduction which the jury may make from proof of ownership of an automobile by one person and its use by another is an inference and not a presumption of law. In his closing brief appellant says:

"If the deduction be an inference, it having its source 'in the reason of the jury,' the jury may or may not make the inference as its reason dictates, even though no controverting evidence be offered. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 178, 116 Pac. 530."

The case cited supports the statement in the brief.

[5] The court instructed the jury at plaintiff's request as follows:

"It is admitted by the pleadings that the defendant Madden was the owner of the automobile at the time of the accident and that the defendant Boen was driving the automobile at the time of the accident with the permission, consent and approval of the defendant Madden. This is prima facie proof that the driver was engaged in the owner's service and a presumption arises that the automobile was in use for the owner's benefit. Testimony that the automobile was loaned to Boen does not, as a matter of law, destroy the presumption unless from the evidence you find that it was loaned as claimed by the defense. If you should find that the said automobile was not loaned to said Boen as claimed by the defense, and if you also find that the injury to Fahey was the result of the negligent operation of the automobile your verdict must be for the plaintiff, and against defendants Madden and Boen unless you further find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence."

To so instruct is to tell the jurors that, from the admitted facts, "in the absence of rebutting evidence they not only may find for plaintiff but must do so, since the jury are bound to find according to the presumption, if not controverted. Code Civ. Proc. § 1961." Davis v. Hearst, supra. The instruction not only states that a presumption of agency arises from the admitted facts but, in plain language, declares that the jury must find for plaintiff on the prima facie showing, in the absence of controverting evidence.

[6] The burden of proof on the issue of agency was on the plaintiff. The effect of the inference arising from the admitted facts was not to shift to the defendant the burden of proving the contrary by a preponderance of the evidence, but the burden remained with the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the whole evidence that at the time of the accident Boen was acting as Madden's agent. Cody v. Market St. Railway Co., 148 Cal. 93, 82 Pac. 666; Koyer v. Willmon, 12 Cal. App. 87, 106 Pac. 599; Onell v. Chappell, 38 Cal. App. 375, 176 Pac. 370; White v. Hines (N. C.) 109 S. E. 31. The error in giving such instruction furnishes sufficient ground for a new trial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HART, J., concurs.

BURNETT, J. I concur upon the ground that the court erred in giving said instruction, and I desire to add a few words in reference to the opinion in Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 Pac. 358. Therein it could be said properly, as pointed out by this court and also by the Supreme Court, that a conflict existed in the showing as to agency. Even if the inference arising from the ownership of the machine should not be considered sufficient when standing alone, it was strengthened by certain circumstances, which are indicated in the opinion. It may be added that an inaccuracy occurred therein in the use of the term "presumption" in the discussion of the proposition. Correctly speaking, it is not a "presumption," but rather an "inference," as clearly shown by the presiding justice in the main opinion herein. The terms are sometimes loosely used as interchangeable, but, of course, there is a clear distinction between them when accurately employed.

56 Cal. App. 659

GRACE et al. v. CRONINGER et al.
(Civ. 3992.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 28, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 27, 1922.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨208(2)—Lease held enforceable against assignees though they procured liquor license in the name of a partner instead of the partnership.

An assigned lease held a completed contract free from conditions or contingencies and binding upon all the parties immediately upon its execution and not rendered ineffectual because a liquor license was not granted to the lessee partnership but only to one of the partners.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨208(2)—Assigned lease for saloon business is enforceable though license was not obtained prior to commencement of term.

An assigned lease of premises held not rendered unenforceable on the theory that it was entered into with the understanding that the assignees were to conduct a saloon business thereon without having a license, merely because the license was not obtained prior to the commencement of the term.

3. Guaranty ⚡78(1)—Guarantor of rent can claim no greater rights than lessee.

In landlord's suit for rent, the guarantor, if entitled to urge all the defenses in law available to the tenants, such as an eviction because of a flooding of premises with sewage, can claim no greater rights.

4. Guaranty ⚡91—In suit against guarantor of rent, evidence held not to show eviction of tenant.

In landlord's action against tenants and guarantor to recover rent, where set-off was claimed by guarantor on account of alleged eviction by flooding with sewage, evidence held to show no eviction of tenants or that they were deprived of the reasonable use and enjoyment of the premises.

5. Guaranty ⚡71—Guarantor of tenant not discharged by landlord's failure to pursue remedies against tenant.

Guarantor of assignees of lease was not discharged from liability for rent by failure of lessor, at his request, to pursue certain remedies against the tenants that were not available to him but were to the lessor.

6. Guaranty ⚡53(2)—Assignment of lease did not release guarantor from liability for rent.

Assignment of lease without lessor's consent did not release lessee's guarantor, where lease required lessor's consent.

7. Guaranty ⚡36(8)—Guarantor of rent held liable under lease and assignment for attorney's fees of landlord.

Where a lease provided that, if the lessor prevailed in any suit brought under it or any provision of it, the lessee should be liable for attorney's fees, and an assignment provided that assignees' guarantor would pay said rent and perform said covenants in case of failure of assignees to do so, the guarantor was liable for attorney's fees, in view of Civ. Code, § 2808.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by Theodosia Cook Grace and husband against Hermann Croninger and others, in which the action was dismissed as to the defendants Jasper Williams, Frank J. Ruhstaller, and Peter Christensen, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants Hermann Croninger and Ernest Mohr, as lessees, and against W. A. Frederick, as grantor, and the latter appeals. Affirmed.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco (C. J. Goodell, of San Francisco, of counsel), for plaintiffs respondents.

Herbert Choynski, Henry L. Corson, and Jos. E. Bien, all of San Francisco, for defendants respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff Theodosia Cook Grace, as the owner and lessor of certain premises situate in the city and county of San Francisco, was given judgment in this action against the defendants Hermann Croninger and Ernest Mohr as lessees, and against W. A. Frederick as guarantor, for the sum of $9,100, due as rent for the use of those premises, together with $750.05 interest, and $910 attorney's fees. From that judgment the defendant Frederick alone appeals. The action was dismissed as against the defendants Williams, Ruhstaller, and Christensen.

The lessees Croninger and Mohr occupied the demised premises under an assigned lease, dated August 6, 1912. Jasper Williams was named therein as the original lessee, and Ruhstaller was his guarantor. On October 15, 1913, said lease was by and with the consent of the owner assigned to Croninger and Mohr, at which time the defendant Frederick became the guarantor. The premises were leased for a period of seven years, commencing on November 1, 1912, at the monthly rental of $650, "for the purpose of therein carrying on the business of a saloon and cigar store and for no other purpose or purposes whatsoever." Croninger and Mohr upon the execution of the assignment went into possession of the premises and under a permit and license issued by the city and county of San Francisco in the name of Croninger alone conducted a saloon therein until the end of July, 1917, at which time Croninger and Mohr sold their interests in said saloon to one Andrew Christensen and attempted to assign to Christensen their interest in said lease. Plaintiff Mrs. Grace repudiates said purported assignment to Christensen, and the trial court found that she was not bound thereby since she had not consented to the assignment nor subsequently ratified the same. Christensen nevertheless thereafter conducted said saloon under license issued in the name of Peter Christensen, and it was while the saloon was thus conducted by Christensen that there was a default in the payment of the rent for which plaintiff in this action was given judgment.

The respective answers of Croninger and Mohr contain no special defenses. They consist merely of denials of their liability for the rent incurred subsequent to the date on which they disposed of their interests to Christensen. The appellant Frederick in his answer has pleaded seven special defenses, three of which have been abandoned, and the trial court found against him on the remaining four. It is upon the findings upon these special defenses, and upon the further ground that the court was without legal authority to incorporate in its judgment an allowance for attorney's fees, that the defendant Frederick appeals.

[1] It is first contended by appellant that the assigned lease from Williams to Croninger and Mohr never became effectual because no liquor license was ever issued to Croninger and Mohr in the firm name, as required by the municipal ordinance. Appellant argues that the assigned lease was inchoate and ineffectual until a license was issued in the joint names of the lessees, which admittedly was not done; the license, as above stated, having been granted to Croninger alone. In support of his position, appellant relies principally upon the case of Smith v. Luning Co., 111 Cal. 308, 43 Pac. 967. We do not consider the case in point. In that case Smith, a street contractor, endeavored to recover upon a contract for the construction of a sewer, and it was held that the instrument sued upon never became a completed contract, not because the plaintiff had not obtained the necessary permit to do the work, as claimed by appellant, but for the simple reason that the contract had not been signed by the requisite number of property owners in that block so as to make it a binding contract. The decision also rested largely upon the ground that the plaintiff Smith had performed no part of the work for which he was endeavoring to collect. In the instant case there was a completed contract, duly signed by the necessary parties, free from any conditions or contingencies, and binding upon all parties immediately upon its execution.

[2] Appellant also contends that the assigned lease is unenforceable because it was entered into with the understanding that the assignees were to carry on an illegal business, that is, the saloon business, without having a license for that purpose. It is the theory of appellant that because the license was not obtained prior to the commencement of the term of the lease it permeated and made void the entire transaction. In this respect appellant cites the following cases: Teachout v. Bogy, 175 Cal. 481, 166 Pac. 319; Riley v. Jordan, 122 Mass. 231; Mound v. Barker, 71 Vt. 253, 44 Atl. 346, 76 Am. St. Rep. 767. But the fatal weakness with that theory lies in the fact that the essential element of the rule announced in those cases is entirely lacking here, namely, that there was an understanding, agreement, or contemplation on the part of the one who seeks to take advantage of the contract or lease that a violation of law was contemplated or was necessarily bound to result from the operation of the business conducted under the lease. There is not the slightest evidence here to the effect that the plaintiff Mrs. Grace, when she consented to the assignment, contemplated or understood that a saloon was to be conducted illegally. The very terms of the lease show that her understanding was exactly to the contrary, for in the lease it is provided that—

The "tenants shall not do anything in the premises * * * which shall conflict * * * with any rules, regulations, or ordinances established by the board of supervisors * * * or any other board or department of the city and county of San Francisco."

The case in this respect is not unlike the case of Burke v. San Francisco Breweries Co., 21 Cal. App. 198, 131 Pac. 83. There the defendant, after leasing certain premises from plaintiff for the purpose of conducting a saloon and lodging house therein, was subsequently denied a renewal of its liquor license by the municipal authorities. Upon that ground defendant sought to evade the payment of the rent, claiming, as is claimed here, "that the contract of lease was against public policy and therefore void from its inception." Such contention was "based upon the assumption that by the terms of the lease the defendant was obligated to continue for the period of five years in a business which might at any time after the execution of the lease be declared unlawful." Such contentions were held unsound, the court saying:

"They are founded upon the rule of law that no recovery can be had by either party to a contract the performance of which involves the violation of an existing law. This rule of law has no application to the facts of the present case. The lease in question does not purport to require the performance of an act in contravention of an existing law."

And then in quoting from a similar case (Burgett v. Loeb, 43 Ind. App. 657, 88 N. E. 346), the court says:

"At the time of entering into the contract, that he [the lessee] might subsequently, by the proper authorities, be denied a license, was a probability well known to him. [Citing cases.] With this knowledge appellant made his terms unconditionally. He took the risk of being held liable for the rents, even though performance became impossible by reason of circumstances beyond his control."

The case of Dunn v. Stegemann, 10 Cal. App. 38, 101 Pac. 25, cited by respondents, serves as a good illustration of the application of the doctrine contended for by appellant. In that case the parties, in the face of the provisions of a municipal ordinance prohibiting saloons within 150 feet of any church or school, entered into a lease for the use of certain premises as a saloon within 150 feet of a church. The court held that the lease had for its very object the violation of law, and it left both parties where it found them.

Appellant has cited cases on two other principles of law, one to the effect that where personal services, such as those of a physician, are performed by a person who has no license to perform the same the services rendered are illegal and no recovery can be had therefor; the other to the effect that when a partnership has been conducted in violation of law the partnership transactions may not become the basis of legal action at the instance of any one of those who have participated in the illegal transactions. Neither of those principles is involved in the case at bar. For the reasons above stated we hold that the assigned lease was legal and binding upon the parties to it.

[3, 4] Appellant next urges that he has been released from liability as a guarantor because, as he claims, the demised premises were through the negligence and fault of the lessor "frequently flooded" with sewage, which interfered with the use of the premises to such an extent as to constitute a breach of the covenants of quiet enjoyment. In this respect appellant contends that as guarantor he is subrogated to all the rights which the tenants may have to any damages sustained by the tenants by reason of said sewage, and may plead and rely upon the same as an offset to the payment of rent. Appellant fixes the amount of those damages in the sum of $10,000. Incidentally, appellant further contends that by reason of those damages the contract has been altered and his remedies have been impaired to such an extent as to release him as guarantor.

Although Croninger and Mohr were likewise sued for the rent, neither of them in their respective answers make any complaint about the sewage, nor do they plead a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment or make any claim as an offset or counterclaim by reason thereof. Conceding, however, the right of appellant as guarantor to plead this defense over the shoulders of his principals, the answer to his contention is that the evidence disclosed by the record is insufficient in law to constitute a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment, and the trial court so found.

The saloon and cigar store in question was located in the basement of a five-story building, the upper floors of which were operated as a hotel. There is one sewer system for the entire building, the drains for the saloon being the last to connect with the building sewer before it empties into the main sewer in the street. On several occasions rags and other debris were carelessly thrown into the sewer, either by the tenants of the hotel or by those using the toilets in the saloon, which caused a stoppage of the sewer below the saloon toilets and thereby caused the water to "back up" through the bowls of the saloon toilets and overflow a portion of the saloon floor. When the overflow came, the toilet doors were immediately locked and remained so until the trouble was relieved, which was usually accomplished by the employees of the saloon by the use of a force pump or by stopping up the outlet to the toilets and thereby preventing further overflow, until the sewer cleared itself. On two occasions, once in 1916, and again in 1918, a plumber was called in, and he relieved the situation by opening up the sewer and removing the rags therefrom. On his first call his work consumed about 2 hours' time, and on the second only 20 minutes; the entire bill for his services and materials aggregating $6.75. The overflow was caused wholly from the improper use of the toilets and not, as appellant contends, from an inadequately and improperly constructed sewer. The evidence fully establishes the fact that the sewer system was standard and modern in every way, adequate in size, and conformed to all municipal requirements. The plumber testified that the trouble was something that was "liable to happen to any system of plumbing." From this and the other proof disclosed by the record we are satisfied that there is ample evidence to support the finding of the trial court that "the overflows were not of long duration nor continuous, but were occasional and of short duration," and that the "flooding" was only "to a small extent." While it may be conceded that appellant, as guarantor, is entitled to urge all of the defenses allowed in law to the tenants, he is entitled to no greater rights, and it is obvious from the acts and conduct of the tenants themselves, both before and after the expiration of the lease, that they did not regard the sewer trouble with any degree of seriousness. They continued to occupy the premises without interruption or threat of abandonment. The doors of the saloon were never closed during the term of the lease, except when the law required all similar places to close, nor did the tenants ever demand a deduction from the rent on account of the sewer, except on one occasion when $50 was withheld for three days from one month's rent. And although both Croninger and Mohr are charged here jointly with Frederick for the default in the rent, they have wholly failed to plead in any of their various answers an offset based upon the sewer trouble. The fact that they have not done so justifies the conclusion that the facts of the case did not authorize such a defense. Callahan v. Loughran, 102 Cal. 476, 36 Pac. 835; Bell v. Haun, 9 Cal. App. 41, 97 Pac. 1126; Evinger v. Moran, 14 Cal. App. 328, 112 Pac. 68. On this branch of the case we fully agree with the conclusions of the trial court that there was no eviction on account of the sewer trouble, nor did it deprive the tenants of the reasonable use and enjoyment of the premises at any time during the period of the lease.

[5] The next and third point made by appellant is that the owner, Mrs. Grace, upon the demand of Frederick, failed to pursue certain remedies that were not available to him but which were available to her, and that her refusal to comply with such demand exonerated him as such guarantor. This contention is based upon the assumption that Frederick was a surety and not a guarantor, but a mere inspection of the terms of the assignment of the lease which Frederick signed will suffice to show that he was a guarantor. S. F. Theological Seminary v. Monterey County G. & E. Co., 179 Cal. 166, 175 Pac. 693. Therefore this point is not available to appellant.

[6] Appellant's fourth point is that Mrs. Grace consented to the assignment of the lease from Croninger and Mohr to Christensen, and thereby released appellant as guarantor. The court found that Mrs. Grace did not consent to such assignment, and the evidence supports this finding. The lease itself provided that it could not be assigned without the written consent of the lessor, which it is conceded was not obtained, and the evidence falls far short of proving that Mrs. Grace, as lessor, afterwards ratified the assignment. German-American Savings Bank v. Gollmer, 155 Cal. 683, 102 Pac. 932, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066.

[7] Lastly, appellant claims that the court erred in charging Frederick with counsel fees. The lease provided:

"In case the lessor prevail in any suit brought by her under this lease or any provision thereof the lessee shall be liable to the lessor for the fees of her attorney in a reasonable amount to be fixed by the court, and the amount so allowed for fees shall be taxed as part of the costs in such suit."

In the assignment of the lease which Frederick signed it was stated:

"And the undersigned, W. A. Frederick, agrees with said Theodosia Cook Grace that in the event of the failure of said Hermann Croninger and Ernest Mohr or either of them to pay any of said rent or perform any of said covenant in said manner, that he, the said W. A. Frederick will pay said rent and perform said covenants at the time and in the manner in said lease provided."

It is apparent from the clause in the lease that Mohr and Croninger were liable for attorney's fees, and the liability of Frederick under the terms of the assignment is commensurate with the liability of Croninger and Mohr. Section 2808, Civ. Code; Bagley v. Cohen, 121 Cal. 606, 53 Pac. 1117.

Judgment affirmed.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT & LAND CO. v. GOLDSCHMIDT et al.
(Civ. 3516; L. A. 7260.)

1. Contracts $\S$ 309(1)—Become inoperative when object becomes unlawful.

A contract which contemplates the doing of a thing, at first lawful, but which afterwards and during the running of the contract term becomes unlawful, ceases to be operative upon the taking of effect of the prohibitory law.

2. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 29(1)—Lease restrictive as to business becomes inoperative on passage of law prohibiting business.

A lease restrictive in its terms as to the business permitted to be done on the premises becomes inoperative upon the event that the law shall prohibit the doing of that business, but such is not true where the reference in the lease to the business to be done is merely permissive.

3. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 199½—Lease held to restrict use of premises to that of winery.

A lease, providing that the "lessees further agree that they will use and occupy the said premises for the purpose of conducting thereon a general winery" and not for any other business, held to restrict the use of the premises to that of conducting a liquor business, and lessees were not liable for rent after the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, in view of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1930.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 199½—Lessees under inoperative lease must surrender premises to escape payment of rent.

Where a lease becomes inoperative by reason of the passage of a law prohibiting the business for which the premises were to be used, the lessees must surrender the premises in order to escape payment of rent after the passage of the prohibitory law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Industrial Development & Land Company against Max Goldschmidt and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Ben F. Gray, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Loewenthal, Collins & Loewenthal and E. B. Coil, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff on the 1st day of July, 1915, leased to defendants certain real property located within the city of Los Angeles. The lease term was five years, at a monthly rental of $250. The purpose for which the defendants desired to use the property was to conduct thereon a winery and wholesale and retail liquor business. In January, 1920, the national prohibition law became effective, which made it unlawful for the defendants to conduct on the leased premises the business referred to. They tendered to the lessor unpaid rental accruing up to the 16th day of January, 1920, amounting to $133.07, which tender was refused, the lessor insisting that the lease was not abrogated, but that it continued binding for the full remainder of the five-year term, notwithstanding the adoption of constitutional amendment No. 18. The trial court sustained the contention of the defendants, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff only for the amount of rental theretofore tendered, no costs being allowed to either side. From that judgment plaintiff has appealed.

[1] Appellant advances first the broad contention that, where a lease of real property is made, binding the lessee to the requirement that he shall not use the property for any other than a specified purpose, even though such use becomes thereafter unlawful as being prohibited by law, the lessee is not relieved from his contract. The second contention is that in no event is a lessee relieved under a lease contract because of the fact that the business to which he desires to devote the property is afterwards prohibited, provided that the lease is not so restrictive in terms as to definitely bind the lessee to one particular use. Authorities may be found which do sustain the first contention advanced by appellant. The leading ones are referred to and cited in Hecht v. Acme Coal Co., 19 Wyo. 18, 113 Pac. 788, 117 Pac. 132, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 773, 777, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 258. Citations to the same conclusion may also be found in the notes appended to the text in 16 R. C. L. p. 742 et seq. In any of these decisions the courts seem to have proceeded upon the assumption that there must be an eviction of the tenant worked through some act of the landlord, before the former can complain, and they declare that such an eviction does not occur where the law operates to take away the right to the particular use; further, that the contingency is one which should have been guarded against by express terms of the lease contract, the omission to provide which will leave the lessee bound for the full term stated in his contract. The opposite view, which is declared in a number of well-considered cases, places the argument upon a sounder basis, and points to a fundamental rule of the law of contracts. A contract in its inception must possess the essentials of having competent parties, a legal object, and a sufficient consideration. Lacking any one of these, no binding obligations result; hence a contract which contemplates the doing of a thing which is unlawful at the time of the making thereof is void. For the same reason a contract which contemplates the doing of a thing, at first lawful, but which afterwards and during the running of the contract term becomes unlawful, is affected in the same way, and ceases to be operative upon the taking effect of a prohibitory law. A number of authorities applicable are cited in the case of Stratford, Inc., v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co., 94 Wash. 125, 162 Pac. 31, L. R. A. 1917C, 931. See, also, to the same point Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co., 98 Wash. 12, 167 Pac. 58.

[2, 3] Concluding, therefore, as we do, that a lease restrictive in its terms as to the business permitted to be done upon the premises becomes inoperative upon the event that the law shall prohibit the doing of that business, we have then to determine whether the conditions of the lease entered into between plaintiff and defendants, in its reference to the business to be done upon the premises, is restrictive or merely permissive. It has been held that, where a lease provided that the lessee "may during the life of this lease" carry on a certain business, such term is permissive and not restrictive, but that where the language was that "the premises are hereby leased to the lessee for the purpose of conducting a saloon and selling liquors at retail therein," such condition is restrictive, and will not permit of any use other than the one referred to. The latter condition was the one considered in Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co., supra. Respondent has cited the case of Security Trust & Savings Bank v. Claussen, decided by this court and reported in 187 Pac. 142. The court there held that a term of the lease was permissive where it provided that premises were to be "used for the purpose of conducting and carrying on the business pertaining to a general retail liquor establishment." The construction given to the language was a liberal one in favor of the lessor, but no doubt expressed the intention of the parties, as it could be gathered from the whole text of the lease contract. As respondent suggests, in a consideration of the question presented here, the terms of section 1930, Civil Code, are not to be left out of view. That section provides as follows:

"When a thing is let for a particular purpose the hirer must not use it for any other purpose; and if he does, he is liable to the letter for all damages resulting from such use, or the letter may treat the contract as thereby rescinded."

In the light of the foregoing observations, we may now examine the terms of the lease contract as it was expressed in the writing which defined the obligation of the parties hereto. We quote those portions of the lease having to do with the restrictive conditions affecting the use to be made of the premises:

"The said lessees further agree that they will use and occupy the said premises for the purpose of conducting thereon a general winery and/or wholesale and/or retail liquor business; * * * and the said lessees further covenant and agree that they will not suffer or permit the said premises or any part thereof to be used for any other purposes than the purposes hereinafter recited; provided that by agreement between the parties hereto said premises may be used for other purposes. * * * The parties of the second part hereby agree that they will, during the term of said lease, well and truly pay or cause to be paid to the said lessor, the said rents at the time and in the manner specified, and will not, without the written consent of the said lessor, let or underlet, or sublet the whole or any part of said premises, or suffer or permit the same to be used by any other person, without the said consent of the said lessor; and it being further provided that in the event the said lessees desire to sublet the said premises or any part thereof, that they shall submit to the lessor herein, the name or names of the proposed subtenants in writing, at least fifteen days prior to the date of the proposed subletting; and in the event that the said subtenants so proposed by party of the second part are not satisfactory to the lessor herein, then and in that event the subletting of the said premises shall not be made; it being agreed, however, that lessor will not withhold his consent to a subletting or a sublease if the proposed business to be carried on is a legitimate one, and the proposed sublessee is responsible and of good character."

It appears from the terms quoted that the lessees agreed not to use the premises for purposes other than those enumerated. Such a condition most certainly is restrictive in character. The condition that the parties might by agreement provide for other uses to be made of the premises is entitled to no weight in determining the character of the condition, for had the added term been omitted entirely, the parties might, of course, at their option, change the terms of the lease by supplemental agreement. The restrictive clauses make it appear definitely enough that the lessees were bound to use the premises for the purpose of conducting a winery or wholesale or retail liquor business, or for all of such purposes, and that such uses could not be varied at their option. The lessor could arbitrarily refuse to permit any change to be made in such use while the defendants were occupying his land. The conditions as to subletting we do not think can be considered as modifying or changing this restriction as to the defendants' use in any manner whatsoever. In our opinion the trial judge correctly determined that the lease became inoperative as against these defendants on the taking effect of the prohibition amendment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court is denied. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal declares that the obligation of the defendants to pay the rent agreed upon became inoperative when the business to be carried on by the lessees in the premises became unlawful by reason of a law enacted after the term began. It does not mention the fact, agreed to by the parties and found by the lower court, that when such law took effect the defendants, because of the effect of such law, vacated the premises, surrendered them to the plaintiff, and never afterwards occupied or used the same. We are satisfied with the judgment denying a recovery to the plaintiff for the rent accruing after the vacation and surrender of the premises to the landlord. The opinion might be understood to hold that the lessee, in such a case, could continue to hold possession of the premises after the prescribed business became unlawful, and escape payment of the rent on the ground of such illegality, without surrendering to the lessor. We do not think this is the law, and the opinion must not be so understood.

STANDARD IRON WORKS v. MARYLAND CASUALTY CO. (Civ. 4153.)

1. Mechanics' liens §317—Subcontractor may sue surety on contractor's bond without filing lien.

A subcontractor may bring suit to enforce its claim for work done and materials furnished against the surety on the contractor's bond, without having filed a lien.

2. Appeal and error §768—Appellant's statement as to when complaint was filed accepted as correct where not denied in reply brief.

Where the record does not show when the original complaint was filed, but plaintiff's statement as to the date of filing is not denied in defendant's reply brief, the court will accept such statement as correct.

3. Mechanics' liens §317—Complaint filed by subcontractor against sureties on contractor's bond within 120 days after notice of completion of building held in time.

Under a contractor's bond, conditioned as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, for the payment of subcontractor's claims, and requiring that suit on the bond be instituted "within the time allowed by law for instituting suit to enforce a lien claim," which under section 1190, must be within 90 days from the filing thereof, a complaint filed by a subcontractor, who filed no lien claim, after the expiration of 90 days, but before the expiration of 120 days from the filing of notice of the completion of the building, was in time, as the limitation did not begin to run until the expiration of the 30 days allowed for filing the lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by the Standard Iron Works against the Maryland Casualty Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Arthur F. H. Wright, City Atty., of San Diego, for appellant.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to reform a bond, and to recover against the surety on the bond as reformed the contract price for furnishing and installing an elevator.

On August 21, 1919, B. F. Decker entered into an agreement with two certain persons to repair, add to, and alter a certain building in the city of San Diego known as the French Laundry. The plaintiff, Standard Iron Works, as a subcontractor, furnished and installed an elevator in said building under a contract so to do, but was not paid therefor. A bond had been furnished to the owners of the building by B. F. Decker, the original contractor, with the defendant Maryland Casualty Company, as surety thereon. This bond was conditioned, as required by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the payment of the claims of persons performing labor or furnishing materials upon said work, and it gives to such persons a right of action upon the bond directly or in any suit brought to foreclose the liens provided for by law. Said bond contains this provision:

"That any suit brought on this bond to recover any claim hereunder must be instituted within the time allowed by law for instituting a suit to enforce a lien claim."

[1] The alterations and additions to the building were completed early in December, 1919, and notice of completion was recorded December 15, 1919. The plaintiff filed no lien, and brings this suit to enforce its claim against the surety on the bond, a course of procedure sanctioned in this state. General El. Co. v. American Bonding Co., 180 Cal. 675, 182 Pac. 444.

[2] The record does not show when the original complaint was filed, but plaintiff states that it was filed April 8, 1920, and, as this statement is not denied in defendant's reply brief, we will accept it as stating the fact correctly. On September 20, 1920, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, alleging that a mistake in the description of the premises concerned had been made by all of the parties to the bond and contract, and, in addition to praying judgment for the value of the elevator furnished, asked that the bond be reformed to conform to the facts alleged.

[3] Upon plaintiff closing its case, having shown the facts to be as above stated, a motion for nonsuit was made by the defendant, which was granted on the ground that suit was not commenced upon the bond within 90 days from the filing of the notice of completion of the contract. It will thus be seen that the plaintiff filed its complaint after the expiration of 90 days, but before the expiration of 120 days, from the filing of notice of completion of the building; and the principal question for determination is, Was the action commenced in time in view of the above-quoted provision in the bond?

As we have seen, the bond provides that any suit brought thereon to recover any claim thereunder must be instituted within the time allowed by law for instituting a suit to enforce a lien claim. The time allowed for commencing an action to enforce a lien claim is 90 days from the filing of the claim of lien (Code Civ. Proc. § 1190); and the difficulty in the case at bar is to apply such provision to an action directly on the claim where no lien has been filed, and where, consequently, the starting point of the 90-day period is not precisely determined by that event.

It is argued by the respondent—and this view was adopted by the trial court—that the language found in the bond, "time allowed by law for instituting a suit to enforce a lien," is merely equivalent to the words "90 days," and, no lien having been filed, the 90-day period starts with the recording of notice of completion of the work. The appellant, on the other hand, contends that the language quoted from the bond contemplates the inclusion not only of the 90 days after the filing of the lien, but also of the time allowed for such filing.

We think the construction contended for by the respondent is too narrow. If the intention of the parties to the bond was to limit the time for commencing an action upon a claim as to which no lien had been created to 90 days from the recording of notice of the completion of the work, that intention could readily have been expressed without the slightest ambiguity. In adopting the language they did, their intention was to place the two kinds of action in the same situation as regards the time of commencement; in other words, the limit of time within which an action to foreclose a lien might be brought being 90 days after its filing, which period, however, might start to run at any time within 30 days of the notice of completion of the work, depending upon the date of the filing of the lien within said 30 days, the ultimate limit of time within which a suit to foreclose the lien could be brought is 30 plus 90 days. Broadly speaking, this is the time allowed by law for instituting an action to foreclose a lien; and, as the parties to the bond, instead of designating a definite number of days for the commencement of an action directly upon the claim, attempted to limit it by a reference to a particular situation, we must take that situation as the measure to be applied. Its application warrants a maximum allowance of 30 plus 90 days for the bringing of the action here in question. There is certainly nothing in the language of the bond to disclose an intention that the latter sort of action must be brought within less time than the foreclosure suit would ordinarily be commenced in. It seems reasonable to suppose that the difference in the situation of the two actions in respect of the absence of a point of departure for the period allowed for the commencement of an action directly on the claim was not present to the minds of the parties to the bond, but that what was present was the general situation that the law had set a limit upon the time within which the foreclosure suit might be commenced, and they wished to make such provision applicable to a direct action on the claim. It must be borne in mind that, in the absence of this provision of the bond, such an action would be governed by the general provisions of the Code; and while the obligor in a bond may within reasonable limits stipulate for a shorter time, there is a point which would be held to be unreasonable; and, as between the respective periods contended for in the present case, that insisted upon by the appellant has at least the advantage of greater reasonableness.

We conclude that, as the present action was brought within 120 days from the recording of notice of completion of the work, it was in time, and that the court's action in granting a nonsuit based upon this ground was erroneous.

Other points are made by the respondent which he claims support the order granting said motion. We have examined them, and, having found them to be without substantial merit, no discussion of them is necessary.

For the reason given, the judgment is reversed.

GOODWIN v. GROSSE. (Civ. 3464.)

1. Landlord and tenant §112(2)—Lessor may waive forfeiture by accepting rent with full knowledge of breach of covenant.

A lessor, having the right to forfeit the lease and terminate the tenancy because of a subletting without his written consent, may waive the forfeiture by accepting the rent with full knowledge of the subletting.

2. Landlord and tenant §112(2)—Knowledge of occupation of premises by sublessees held not to constitute knowledge of sublease.

That lessor's agent was told by one of lessee's sublessees that they had located in lessee's building until they could get a storeroom for the lease of which they were negotiating with lessor was insufficient to apprise such agent that lessee had executed a sublease so as to impute such knowledge to lessor and constitute the acceptance of rent by her a waiver of a forfeiture arising therefrom; such fact being consistent with and indicating a temporary arrangement only under a license from lessor.

3. Landlord and tenant §112(2)—Evidence sufficient to show that lessor had no knowledge of sublease before accepting rent; "waiver."

In an action of unlawful detainer for subletting without lessor's written consent, evidence held sufficient to support the court's findings that plaintiff had no notice or knowledge of such subletting before accepting an installment of rent, and hence did not waive her right of forfeiture; a "waiver" being the relinquishment of a known right.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Waiver.]

4. Landlord and tenant §112(1)—Lessor need not notify lessee against subletting contrary to covenants.

Under a lease prohibiting subletting without lessor's written consent, lessor was not required to notify lessee that she would insist on strict performance of the covenants before exercising her right of forfeiture for a breach thereof; she having the right to assume that lessee would comply therewith.

5. Landlord and tenant §112(1)—Lessor not estopped to object to subletting by failure to object to previous subletting to another.

That lessor, with notice of a sublease made without her written consent, as required by the lease, interposed no objection, did not estop her from objecting to a subsequent subletting to others.

6. Landlord and tenant §112(1)—Lessor not estopped to assert forfeiture by collecting agent's unauthorized statements.

Under a lease prohibiting subletting without lessor's written consent statements of an agent authorized only to collect rents that no objection would be made to lessee's subletting if he remained on the premises did not estop lessor from asserting her right of forfeiture, in the absence of ratification.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Abbie A. Goodwin against Charles E. Grosse. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wilton W. Webster, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Chas. W. Fournl, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff had judgment in an action for unlawful detainer, from which defendant has appealed.

It appears that plaintiff by a written lease let and demised to defendant certain premises consisting of two storerooms, one of which is designated as 66 North Broadway, in Pasadena, for a term of one year from October 31, 1919. This lease contained a provision as follows:

"It is understood and agreed that the party of the second part [the lessee] shall not assign or transfer this lease, nor sublet any portion of the premises without the written consent of the party of the first part; and furthermore that any attempted assignment or transfer of this lease, or any attempted subletting of said premises, without such written consent, shall be void. It is agreed and understood that if any * * * default be made in any of the covenants herein contained, it shall then be lawful for the party of the first part to re-enter said premises and to remove all persons therefrom."

It further appearing without controversy that on May 1, 1920, during the term for which the premises were so let and demised to defendant, and while he was occupying the same under the terms and conditions of said lease, he, without obtaining any written consent of plaintiff so to do, executed a written lease to Brinley Bros. whereby he demised and let unto them, for a term ending October 31, 1920 a part of said premises, to wit, those designated as No. 66 North Broadway; that on June 14, 1920, plaintiff caused to be served upon defendant a written notice of the termination of tenancy, alleging as a ground therefor the breach of the covenant contained in said lease whereby it was agreed that no part of the premises should be sublet without her written consent; and thereafter, to wit, on June 28, 1920, caused to be served upon defendant a three-day notice to quit the premises.

In his answer defendant, in substance, alleged that in the collection of rents and in all matters connected with the lease and defendant's acts thereunder, one H. F. Newell was plaintiff's agent; that as such agent Newell assured him there would be no objection to his subletting the premises to any one so long as defendant remained upon the premises; that thereafter, to wit, on May 1, 1920, defendant, acting in reliance upon the repeated assurances given by Newell as agent of plaintiff to the effect that there would be no objection to his subletting the premises so long as defendant remained thereon, sublet a portion of the same to Brinley Bros.; that for two or three weeks prior to the 1st day of June, 1920, Newell as such agent had actual knowledge of the subletting to Brinley Bros., and that plaintiff prior to June 1, 1920, had knowledge of such fact; that with such knowledge Newell as agent of plaintiff, without objection, did on June 1, 1920, accept the rent for the month expiring July 1st thereafter, and made no objection to the subletting of which he had knowledge; and, further, that prior to the 1st day of June, 1920, plaintiff had knowledge of all the facts relating to the act of defendant in subleasing a part of the premises, and sanctioned and ratified the making of the same, and that the acts of defendant in so doing were had and done because of and in reliance upon the representations and conduct of plaintiff herein and her agent; as to all of which facts, other than that Newell was agent of plaintiff in the collection of the rental, the court found adversely to defendant.

Claiming that such findings are unsupported by the evidence, appellant insists: First, that the right of forfeiture, as disclosed by the testimony, was waived by acceptance of rent with notice of the subletting; second, that respondent is estopped from declaring a forfeiture; and, third, that the subletting was ratified by respondent.

[1] It is true, as held in numerous cases (among which see Jones v. Durrer, 96 Cal. 99, 30 Pac. 1027; Randol v. Tatum, 98 Cal. 390, 33 Pac. 433; Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 321, 104 Pac. 995; Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751), that a lessor, having the right under the terms of a lease to forfeit the same and terminate the tenancy because of a subletting without the written consent of the lessor may, nevertheless, waive the same by an acceptance of rent from the lessee with full knowledge of the subletting or other facts constituting the breach of a covenant for which a forfeiture may be had. This principle, however, is not applicable to the facts, as found by the court, that Newell had not, as alleged, been informed prior to May 1st that defendant contemplated the execution of such sublease or any sublease and that neither plaintiff nor her agent had any notice or knowledge prior to June 1, 1920, when the rent was accepted for the month of June, of the making of the sublease, and that said agent did not assure defendant at any time or at all that the subletting of the property would be without objection on the part of plaintiff so long as defendant personally remained upon said premises, and that defendant's act in subletting a portion of the premises to Brinley Bros. for six months was not done in reliance upon any assurances given by said agent that there would be no objection to the same, providing he remained upon the premises, and that plaintiff never consented to, sanctioned, or ratified the subletting, nor were the acts of defendant in so doing done in reliance upon any representation, permission, or conduct of plaintiff or her agent.

[2, 3] In our opinion, the evidence is ample to support the facts so found. The testimony of plaintiff, in most positive terms, is that she never learned that Brinley Bros. were in occupation of a part of the premises under sublease or otherwise, until about June 5th, after the rent for such month had been paid, and that at the time of the acceptance thereof she had no notice, knowledge, or information to the effect that defendant had violated the covenant of the lease for which the forfeiture is claimed. Appellant, however, insists that Newell as agent was cognizant of the subletting, and that his knowledge must be imputed to his principal. This contention is based, not upon testimony showing actual knowledge of such fact on the part of Newell, but it is claimed that such conclusion is the fair inference from his testimony. As to this, it appears that Newell, meeting one of the Brinley brothers, was told by him that they had vacated their old quarters, and located in the building with Mr. Grosse until they could get the storeroom designated as No. 68 North Broadway, owned by plaintiff, and for the leasing of which they had been negotiating. There was nothing in this information to apprise Newell of the fact that defendant had executed the sublease. Such fact was entirely consistent with and indicated a temporary arrangement only, under license from defendant, as distinguished from a sublease. Shaw v. Caldwell, 16 Cal. App. 7, 115 Pac. 941; St. Louis U. Trust Co. v. Galloway (C. C.) 193 Fed. 106.

stress upon the fact that plaintiff never notified defendant that she would insist upon a strict performance of the covenants of the lease. Such act on her part was unnecessary. She had the right to assume that defendant would comply with his covenant not to sublease the property without her written consent and thus divest himself of all right to possession and control of the premises. Assuming that Newell as her agent was cognizant of the fact that Brinley Bros. were occupying a part of the premises, and that plaintiff was thereby chargeable with notice, the information obtained was wholly consistent with the fact that they were not in possession under a lease giving them the exclusive possession and control of the premises so occupied, but under a license for temporary occupation from the defendant.

[5, 6] The claim that plaintiff is estopped from insisting upon the forfeiture of the lease is based upon the alleged fact that Newell, as agent of plaintiff, assured defendant that no objection would be made by plaintiff to his subletting the property, provided he remained on the premises, and that, acting thereon, he had theretofore leased a part of the premises to one Foulke, who was a dealer in automobiles. Not only did Newell deny making the statements so attributed to him by defendant, which fact is sufficient to support the finding, but, assuming that plaintiff, having notice of the sublease to Foulke, interposed no objection thereto, she was not estopped by reason thereof to object to the subsequent subletting of the property to Brinley Bros. The character of the business conducted by Foulke may have been wholly unobjectionable, and that of Brinley Bros., engaged in the repair of automobiles, have been most damaging to the property. "The breach of a covenant against subletting is not a continuing one so far as there is only one subletting, but a lessor does not, by waiving his re-entry on one underletting, lose his right to re-enter on a subsequent underletting." 24 Cyc. 1363, and cases there cited. Moreover, the extent of the agent's authority was to collect the rents due from defendant to plaintiff, and since under the terms of the lease defendant could not sublet the property without the written consent of plaintiff, the acts of such agent, standing alone, could not estop plaintiff from asserting her rights.

From what is said, it is apparent there was no ratification on the part of plaintiff of defendant's act.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Leonard E. Sauble against the Gary South Coast Agency. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Spencer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. H. Harris, of Los Angeles, and Clyde R. Moody, of San Fernando, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $1,200 alleged to be owing to him on a contract. The judgment was in his favor for the amount prayed for, and the defendant has appealed.

About the latter part of January, 1920, the plaintiff bargained with the defendant for the purchase of a truck. This truck he desired to operate for the purpose of earning his livelihood. At the time the negotiations with defendant were had, plaintiff owned an old truck which he offered to have credited upon account of the purchase of the one defendant was proposing to furnish him. It was finally agreed that the old truck should be received by the defendant at a price of $1,000; that the plaintiff should add thereto the sum of $200 in cash; and that this amount of $1,200 should constitute the first payment on the truck purchased, the full price of which was $3,750. This latter truck was not a new one and was not so understood to be by the plaintiff. The transaction was closed and a written contract signed which contained various terms, including stating the dates upon which installment payments were to be made, the amount due monthly as set forth therein being $212.50. The written contract in one of its terms declared that, "It is agreed that said motor truck is now in good repair and condition." The agreement contained other terms such as are commonly used in conditional sales contracts, such as that reserving title in the vendor until the full amount of the purchase price had been paid, and giving vendor the right to retake the property upon the happening of any default in the matter of payment of the installments. After receiving the truck, the plaintiff started to drive with it to a neighboring town. He had not gone far before the motor became disabled and the truck was towed back to defendant's place of business. The truck being again delivered to him, he attempted to operate it at his work, when, as he stated, another "bearing burned out," and it was once more returned to defendant's shops. The burning out of the bearings, according to the plaintiff's testimony, was due to the failure of the mechanics to make necessary oil connections in the motor. After receiving the truck the third time, the plaintiff again went to work with it, whereupon the gears refused to hold and upon being taken, at defendant's direction, to a machine shop, it was found that some of the parts thereof were so badly worn as to prevent the gears from performing their function. At this point the plaintiff requested the defendant to take back the truck and sell it, which he says it agreed to do. It is a fact that the truck was not again in the hands of plaintiff, but remained wholly under the control of the defendant, except as we will hereinafter state.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that defendant agreed to rescind the contract as made, to resell the truck, and return to him $1,200. Defendant in its answer denied that any rescission of the contract had been made, and in connection with that denial alleged that—

"Defendant admits that plaintiff delivered said truck to it on or about March 1, 1920, but denies that it was in conformity with the agreement alleged in plaintiff's complaint."

In a further and separate defense alleged in the answer defendant stated:

"Defendant admits, for the purpose of this defense, that it did promise and agree with plaintiff to endeavor to sell said truck, and that if it did resell the same in a reasonable time it would return or refund to plaintiff all sums which it might find it had received over and above any balance due on said contract, plus all costs and expenses of reselling said truck; that said agreement was made on the express condition that plaintiff would make and pay the installments on his said contract; that defendant did endeavor to resell said truck, but did not do so until after June 7, 1920."

These allegations of the answer show at least a conditional rescission. Early in March the defendant delivered the truck to one Hayden and received from him $350, issuing a receipt therefor which recited that—

Said sum was received "as a deposit on the purchase of one White truck with the special agreement that if said truck cannot be placed on steady work within a period of thirty days, then the above amount to be returned to him, less what the truck had earned, less oil, gas, running expenses."

The receipt bore date of March 4th. The purchase price was $4,000. Hayden retained the truck and later a more complete contract was entered into for the sale of the vehicle. Hayden, being called as a witness, testified regarding the contract made with the defendant for the purchase of the truck that—

"The first payment on the truck was to be $1,300, if I kept it, and we made an agreement that I was to give them $350 and the balance of it would be taken out of the earnings of the truck until the $1,300 was paid; but later on, I think it was in June, they agreed to let me have the truck at $750 the first payment, which I paid them, but I didn't get my contract until some time in July."

The same witness testified that "around the 1st of July," as he remembered it, a salesman of the defendant came and asked to be allowed to take the truck, saying that he was going to deliver it to "Mr. Sauble," the plaintiff here, "and, in the event that Mr. Sauble wanted to keep it, he wanted to know if it would be agreeable with me, and I told him yes; he said, 'If he don't want it, shall I bring it back to you?' and I said, 'Yes.'" The wife of the plaintiff testified that about the 12th of March she called at the place of business of the defendant and had a conversation with a Mr. Haight (he being the secretary-treasurer of the defendant corporation and the person who executed the contract with the plaintiff on behalf of his company), also with one Garfield, who was sales manager; that she inquired of them regarding the sale of the truck and wanted to know if the defendant could not advance some money; that Haight referred her to Garfield, saying that the latter was more conversant with the case than he was, whereupon Garfield came in and, upon being acquainted with the purpose of Mrs. Sauble's visit, said:

"We are doing our best, Mrs. Sauble, to sell that truck, and when we sell it we are going to give you—Mr. Sauble—his $1,200 initial payment and only payment. $1,200 was the initial payment of the truck, and we want to pay him his first money then and get our money out of the truck, as soon as we sell it." I says, 'Well, that doesn't give us our money now.' And he says: 'No, that doesn't. It isn't going to cost Mr. Sauble one cent, not one cent.' Mr. Haight spoke up and said, 'Well, it is out on work now and has been for three or four days.'"

A witness for the defendant testified that about the first of June, 1920, he took the truck in question to the place of residence of plaintiff, left it across the street, and served upon plaintiff a notice which was signed by defendant corporation, by Haight, secretary. The notice was as follows:

"We hand you herewith statement of your account to June 1st, 1920, on account of a used White dump truck purchased from us, and have to advise you that unless payments on your contract are made within three days after the first day of June, we shall immediately declare all your rights to said truck forfeited and the truck will be sold for cost."

It will be remembered that a sale agreement had been made in March preceding between the defendant and Hayden, and that Hayden had had possession of the truck continuously under such agreement up to the time that the defendant came and got it for the purpose, as Hayden was informed, of offering it to the plaintiff. The witness who served the last demand upon the plaintiff did not testify that he offered to deliver the truck to the plaintiff, but testified that when he served the demand he did not show the truck to the former.

[1] Plainly enough it appears to us that the evidence as shown in the record was ample to sustain the judgment, and we find no errors of law which furnish any impediment to the making of an order of affirmance. The defendant offered no testimony at all contradicting the statements made by the plaintiff as to the defective condition of the truck, or as to the understanding that was had when the plaintiff last surrendered possession of the truck to it. By its answer it admitted that a conditional rescission was made—that is, that it did receive the truck back with the agreement to resell the same and refund to plaintiff the amount paid, alleging as an added condition, however, that the plaintiff should be required to pay all installments as they became due under the contract. There was no evidence to support the allegation as to such a condition having been imposed, and, in order to give any effect to it at all, we would be required to hold that all of the terms of the original contract remained in force, notwithstanding the surrender to and acceptance by the defendant of the truck, and this only upon the ground that the oral agreement was ineffectual to work a modification of the original contract. A vendor and vendee may effect a rescission of a written contract of sale by the vendee surrendering up the thing purchased and the vendor accepting the same, and an agreement on the part of the latter to refund the purchase price may then be enforced. Section 1691, Civ. Code. If we concede that the rescission was conditional and that the defendant would have had the right to return the truck to the plaintiff and require him to discharge the obligations of the original contract, nevertheless the defendant would become bound and the rescission effective whenever the latter made sale of the truck to a third person. This the defendant did, by entering into the agreement with Hayden early in March and delivering the truck to the latter, who continued to have its possession and use it up to the time of the trial of the action, except for the temporary interval when the defendant took it at the time a settlement was demanded of the plaintiff in the manner already disclosed. The court was warranted in assuming that this temporary surrender was a mere borrowing done for the purpose of making a perfunctory technical showing of a readiness to deliver the truck to plaintiff. If defendant chose to make a conditional sale to Hayden upon terms of credit of its own choosing, the responsibility for such act was its own, and the plaintiff was not required to wait to see whether the proposed purchaser complied with the terms of his contract. The defendant, in reselling the truck, assumed complete ownership of it and thereby ratified the rescission of plaintiff's contract, if the rescission had not already become effective.

[2] The claim of appellant that the persons who assumed to act for defendant corporation were without authority to bind the latter is without merit. The persons with whom plaintiff dealt were those placed in charge of the business of the defendant. They were respectively the sales manager and the secretary-treasurer of the corporation. Plaintiff dealt with them in making his contract for the purchase of the truck, and he dealt with the same persons in making the contract for the surrender of the vehicle. The corporation, by every indication which the evidence shows, held out the two persons as being clothed with all necessary authority to negotiate sales of its trucks, and it would be estopped thereby from denying that authority existed in them to do any of the acts herein concerned.

The findings of the trial judge were responsive to the issues made by the pleadings and are sufficient to sustain the judgment. We find no errors in the court's rulings as to the admission or rejection of evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 514(1) — Reassessment covering work not included in resolution of intention held valid.

A reassessment for street work under Street Work Act 1913, $\S$ 12 $\frac{1}{4}$ was valid, though the original assessment was void because the plans and specifications included more work than that described in the resolution of intention.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1170(3)—Erroneous ruling as to pleading not reversible in absence of miscarriage of justice.

Overruling of objection to admission of evidence in an action to foreclose a lien under the Street Work Act because the complaint set out warrant containing notice that bonds would issue in certain event without alleging that a bond did issue touched a question concerning which pleaders might reasonably differ, and does not require a reversal, in the absence of a miscarriage of justice, under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4 $\frac{1}{2}$.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Peter L. Ferry against William O'Brien, Winifred F. Marr and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Winifred F. Marr, in pro. per.

Hartley Shaw, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. The following portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, Division 1, covering the facts of the case, and decisive of the main issues arising upon the trial and upon appeal, is hereby adopted as the opinion of this court:

"This is an action to foreclose a lien claimed by reason of an assessment for street work alleged to have been done under contract pursuant to the procedure outlined in the street work act of 1885, commonly known as the 'Vrooman Act,' St. 1885, p. 147. The defendant Winifred F. Marr appeals from the judgment.

"On the 8th day of February, 1915, the board of trustees of the city of Glendale adopted a resolution declaring its intention to order improvements as follows: That a bridge be constructed upon a portion of the roadway of Canada boulevard, across the Verdugo wash, in that city; also that a channel 50 feet in width be graded in the Verdugo wash from a point 150 feet northeasterly from the center point of the bridge to a point 585 feet southwesterly from the center point of the bridge; also that the banks of said channel be protected by levees, 'said grading, protection work and bridge to be constructed in accordance with plans Number 171 and 172 and special specifications adopted for said work by said board of trustees.' The resolution declared that the contemplated work was of more than local or ordinary public benefit, and expressed the in-

Rehearing Denied May 11, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 314—Plans and specifications for street improvements must conform to description in resolution of intention.

Under the Street Work Act of 1885, commonly known as the Vrooman Act, plans and specifications for street improvement, when prepared must conform to and be consistent with the description in the resolution of intention, and the fact that plans and specifications include more work than that directly described in the resolution, is not sufficient to extend the terms of the resolution so as to include the additional work.

2. Constitutional law $\S$ 290(3) — Municipal corporations $\S$ 407(1) — Legislature may provide that street work be ordered without notice, but assessments cannot be so made.

Though the Legislature may authorize an order for street improvement without notice, it cannot authorize an assessment to be made without notice, giving the property owner an rention of the board to create an assessment district, including the territory benefited by the improvement and to be assessed to pay the costs and expenses thereof. It was stated in the resolution that the plans, profiles, and specifications therein mentioned were thereby referred to 'for a more particular description of said work and made a part hereof.' It was also declared to be the intention to issue serial bonds representing the assessments in accordance with the provisions of the Street Bond Act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 33) as then in force. The subsequent resolution ordering said work, and the notices thereof, followed the resolution of intention in its statement that said channel was to commence at 'a point 150 feet northeasterly' from the center point of said bridge. The plans referred to in said resolution of intention showed that said channel was to commence 'at a point 1,500 feet northeasterly from the center point of said bridge.' The resolution was duly published, and thereafter it was ordered that the work be done. Notices inviting bids having been duly published, the contract for the work was entered into by plaintiff's assignor as contractor, and the work was performed in accordance with the terms of the contract. That contract provided for the channel work to commence at a point 1,500 feet northeasterly from the center point of the bridge. In other words, the channel contracted for extended to and included a distance of 1,350 feet, as indicated in the plans, notwithstanding the fact that this portion of the work had been omitted from the resolution of intention and from the resolution ordering the work, and from the notices thereof. The work described in the contract having been completed and accepted, an assessment was made and a diagram and warrant were issued in the usual form and recorded on November 26, 1915. After demand made for payment of assessments, as required by law, a return was made and recorded in due form. The assessment shown against the property of appellant was the sum of $81.60, and the return showed the same to be wholly unpaid.

"On the 21st day of February, 1916, pursuant to petition filed by and on behalf of the contractor and its assignee, the board of trustees duly adopted a resolution whereby it found and declared that said assessment was invalid for the reason that the ordinance and notices were incorrectly passed, published, and given, as set forth in said petition, and set aside said former assessment, and ordered the superintendent of streets to issue a new assessment and warrant for the costs and expenses of the said work, which had been theretofore done, describing said work according to the description contained in the contract, and directed that a reassessment be made on the land in the district therein described, which the board by said resolution found and declared to be that actually benefited by said improvement, and which was the same district described in the original resolution of intention; and further directed that said reassessment be based upon the special and peculiar benefit to the respective lots, pieces, and parcels of land assessed at the time of making the reassessment, and that this total amount should not exceed the total amount of the original assessment. In accordance with said resolution of February 21, 1916, reassessment was made conforming to the requirements of said resolution. This reassessment, together with the necessary diagram, was made, approved, indorsed, and filed. Thereupon the board of trustees fixed a time for hearing on said reassessment and caused notice to be given and published of the time and place of the hearing, which notice described the work and the district on which the reassessment was made. At the time and place so fixed for said hearing, the board of trustees heard and considered the said reassessment and all objections thereto and adopted a resolution whereby it overruled and denied all objections to said reassessment and approved and confirmed said reassessment as filed and presented. Thereafter a warrant was issued and attached to the reassessment and after being recorded these documents were delivered to the assignee of the contractor. After demand made in due form, upon the land of appellant, as well as upon the other premises covered by the reassessment, a return was made and recorded upon which it appeared that the assessment against appellant's property was wholly unpaid. Thereafter the plaintiff prosecuted this action for the enforcement of the lien claimed against the property of appellant.

[1] "It seems to be conceded that the original assessment was void by reason of the fact that the resolution of intention did not include in its description all of the work on account of which that assessment was made. The fact that the plans and specifications included more work than that which was directly described in the resolution of intention was not sufficient to extend the terms of the resolution so as to include such additional work. Such plans and specifications when prepared must conform to and be consistent with the description in the resolution of intention. Fay v. Reed, 128 Cal. 357, 361, 60 Pac. 927; Bay Rock Co. v. Bell, 133 Cal. 150, 152, 65 Pac. 299.

"Respondent's claim of lien is rested upon alleged compliance with the provisions for reassessment as stated in section 12¼ of the Street Work Act, added to said act in the year 1913, Stats. 1913, p. 409. It is therein provided as follows: 'The city council may, at the request of the contractor, his assigns or the holder of the bonds representing the assessments, by resolution duly passed, set aside any assessment or assessments and bonds, as the case may be, and order a new assessment or assessments and bonds, to be made and issued without any decree having been obtained of or from any court regarding said matter, if in its opinion the assessment be invalid, and it may take all necessary steps and make and pass all necessary orders or ordinances to reassess and relevy such assessment, and may reassess and relevy the same with the same force and effect as an original levy. Such reassessment, whether made after decree of court has been rendered, or pursuant to a resolution of the council, shall be based upon the special and peculiar benefit of the work or improvement to the respective lots, pieces, or parcels of land assessed at the time of the making of the reassessment, and its total amount shall not exceed the total amount of the original assessments. Such reassessment so made shall become a charge upon the property upon which the same is levied, notwithstanding any omission, failure or neglect of any officer, body or person to comply with the provisions of this statute, relating to or connected with the improvement and the issuing of the assessment or the bonds, and notwithstanding the fact that the proceedings of the city council, board of public works or any officer of the city or agent of the contractor or other person connected with such work, may have been irregular, illegal, informal, or defective, or not in full conformity with the requirements of this statute. It is hereby declared to be the true intent and meaning of this section to make the cost and expense of all local improvements actually made in the attempted exercise of the powers conferred upon municipalities under this statute, payable by the real estate benefited by such improvement by making a reassessment therefor which shall equitably apportion to each lot, piece or parcel of land thereby benefited the amount of the actual benefits derived from said improvement, notwithstanding that the proceedings of the city council and other officers or agents of the city, or of the contractor, may have been irregular, illegal or defective, or not in full conformity with the requirements of this statute. Such reassessment shall be made without a repetition of the proceedings had prior to the issuance of the assessment and shall be made and issued in the following manner: The superintendent of streets shall, upon the entering of a decree of court directing the reassessment, or upon the passage of a resolution of the city council directing a reassessment, proceed at once to make a reassessment in accordance with the said decree of court, or said resolution of the city council. Such reassessment shall be made upon the property fronting on the improvement or upon the district described in the resolution of intention for said work or improvement, as the case may be, and in the event that there shall have been informalities, uncertainties or ambiguities in the description of the limits of said district, then upon the district which the court or council shall find to be that actually benefited by said improvement, but in so finding said court or council shall follow the lines described in the resolution of intention so far as the same can be ascertained, and in all cases of uncertainty or ambiguity they shall give regard to the lines described and make such a determination as to the lines where there is any uncertainty or ambiguity in the resolution of intention as may be just and equitable. In the event that a portion of the work or improvement has been found to have been entirely without the power of said city to order done, then said assessment shall be for the remainder of the work or improvement only, and the benefits arising from the work entirely without the jurisdiction of the city to order shall not be considered in making the reassessment. Upon the completion of the reassessment it shall be presented to the city council and a day of hearing shall be fixed by it which shall be at least twenty (20) days after the filing of the reassessment. The city clerk shall then advertise the fact of said filing by publishing a notice in the newspaper in which the notice of award of contract was published, or in such other paper as the council may direct, by five (5) insertions if the paper be a daily, and by two (2) insertions if it be a weekly or semiweekly newspaper, stating the fact that the reassessment has been filed with him and that objections to said reassessment will be heard at the time specified by the city council. At the time fixed for said hearing, or at such time or times to which the same may be thereafter adjourned, the city council shall consider the objections to said reassessment and in its discretion revise, correct and modify such reassessment in such manner as is most equitable and it shall thereupon pass a resolution approving and confirming such reassessment and such decision shall be a final determination of all matters relating to the actual benefits derived from the improvement by the respective lots, pieces and parcels of land enumerated in the reassessment. Said reassessment shall thereupon be recorded by the street superintendent, and it shall in all respects have the same effect and weight as the original assessment, and shall be enforced in the same manner. All payments made upon the original assessment shall be credited upon the reassessment and in the event that the reassessment in any instance is less than the amount of the original assessment, the excess shall be payable to the owner by the contractor.'

"In Seattle v. Kelleher, 195 U. S. 357, 25 Sup. Ct. 44, 49 L. Ed. 232, the following facts appeared: A street had been graded and sidewalks constructed for a distance including the frontage of the plaintiff's land. An assessment was levied, but this was held to be void. The work included certain planking. When the improvement was ordered, by the charter of the city of Seattle the planking was to be paid for out of the general taxes. Thereafter a statute was adopted authorizing a new assessment in cases where the old one had been declared void upon lands benefited, to the extent of their proportionate part of the expense of the improvement based upon its actual value at the time of its completion and having reference to the benefits received. Notice by publication of the time for hearing objections was provided for, with an appeal to the courts. By proceedings had in due form under this later statute, a reassessment was levied for the whole cost of the improvement, including the cost of said planking. The Circuit Court of the United States declared this assessment void under the Fourteenth Amendment, and enjoined the city against enforcing the same. This judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court. Responding to the objection based upon the fact that the planking was not authorized by the original ordinance under which the work was done, the court remarked that 'the city has done or adopted the work and presumably has paid for it. At the end the benefit was there, on the ground, at the city's expense. The principles of taxation are not those of contract. A special assessment may be levied upon an executed consideration, that is to say, for a public work already done. [Citations.] * * * The charge of planking on the general taxes was not a contract with the landowners, and no more prevented a special assessment being authorized for it later than silence of the laws at the same time as to how it should be paid for would have. In either case the Legislature could do as it thought best. Of course, it does not matter that this is called a reassessment. A reassessment may be a new assessment. Whatever the Legislature could authorize if it were ordering an assessment for the first time it equally could authorize, notwithstanding a previous invalid attempt to assess. The previous attempt left the city free "to take such steps as were within its power to take, either under existing statutes, or under any authority that might thereafter be conferred upon it, to make a new assessment upon the plaintiff's abutting property" in any constitutional way. [Citations.]

[2] "It is true that the Street Work Act of 1885, as in force prior to the enactment of section 12 $\frac{1}{4}$, afforded no escape from the obligation to provide an opportunity to protest, and to be heard thereon, before the order could be made that the work be done. But the Legislature may authorize the waiver of any notice which is not essential to due process of law in the procedure that it prescribes. Whether the work shall be done, or not, is a question solely of public interest. Whether private property shall, or shall not, be assessed therefor, is a matter which directly touches upon the rights of the owner of that property. It is upon this matter that the incidence occurs, from which his right to be heard is derived. Therefore it has been held that the Legislature has power to authorize an order for street improvement without notice; but that, on the other hand, the Legislature has not power to authorize an assessment to be made without notice, whereby the property owner is given an opportunity to object to the assessment, and to be heard upon his objection or protest. Goodrich v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 432, 22 Sup. Ct. 397, 46 L. Ed. 627; Londoner v. Denver, 210 U. S. 373, 28 Sup. Ct. 708, 52 L. Ed. 1103; Pasadena Park Improvement Co. v. Lelande, 175 Cal. 511, 518, 166 Pac. 341.

[3] "In Londoner v. Denver, supra, which was a street assessment case, the statutory proceedings included an order for the street improvement, which order, made by the board of public works, was to be based upon the petition of a majority of the owners of the frontage to be assessed. It was necessary that this order be followed by an ordinance of the city council. It was provided in the statute that the finding of the city council should be conclusive that a proper petition was filed. The Supreme Court of Colorado held that such finding was conclusive. The matter having been brought before the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error, that court, in discussing this particular question, said: 'The only question for this court is whether the charter provision authorizing such a finding, without notice to the landowners, denies to them due process of law. We think it does not. The proceedings, from the beginning up to and including the passage of the ordinance authorizing the work did not include any assessment or necessitate any assessment, although they laid the foundation for an assessment, which might or might not subsequently be made. Clearly all this might validly be done without hearing to the landowners, provided a hearing upon the assessment itself is afforded. Voigt v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 115 [46 L. Ed. 459, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337]; Goodrich v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 432 [46 L. Ed. 627, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep.

397]. The Legislature might have authorized the making of improvements by the city council without any petition. If it chose to exact a petition as a security for wise and just action it could, so far as the federal Constitution is concerned, accompany that condition with a provision that the council, with or without notice, should determine finally whether it had been performed.' We think that in the case at bar there was a valid reassessment.

"At the commencement of the trial the appellant objected to the introduction of any evidence on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action since 'the complaint sets out a warrant containing notice that bonds would issue for all assessments over \$25 remaining unpaid for over 30 days; the assessment pleaded is dated over two years ago, and the amount thereof is over \$25, and there is no pleading that a bond did not issue, or that the owner of the property assessed ordered that no bond should issue to represent the costs of the assessment.' No evidence was introduced showing that the owner of the property assessed ordered no bond should issue; and of course, no finding was made on this point. Appellant continues to insist upon this objection, and urges that the finding that all the allegations are true does not support the judgment. Respondent replies that the issuance of a bond is clearly a matter of defense which should have been pleaded and proved by the defendant if in fact any bond did issue. The Street Work Act was supplemented by the Street Improvement Bond Act of 1893. Stats. 1893, p. 33. At the time of the proceeding in question in this action, section 4 of that act was in force in the form of its amendment in 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 847. Under this act it is provided that where street work is to be done under the Street Work Act of 1885, the city council may determine that serial bonds shall be issued to represent assessments of \$25 or more for the cost of any work authorized by said Street Work Act. When it has been so determined, this shall be so declared in the resolution of intention and in the notice of award. A procedure is set forth whereby, after the assessment has been perfected and recorded, a list is made and certified to the city treasurer of all assessments which are unpaid which amount to \$25 or over, and thereupon the treasurer is required to issue a separate bond for each such assessment. It is provided in section 4 as amended by St. 1913, p. 847, § 3, that 'if any person, or his authorized agent, shall at any time before the issuance of the bond for said assessment or reassessment upon his lot or parcel of land present to the city treasurer his affidavit made before a competent officer, that he is the owner of a lot or parcel of land in said list, accompanied by the certificate of a searcher of records that he is such owner of record, and shall with such affidavit and certificate notify said treasurer in writing that he desires no bond to be issued for the assessment upon said lot or parcel of land, then no such bond shall be issued therefor and the payee of the warrant, or his assigns, shall retain his right for enforcing collection of said assessment or reassessment as if said lot or parcel of land had not been so listed by the street superintendent.' The right which the payee, or his assigns, may thus retain for enforcing collection is the right given in direct terms by sections 12 and 12 $\frac{1}{4}$ of the Street Work Act."

[4] The point of departure, as between the conclusions arrived at by the District Court of Appeal and those reached upon rehearing in this court, has reference to the question last above considered touching the sufficiency of the plaintiff's complaint in the absence of an averment that a bond had not issued covering the defendant's assessment, or that the owner of the property assessed had ordered that no such bond should issue. The appellant insists that this omission from the complaint is fatal upon her appeal from the judgment. Conceding, though not deciding, that the burden was upon the plaintiff to allege the nonissuance of a bond covering the amount of the defendant's assessment as a prerequisite to the existence of his lien and of his right of action to foreclose the same for such assessment, and conceding that the defendant's objection to the sufficiency of the complaint in that regard, made for the first time at the opening of the trial of the cause, was, nevertheless, timely, it does not therefore follow that there must or should be a reversal of the judgment herein on that ground. The alleged error of the trial court in refusing to sustain said objection was an error as to a matter of pleading. It was also an error, if it be such, touching a question concerning which pleaders might reasonably differ, and regarding which the trial court may excusably have been mistaken, in view of the conceded fact that the question of pleading involved is one of first impression and as to which no direct authority has been cited. For both of these reasons it is made the duty of this court under section 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ of article 6 of the Constitution to make an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, for the purpose of determining whether the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, before we are permitted to set aside a judgment on the ground of an error as to a matter of pleading. We have made such examination, and have approved and adopted the decision of the District Court of Appeal as to the main and meritorious issues of law and fact in the case.

Upon the question of fact as to whether or not a bond covering the amount of the defendant's assessment had been issued, the pleadings are silent, although the plaintiff's complaint is otherwise full and detailed as to the proceedings of the board of trustees of the city of Glendale leading up to the as-essment and reassessment of the appellant's property and the creation of said assessment lien; and although the defendant's answer is filled with specific denials as to the validity of such proceedings and of said assessment lien; and although the proof of the various official steps leading up to the making of said assessment and reassessment and the creation of said assessment lien, responding to the issues thus framed, were full and detailed, including the introduction of the warrant, assessment, certificate, and diagram, with affidavit of service of demand and nonpayment, which are, by virtue of section 12 of the Vrooman Act (Stats. 1913, p. 408), made prima facie evidence of the right of the plaintiff to recover in the action. See, also, section 4 of the Street Bond Act (Stats. 1913, p. 847).

This being the state of the record, if, in fact, a bond had been issued and was outstanding when the plaintiff commenced and was prosecuting his action, that fact, if proven, would of itself have been fatal to said action, and would, if shown in evidence, have entirely avoided the necessity of any other or further defenses to said action, and would have also avoided the prolonged trial and the elaborate proofs and defenses presented therein. It is inconceivable that, under such circumstances, the defendant, with this fatal weapon in her hands, should have refrained from using it because of the doubtful question as to which of the parties should have pleaded the issuance or nonissuance of such bond. The conclusion would seem to be irresistible that no such bond had in fact been issued—that the defendant had no such weapon with which to utterly defeat the plaintiff's action—and hence resorted to the other defenses which her answer contains and which her offered proofs went to sustain.

This being the state of the record, and the evidence otherwise showing that the plaintiff was justly entitled to the foreclosure of his assessment lien, we cannot hold that the mere error of the trial court, if it were such, in a matter of pleading should be permitted to be successfully urged upon this appeal, since it is apparent that the error complained of has not resulted in any miscarriage of justice.

McCLENAHAN v. KEYES. (S. F. 9933.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 4, 1922.
Rehearing Denied May 4, 1922.)

1. Witnesses ⇨159(9), 181—In action against executor on testatrix's contract plaintiff's testimony as to conversation with testator incompetent, but incompetency may be waived.

In action against executor plaintiff's testimony as to the testatrix's conversation, upon which his claim for compensation for personal services was based, was incompetent under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, but the executor could waive such incompetency.

2. Witnesses ⇨178(4)—Executor waived incompetency of plaintiff as to conversation with testator by taking plaintiff's testimony by deposition.

In action against executor, the executor, by taking the deposition of the plaintiff as to his conversation with the testator, waived the incompetency of plaintiff's testimony as to testator's conversation under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, notwithstanding section 2032, making introduction of deposition "subject to all legal exceptions."

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇨24(3)—Telegram instructing physician to render services held not admissible to bind defendant for services.

In physician's action against a mother's executor for services in attending daughter, telegram from son-in-law was not admissible to prove that mother agreed to pay for services, in the absence of a showing that the mother authorized the sending of the telegram.

4. Parent and child ⇨3(1)—Mother, in absence of contract, held not liable for medical services furnished wealthy adult daughter.

Where daughter was a wealthy woman and able to pay for medical services rendered to her, the mother was not liable for such services, in the absence of a contract on her part to pay therefor.

5. Physicians and surgeons ⇨13—One calling physician not liable for services in absence of express agreement.

Generally one who calls upon a physician to render services to another is not liable for those services, in the absence of an express agreement to pay therefor.

6. Physicians and surgeons ⇨24(3)—Evidence held insufficient to prove that mother agreed to pay for medical services furnished wealthy adult daughter.

In physician's action against mother's executor for services rendered for wealthy adult daughter, evidence held insufficient to prove that mother agreed to pay for such services.

7. Frauds, statute of ⇨26(2)—Physician rendering services for daughter on her credit could not recover against mother, in absence of her written promise to pay.

Physician, who made charges for his services in attending wealthy adult daughter against the daughter on his books instead of against the mother, could not recover against the mother in the absence of a written contract under Civ. Code, § 1624, requiring a contract to answer for the debt of another to be in writing, since, having performed services on the credit of the daughter, he could not hold the mother as original promisor.

8. Frauds, statute of ⇨23(4)—Parol promise to pay for services rendered another without consideration moving to promisor void.

Mother's parol agreement to pay for services rendered wealthy adult daughter, being without consideration to the mother, was void under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 1, and section 2794, subd. 3.

9. Witnesses ⇨28(2)—Physician held not entitled to extra compensation for testifying in absence of express agreement.

A physician, who voluntarily attended and testified at a hearing, could not recover extra compensation on the theory that he was an expert witness, in the absence of an express agreement to pay him extra compensation therefor.

10. Witnesses ⇨208(2)—Physician could not testify in proceedings for appointment of guardian for patient without patient's consent.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, a physician, employed by insane person to attend her, could not testify at proceedings for appointment of guardian without the consent of such person.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by H. C. McClenahan against Alexander D. Keyes, executor of the last will and testament of Anna Dwight Howard, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Morse Erskine and Herbert W. Erskine, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Samuel M. Shortridge, of San Francisco (T. J. Sheridan, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiff recovered a judgment in the trial court for services rendered as a physician in connection with the serious illness of Frances S. Howard, a daughter of the decedent, Anna Dwight Howard. The principal question in the case is whether or not the decedent, Anna Dwight Howard, entered into a contract of employment with the plaintiff for such services.

The plaintiff filed a claim against the estate of Anna Dwight Howard—

“for professional services of a medicolegal character rendered to and for the said decedent, at her special instance and request, in relation to Frances S. Howard, daughter of said decedent from January 8, 1915, to April 21, 1915, inclusive, at San Francisco, in San Mateo county, and at Redwood City, Cal., said services consisting of medical advice and services given and rendered to the said daughter, consultations with the said decedent and her representatives in respect of said daughter, time, attention, and services rendered in certain proceedings in the superior court in the county of San Mateo, of said state, had and taken to secure the appointment of said decedent guardian of the person and estate of her said daughter, $1,802.50. For moneys expended in and about the performance of the above services $18.50. Total $1,821.00.” (Italics ours.)

[1] The complaint substantially followed the language of the claim except that the words “in respect” are inserted before the words “to said daughter,” so that while the complaint alleges the rendition of medical services to the daughter, the complaint refers to said medical services as rendered “with respect to said daughter.” The rendition of the services sued for is not questioned. The question is whether or not the decedent was liable at all for the services so rendered. The facts in the main are undisputed. Frances S. Howard was thought to be so insane as to be dangerous, and on January 7, 1915, Leon Morris, an attorney at law, representing a brother of Frances S. Howard, Teddy Howard, who was at that time fatally injured, and to protect the brother, swore to a complaint charging Frances S. Howard with being an insane person. She was arrested on that charge, and while awaiting trial placed in a sanitarium conducted by Dr. Bering. The next day, January 8th, owing to the critical condition of Frances S. Howard, who was unconscious, Dr. Bering telephoned the plaintiff, an alienist, to attend her. Her mother, who was then in the East, arrived in San Francisco January 18, 1915. The plaintiff charges $379.50 for the services rendered by him to the daughter before the mother arrived in San Francisco. He bases his claim against the mother upon a conversation he held with her immediately upon her arrival while she was ill in bed in the Fairmont Hotel. As he was the sole witness who testified to this conversation we will first dispose of the appellant's objection to the competency of the plaintiff to testify against the defendant executor. The appellant objected to the deposition of the plaintiff on the ground that plaintiff was incompetent as a witness. Under the provisions of section 1880, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff was an incompetent witness against the executor. This objection to the incompetency of the doctor could be waived (Kinley v. Largent [Cal. Sup.] 200 Pac. 937), and the plaintiff relies solely upon such a waiver. The administrator took the testimony of the plaintiff by a deposition, but upon the trial declined to introduce the deposition and objected to the respondent introducing it on his own behalf. The District Court of Appeal held that by taking the deposition of the respondent, the administrator made him a witness, and thereby waived the objection of incompetency. The petition to transfer the case to this court was granted because of a doubt as to the correctness of this ruling, for the reason that section 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which the deposition was taken, expressly provided that, although the deposition might be used by either party and thus become the evidence of the party introducing it, its introduction in evidence is “subject to all legal exceptions.” If the phrase “all legal exceptions” is broad enough to include the question of the competency of the witness, it is evident that upon the tender of the deposition in evidence the objection might be successfully interposed by the executor. Cudlip v. N. Y. Evening Journal Pub. Co., 180 N. Y. 85, 72 N. E. 925; Bambauer v. Schleider, 176 App. Div. 562, 163 N. Y. Supp. 186.

[2] After an investigation of the authorities we are satisfied that the ruling of the District Court of Appeal was correct. The phrase “subject to all legal exceptions” is one contained in the Practice Act with relation to the admissibility of depositions. Sections 430, 431, Practice Act, Stats. 1851, p. 119. It was held in Turner v. McIlhane, 8 Cal. 575, that by taking the deposition of a witness otherwise incompetent because of interest the objection was waived, and that the other party could introduce that deposition on his own behalf. The court in that connection said:

“We think the intention of this section is that which its language plainly expresses. The defendant had the right to read the deposition. If it were otherwise, and a party should be allowed to take the deposition of any one or more of the adverse parties, and read, if it suited him—and if it did not, then to exclude it from the other side—the result would be, that a party, plaintiff or defendant, could always be fishing for evidence from adverse parties, without incurring any responsibility or danger on his part. The party who calls upon an adverse party to testify, makes him a witness. By making him a witness, he waives his incompetency to be heard for himself, or for his codefendant, or coplaintiff."

Similarly, in Jones v. Love, 9 Cal. 68, it was held that the objections to the competency of a witness based upon interest must be taken at the time of the taking of the deposition or otherwise waived. The same rule was followed in Brooks v. Crosby, 22 Cal. 42. It follows that the language of section 2032, Code of Civil Procedure, by which the deposition is admissible subject to "all legal exceptions," does not authorize the competency of the witness to be questioned, where he has been examined by deposition by the party opposing the introduction of the deposition. The Supreme Court of the state of New York has held that the objection to the competency of the witness as against an estate was not waived by taking the deposition (Cudlip v. N. Y. Evening Journal Pub. Co., supra), but this was because of the statute of New York, which expressly reserves the objection of competency to the time of trial. In Missouri, Tennessee, and Oklahoma it is held that the taking of the deposition waives the objection to the competency of the witness to testify against the estate. Ess v. Griffith, 139 Mo. 322, 40 S. W. 930; Borgess Inv. Co. v. Vette, 142 Mo. 560, 44 S. W. 754, 64 Am. St. Rep. 567; Rice v. Waddill, 168 Mo. 99, 67 S. W. 605; Thomas v. Irvin, 90 Tenn. 512, 16 S. W. 1045; Percy v. Miller (Wash.) 197 Pac. 638. The deposition was properly admitted in evidence.

The plaintiff testified in this action after the mother's death as follows concerning the conversation held with her:

"* * * Mrs. Howard had me explain the condition of her daughter, the situation, what had been done, what was necessary to be done. This conference was quite prolonged, a couple of hours I saw her, and, in expressing her appreciation and approval of my efforts and my advice and my opinion of my daughter's case, she assured me in words and in manner to go right ahead and give all of the services, be unsparing in my time in looking out for the daughter; that it was very necessary for her to be in the hands of some one competent to understand the condition; that I would be adequately compensated for my services."

Plaintiff relies upon this statement of the mother to establish his right to recover for the services already rendered by him in caring for the daughter, and those subsequently rendered in caring for her, and also as establishing a contract for the medical testimony of plaintiff as an expert given in the guardianship and in the insanity proceedings, for which he charges about $899.50 as a reasonable fee.

Notwithstanding this alleged contract of employment, the plaintiff continued to make the charges upon his books against the daughter, and subsequently brought suit against the daughter for the full amount of the claim, alleging in that action that the services were performed at the special instance and request of the daughter. The respondent failed to recover in his suit against the daughter, except for the services rendered when she was unconscious, and thereafter filed his claim against the estate of the mother, and brought this action.

As supplementing the statement of the mother the plaintiff relies upon certain transactions had with others to establish her liability, and we will consider these matters before further considering the effect of the mother's statement. During the pendency of the guardianship and insanity proceedings, the former having been instituted by relatives of the daughter in accordance with the advice of the plaintiff, the mother was represented in said proceedings by an attorney, and the plaintiff relies somewhat upon his dealings with this attorney to support his contention that there was a contract of employment between himself and the mother. The plaintiff also testified and relies upon the fact that before the mother arrived in California a telegram was received from her and read to him by the daughter's attorney. The plaintiff's testimony in that regard is as follows:

That after he had rendered emergency services to the unconscious daughter he met Mr. Halsey Rixford, representing himself as the personal attorney of Miss Frances Howard who said "that the mother of the patient was ill in the East, that he had a telegram—no, had telegraphed—and had instructions from the relatives, and to employ the services in the interest and for Miss Frances Howard. Later on I saw a telegram, the contents of which I cannot recall, signed either by the mother or the brother-in-law, Mr. Whitell, stating that they were on the way out, and to arrange the matters in regard to the daughter—the only other relative here was her injured brother, a patient at the Adler Sanitarium, Mr. Teddy Howard, hurt in an elevator falling. * * *

Again he said:

"[It [the telegram] stated that the mother and son-in-law were on the way out, and to go ahead and take care of the daughter until their arrival."

The evidence was objected to on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and hearsay. The court ruled as follows:

"Oh, no, it is not, but until it is connected that cannot be brought out. * * * The objection is overruled. However, the question has got to be connected before it can be used against your client."

[3] A telegram from Mr. Whitell would clearly be immaterial and incompetent unless it was shown that he was acting for the mother, and evidence that a telegram was exhibited to the plaintiff by the attorney of the daughter, without some evidence that the telegram was sent by the mother or by her authority, would be immaterial.

A brother, William D. N. Howard, employed Dr. Teass to look after the daughter. Teddy Howard, the injured brother, employed Dr. Chidester. With reference to various relatives with whom he conferred, plaintiff testified:

"I was assured to go ahead by all concerned, and I was to be adequately remunerated; no definite statement as to who should do that or as to how or what it should be."

Plaintiff testified that he was in daily attendance upon the daughter up to the 30th of January.

[4, 5] The daughter was a wealthy woman, and able to pay for the services rendered to her. The mother was not liable for such services in the absence of a contract on her part to pay therefor. Appellant claims that the evidence is altogether insufficient to establish either an express or an implied contract on the part of the mother to pay for the services rendered to the daughter. The general rule is that one who calls upon a physician to render services to another is not liable for those services in the absence of an express agreement to pay therefor. 40 Cyc. 2808, 2809. This applies where the physician is called by a parent to render services to an adult son or daughter (Crowell v. Donoho, 168 Mo. App. 305, 153 S. W. 1082; Crane v. Baudouine, 55 N. Y. 256; McQuire v. Hughes, 207 N. Y. 516, 101 N. E. 460, 46 L. R. A. [N. S.] 577, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 585; Boyd v. Sappington [Pa.] 4 Watts, 247, and to services rendered to a daughter-in-law (Dorion v. Jacobson, 113 Ill. App. 563), or to a wife's relative (Curry v. Shelby, 90 Ala. 277, 7 South, 922).

In the case of McQuire v. Hughes, supra, the rule is thus stated:

"The general rule that, where a person requests of another the performance of services, which are performed, the law implies a promise by the former to pay their reasonable value, has no application in the case of a physician, rendering professional services to a third person, if the relation to the patient of the person, who requests them, be not such as imports the legal obligation to provide them."

[6] It is clear therefore that the mere request of the mother that the plaintiff render services to the daughter would not be sufficient to imply a contract to pay for such services. In determining whether or not the mother agreed to pay for the services rendered to the daughter, it is important to bear in mind that the plaintiff advised the mother that the daughter was incompetent, and for that reason should be placed under guardianship. Her statement that the plaintiff would be adequately compensated for services rendered, and requesting him to render such services, must be construed in the light of that situation. The amount of the compensation to be allowed to the plaintiff would be passed upon by the mother as guardian in the event that she was appointed, or, if not, by such other relative as was appointed, and it was therefore important that plaintiff should know that the relatives of the patient, including the mother, desired that he should render services, and were willing that he be compensated therefor. If it had been the intention either of the plaintiff or of the mother, that she should become personally responsible for the payment of such services, it would have been very simple for him to have secured from her a direct statement to that effect. The fact that the respondent carried the account on his books in the name of the daughter, and subsequently brought suit against the daughter to recover the full amount claimed for all services rendered, would seem clearly to indicate that he did not enter into an agreement with the mother that he would accept her as the primary debtor, and there was nothing said by the mother as testified to by him which would indicate that the mother intended to assume that obligation in the place and stead of her daughter. On the contrary, it would seem that the mother studiously avoided stating that she would be personally responsible for the plaintiff's services.

[7] If, however, it be assumed that the mother in fact promised to pay for the plaintiff's services, another consideration would lead to the conclusion that there was no liability on the part of the mother for these services rendered to the daughter. Plaintiff was already performing services for the daughter, presumably under a contract for that purpose. The agreement of the mother to pay for such services so being rendered was a contract to answer for the debt of another. If the services of the plaintiff were performed upon the credit of the daughter or if she was in any degree liable for the indebtedness, then the mother would be a mere guarantor, and the contract of guaranty, not being in writing, would be void under the statute of fraud. Harris v. Frank, 81 Cal. 280, 286, 22 Pac. 856; Civ. Code, § 1624. The respondent made the charges for his services against the daughter upon his books instead of against the mother, and thereafter brought suit against the daughter alone to recover for such compensation. The law is clear that if any credit was in fact given to the daughter the mother cannot be held as the original promisor, but at most as a mere guarantor. 20 Cyc. 182, 183; Harris v. Frank, supra; Edelman v. McDonell, 126 Cal. 210, 58 Pac. 528; Johnson v. Bank, 60 W. Va. 320, 55 S. E. 395, 9 Ann. Cas. 893. In cases of doubt the question as to which party is primarily liable is a question of fact (Johnson v. Bank, supra), but the conduct of the plaintiff establishes beyond doubt that he extended credit to the daughter, and the fact that he was unsuccessful in establishing his claim against the daughter cannot change the situation.

[8] What has been said is even more emphatically true with reference to the antecedent obligation incurred by or on behalf of the daughter. In such a case, in order that the promise of the mother to answer for the antecedent obligation of the daughter should be considered an original obligation, and therefore not required to be in writing, the statute provides that the promise is deemed original only when made upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor, whether moving from either party to the antecedent obligation or from another person. There was nothing in the arrangement between the plaintiff and the mother to indicate that liability for the continued services of the plaintiff was to be assumed by the mother as a condition for the continued performance of services by the plaintiff in connection with her daughter. Assuming that the conversation between the plaintiff and the mother is susceptible of the construction that she was to pay for plaintiff's services, there was therefore no consideration for the agreement to pay for past services, and therefore such agreement, not being in writing, would be void. Section 2794, subd. 3, and section 1624, subd. 1, Civ. Code. So far here as plaintiff's claim is based upon medical services, past or future, rendered to the daughter, it is clear from the undisputed evidence that the mother was not liable therefor.

Plaintiff was defeated in his suit against the daughter largely for the reason that his services were claimed by her to be hostile to her rather than for her benefit, as appears by the report of that decision. McClenahan v. Howard (Cal. App.) 195 Pac. 68. The plaintiff's claim against the mother includes a large sum ($789.50) for his services as an expert witness in the insanity and guardianship cases. Plaintiff charged $20 per hour for his detention as a witness in the superior court of San Mateo county at the time of the hearing of the guardianship proceedings. For one day his claim was $180. The authorities are not in accord as to the circumstances under which an expert who is called as a witness may receive compensation. Some courts even hold that a contract to pay extra compensation is void. The authorities, however, all agree that, in the absence of an express contract to pay a physician for his testimony as an expert, he is only entitled to the statutory fee. The uniform rule seems to be that a physician who has acquired knowledge of a patient or of specific facts in connection with the patient may be called upon to testify to those facts without any compensation other than the ordinary witness receives for attendance upon court. In those states recognizing the right to extra compensation for a physician who testifies as an expert it is uniformly held that, where such testimony is sought to be elicited without requiring any particular investigation on the part of the physician, he is required to testify without extra compensation. People v. Conte, 17 Cal. App. 771, 784, 122 Pac. 450, 451. For general discussion of the subject, see 5 Ann. Cas. 994; 17 Ann. Cas. 715; 31 Ann. Cas. 490, 491; 40 Cyc. 2186; 37 L. R. A. 671; 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 281; 2 A. L. R. 1577, 1578.

[9] We do not need to determine the exact limits of the rule in this state for the reason that there is absolutely no showing of any agreement to pay the physician for his services as an expert witness, as distinguished from his services as a physician in the case. There is no suggestion or intimation in the conversation between the respondent and the mother than he was being employed to testify as an expert and the lawyer who represented the mother in the insanity proceedings testified that absolutely no agreement was made by him to secure the testimony of the respondent as an expert witness. It is clear that under these circumstances, the witness having attended voluntarily and testified, cannot recover extra compensation on the theory that he was an expert witness, and that his expert knowledge was involved in his testimony. There is no implied contract for the payment of extra compensation due to the fact that the respondent was used as a witness. The law fixes the fees of a witness, and the only obligation incurred in the summoning of a witness is the obligation to pay the fees which the law fixes for the attendance of a witness. If there is any further or additional obligation, it must arise from an express contract relating to the particular subject of the testimony, and based upon the fact that the witness is required to use his expert knowledge in testifying.

[10] There was no contract to pay the plaintiff any additional compensation for his services as an expert, or in preparation for testifying as such, hence he cannot recover for such expert testimony. In this connection it should be observed that the employment of the plaintiff as the physician for the daughter was inconsistent with the idea that he would be an expert witness, for by such employment he became incompetent as a witness without the daughter's consent. Code Civ. Proc., § 1881, subd. 4.

The evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the trial court in favor of the plaintiff.

HALL v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.COOK v. SAME.

(S. F. 9911.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 17, 1922.
Rehearing Denied May 15, 1922.)1. Negligence $\Leftrightarrow$ 117—Contributory negligence must be pleaded.

Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, which must be pleaded and proved.

2. Trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 251(8) — Instruction on contributory negligence not pleaded properly refused.

In an action for injuries to passengers in an automobile which collided with a street car, where the defense of contributory negligence was not interposed, the court properly refused an instruction that it was the driver's duty to give way to the car if necessary, and to find for defendant if he negligently attempted to cross in front of it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Fay M. Hall and Grace Cook against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George Lull, City Atty., and Charles S. Peery and R. T. Ainsworth, Asst. City Attys., all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sapiro and Levy and Boyd Oliver, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. These two cases were consolidated and tried together in the superior court. They were transferred to the District Court of Appeal, and an opinion was rendered by that court affirming the judgment. The facts and the question in issue were correctly stated in that opinion as follows:

"The plaintiffs were injured in a collision between the automobile in which they were riding and a street car which was being operated by an agent of the defendant, and they sued the defendant to recover damages. The judgment went for the plaintiffs, and the defendant has appealed. In its briefs the defendant earnestly contends that the trial court committed a reversible error in refusing to give an instruction tendered by the defendant. It appears, without contradiction, that the accident occurred about 8:30 p. m. on the evening of the 31st day of May, 1920. The plaintiffs were riding in an automobile which was in the act of passing from south to north over Octavia street in San Francisco. The automobile was being driven by a young man who was one of the escorts of the plaintiffs. At the same time one of the defendant's street cars was in the act of passing from east to west over Geary street. In the intersecting space covered by both Octavia and Geary streets the collision occurred. As addressed to these facts the defendant tendered, and asked the trial court to give, an instruction worded as follows:

"You are instructed that, as a street car cannot go upon the street except upon its rails, it has the better right to that space to which others must yield when necessary. It was the duty of the driver of the automobile mentioned in the complaint upon approaching the crossing of Geary street to give way to the car of the defendant, which was about to pass at the same time, if necessary in order to avoid a collision. In other words, the defendant's street car has the prior right of way at the intersection of Geary and Octavia streets, and if the said defendant's car was about to cross Octavia street and was seen by the driver of said automobile to be about to cross Octavia street, it was the duty of the driver of said automobile to yield the right of way to the car of the said defendant, and if a collision occurred between the said street car and said automobile by reason of the driver of the said automobile attempting to negligently and carelessly cross in front of said street car, and the said defendant, its agents and servants, are not guilty of any negligence in the operation of said street car, then your verdict must be for the defendant."

At the trial the defense of contributory negligence was waived; and the sole point submitted to the jury, aside from the amount of damages, was the question whether or not the injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants operating the street car.

[1, 2] The defense of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense which the defendant must plead and prove in order to obtain the benefit thereof. There was evidence to the effect that the street car had the usual lighted headlight and was plainly visible for a distance of 200 feet before it reached the crossing. The jury might well have believed that the driver of the automobile did not look in that direction, or that, seeing the car, he did not heed the danger of attempting to cross in front of it. The instruction deals almost entirely with the question of the negligence of the driver of the automobile. It had a direct tendency to lead the jury to believe that if the driver was guilty of contributory negligence the plaintiffs could not recover. To so instruct the jury would have been erroneous, in view of the fact that the defense of contributory negligence was not interposed. Without passing on the correctness of this instruction, we think that for this reason it was properly refused by the court. The other instructions of the court fully covered the subject of negligence on the part of the persons operating the street car.

The instruction is an illustration of the dangers of attempting to frame a charge to the jury upon isolated extracts from opinions of this court. It is claimed that it was taken from the opinion in Arnold v. S. F., etc., Co., 175 Cal. 1, 164 Pac. 798. In that case the court was discussing the question of contributory negligence on the part of the injured person as related to the alleged negligence of the driver of the street car. Contributory negligence was there presented as a defense, and the passages from which the instruction was taken treated of both subjects upon the correct theory that, although the motorman of the train was negligent, the plaintiff could not recover if the negligence of the injured party contributed to his injury. The language could not be applied to a case in which contributory negligence was not pleaded without having a tendency to mislead the jury into believing that it was in issue.

No other ruling is presented in support of the appeal, and we think no error appears in the ruling complained of.

The judgments are affirmed.

CRESTA v. OCEAN SHORE R. CO. et al.
(Civ. 4128.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 2, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 1, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error — 1024(5)—Finding on contradictory affidavits binding on appeal in absence of abuse.

Determination of a motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to vacate findings, conclusions of law, and decree for excusable neglect, mistake, and inadvertence, supported by affidavits and assailed by counter affidavits presenting a wide conflict, was binding on appeal, in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion.

2. Judgment — 355—Party held not entitled to vacation of erroneous judgment.

Court was not required as a matter of right to grant a motion to set aside a decree under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, on the ground that it was void on its face, in that it awarded a fee-simple title to a railroad as to land condemned for railroad purposes under which condemnation only an easement could be acquired, since it was no more than erroneous; the decree itself not disclosing a want of jurisdiction.

3. Judgment — 392—Matters occurring year after decree not material on motion to vacate decree.

Evidence relating to abandonment of operation of railroad a year after a decree awarding the railroad a fee-simple title was wholly immaterial to questions raised by a motion to vacate the decree under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from an order denying plaintiffs' motion to vacate the findings, conclusions of law and decree in favor of defendant in an action to quiet title under the McEnerney Act. Judgment was entered on October 28, 1919, in favor of plaintiffs as to a portion of the property involved in the action and in favor of defendant as to a strip of land running through the property and used by defendant as a right of way for its railroad. A fee-simple title was decreed to the defendant, and plaintiffs claim that the court was without jurisdiction to award more than an easement as to an undivided one-half thereof because title thereto was obtained by a suit in condemnation for railroad purposes. Upon the hearing of the motion evidence was offered that some time after the entry of judgment the defendant, with the consent of the state railroad commission, ceased to operate its road over the property in controversy.

The motion was made under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and was based upon the grounds of plaintiffs' excusable neglect, surprise, mistake and inadvertence, and also upon the grounds that the findings of fact were erroneous, inconsistent, contradictory and unintelligible. No appeal was taken from the judgment and no motion for a new trial was made.

[1] The "excusable neglect" of plaintiffs was based on the fact that their counsel was ill when the findings of fact and conclusions of law were signed and filed, and for some days thereafter. The motion was supported by affidavits and assailed by counter affidavits, presenting a wide conflict which the trial court was required to determine. This determination was adverse to plaintiffs, and is binding on this appeal, unless a clear abuse of discretion is shown. An examination of the record convinces us that the trial court did not abuse that discretion.

[2] It is argued that the motion should have been granted as a matter of right, because the judgment was void on its face. The point here is that as defendant acquired part of its title through a decree in condemnation for railroad purposes, and that for such purposes an easement only can be acquired, the court was without jurisdiction to award a fee-simple title. But this was one of the questions at issue in the trial, and one which the trial court was required to determine.

If it decided wrongly, plaintiffs had their remedy by appeal. If error at all, it is error committed within the jurisdiction of the court. Respondent disputes the claim, and argues that the evidence was sufficient to show fee-simple title. Whether this is so is of no consequence, so long as the decree itself does not disclose a want of jurisdiction.

[3] The evidence relating to the subsequent abandonment of the operation of the railroad was wholly immaterial to the questions raised by the motion for relief from the judgment under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. It was something that occurred nearly a year after the decree, and could not be cited as evidence of surprise, neglect, mistake, or inadvertence on the part of plaintiffs in connection with the entry of the decree.

Judgment affirmed.

BARNGROVER v. BARNGROVER.
(Civ. 4108.)

1. Divorce — 27(7)—Continuous nagging held extreme cruelty justifying divorce.

Although a wife's motives were good, her nagging for over ten years, growing out of her ultrapuristic character, held sufficient to support a finding of extreme mental cruelty justifying the granting of a divorce.

2. Divorce — 184(10)—Trial Judge's finding based on conflicting evidence not disturbed on appeal.

On appeal from a judgment granting a divorce, the court is bound by trial judge's finding of fact based on conflicting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Proceedings by Harvey M. Barngrover against Lucile L. Barngrover. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. G. Tompkins, of San Jose, for appellant.
L. E. Petree and D. T. Jenkins, both of San Jose, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. [1] This is an appeal from a decree granting to the plaintiff a divorce from the defendant. The decree was based upon the extreme cruelty of the defendant, and the cruelty complained of was mental cruelty, as distinguished from physical cruelty. The appellant makes one point, and that is that the evidence does not sustain the findings, and in this behalf the appellant argues that the probative elements adduced by the plaintiff at the trial were altogether trivial. The testimony and proceedings are all before us. The testimony alone takes up more than 1,000 folios. We have read the record from cover to cover. The trial court found among other things, and the record abundantly supports, a most peculiar case of nagging. As the story of the case was unfolded, it was disclosed that the same tendency of character on the part of the defendant was displayed, not only toward her husband, but toward her child, and toward her tradespeople, and toward her friends and acquaintances. Neither the law nor the interests of the parties require that we should restate the testimony in this opinion. In addition to the feature which we have specially pointed out, there are other matters contained in the record which counsel claim to be immaterial. Conceding, without deciding, that counsel's contention is correct, there still remains within the record the element which we have specially adverted to. The nagging grew out of the ultrapuristic character of the defendant. The appellant says that "she is an earnest Christian woman." It may be added that the whole record sustains that claim. It may be added that apparently the plaintiff is an earnest Christian man. Nevertheless it is a sound legal proposition that nagging by a spouse of such character may have, and probably would have, the same effect on the other spouse as any other kind of nagging. The appellant also argues that "her motives have always been good." Conceding such to be the fact, it still remains that nagging from good motives may be just as hurtful as nagging from any other kind of motives. The case was most thoroughly and completely presented to the trial court by able counsel who tried the case behind closed doors. The testimony covered a period of 10 years and over. The case for the plaintiff was presented by calling to the witness stand 16 of the neighbors and friends of both of the litigants. Two of those witnesses were ministers of the gospel. One of them was at one time the pastor in the Protestant Church of which both the plaintiff and defendant were members. One cannot read the record without admiration for the apparent truthfulness of each and all of the witnesses and the absence of bias and prejudice on the part of the witnesses. The appellant says that, if the facts contained in the record before us "establish grounds for divorce, then it is certain that any husband can divorce his wife, and any wife can divorce her husband, at will, since the peccadilloes complained of are not as serious as those of which 9 out of 10 husbands and wives are guilty." This is not a sound statement, because a most cursory reading of the record discloses a set of facts seldom or never heard of.

[2] In behalf of the appellant the utmost that can be said is that there were some conflits in the testimony; however, those matters were addressed to the trial judge, and this court is bound by the findings made by the trial judge on such conflicting evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC COAST CONE CO. v. NATIONAL ICE CREAM CO. et al. (Civ. 4110.)

Appeal and error — 1011(1)—Court's finding based on conflicting evidence not disturbed, especially where court tasted evidence.

In an action to recover the price of certain ice cream cones, where defendant set up that they were not sweetened, and hence were below the grade warranted, the trial court's finding on conflicting evidence that the cones came up to the warranted standard will not be disturbed, especially as the trial court tasted every variety of cones in evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Coast Cone Company against the National Ice Cream Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Samuel M. Samter, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued the defendants to recover judgment for the purchase price of a quantity of ice cream cones. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed. On the trial the defendants relied principally on a defense based on certain warranties being breached. The defendants strenuously contended that they had bought "cake cones"; that "cake cones," as that expression is known to the trade, refers to cones that are sweetened. To this the plaintiff replied that the purchase was made by and through certain correspondence, and those papers said nothing about "cake." Going further, the defendants contended that the cones delivered by the plaintiff were not sweetened. To this the plaintiff replied that they were sweetened, but stated that from July to October, 1918, the plaintiff's products were not sweetened as much as they were both before and after that period of time, and, the plaintiffs set forth that the reduction in the quantity of sugar used was because of, and in compliance with, the war regulations applicable to the business of the plaintiff and to its products. However, the defendants replied that, making all due allowance for the war regulations, the goods in question were still below the grade warranted. As to this element of the case the plaintiff called two witnesses and the defendants called seven. The trial court found the fact as contended for by the plaintiff. The defendants claim on this appeal that there was not a substantial conflict in the evidence, and that this court should hold that the finding in question is not supported by the evidence. We think, however, that the case is one in which this court has no right to substitute its opinion for the finding made by the trial court. We reach this conclusion with less hesitancy because of another element of the trial procedure. That element is this: The trial courtroom seems to have been well stocked with cones; the judge of the trial court, of his own motion, and on requests of counsel, witnesses, and parties, tasted every variety of cone that was offered to him, and retasted the same. He thus became particularly informed on the question of fact on which he made his finding. Furthermore the plaintiff contended that the right to examine and inspect the goods was, under the facts, waived by the defendant. The trial court so found. That finding was well within the proofs as tendered.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROSS v. CROWDER et al. (Civ. 2396.)

1. Sales — 355(1)—Answer held to admit sale and part payment.

Where the complaint alleged that plaintiff sold defendants an engine for $1,350, that $800 had been paid, and that $550 was still unpaid, due, and owing, an answer denying that defendants were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $550 or any other sum on account of anything alleged in the complaint, or that such sum or any sum was unpaid, due, or owing, admitted the sale and payment of $800, and raised only the issue whether the balance of $550 was due and unpaid.

2. Sales — 359(1)—Facts shown by evidence held to entitle seller to judgment.

Evidence that plaintiff offered to sell defendants' agent an engine for $1,350, that the engine was taken and used, and a check sent plaintiff by the agent for $800 in part payment of the price, sustained a judgment for plaintiff for the balance of the price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by A. W. Ross against C. L. Crowder and another in claim and delivery. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, for appellant.
C. D. McComish, of Colusa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant Crowder appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $550.

The complaint alleges:

"That on or about May 15, 1920, plaintiff sold and delivered to defendants at their special instance and request, one 40 H. P. Fairbanks-Morse type N gas engine, for the sum of $1,350, to be paid for upon delivery of said engine."

"That on or about May 17, 1920, defendants paid $800 on the purchase price of said engine, but the balance of $550 is still unpaid, due, and owing."

The defendants answered as follows:

"They deny that on or about May 15, 1920, or at any time alleged in the complaint, or at all, they were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $550, or any other sum of money whatever, on account of anything alleged in said complaint, or that said sum, or any sum, was, when the action was begun, or is now, unpaid, or due, or owing."

[1] The answer raises no issue except as to the payment of the $550 alleged in the complaint to be due and unpaid. The evidence shows without contradiction that no part of the $550 had been paid.

[2] Notwithstanding the admissions of the answer by failure to deny, plaintiff introduced evidence to prove the first paragraph of his complaint. The evidence shows that W. S. Gauze was in charge of certain land of Crowder as manager; that he had charge of the drilling of wells thereon, and was "attending to the farming" of the land; that plaintiff, in a telephone conversation with Crowder, offered to sell him the engine in question for $1,350; that Crowder replied that he would arrange to inspect it; that the engine was thereafter taken by "the Crowder people" and was used on such land in operating a pump; and that Gauze sent plaintiff a check for $800 signed by C. L. Crowder & Co., in part payment of the purchase price. The defendants offered no testimony, and the foregoing evidence is wholly uncontradicted. The undisputed evidence is sufficient to sustain the judgment. Even if this were not so, the answer admits the sale of the engine to defendants at the price alleged and the payment of $800 thereof. The evidence shows that $550 of the purchase price remained unpaid, and the court so found. Nothing further was required to entitle plaintiff to judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. ANDERSON. (Civ. 4124.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1024(1)—Finding of trial court upon contradictory affidavits binding on appeal.

Where the trial court makes a determination upon issues of fact raised by affidavits, it is binding upon the appellate court, just as in any other case of conflicting evidence.

2. Divorce ⇐182—Denial of alimony pending appeal held not abuse of discretion.

In an action for divorce from wife on ground of extreme cruelty, where some allowances had already been made, held that trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion by wife for alimony pending appeal.

3. Divorce ⇐182—Bad faith of applicant to be considered in exercise of discretion upon motion for alimony pending appeal.

That wife was not asking for alimony pending appeal in good faith and was not prosecuting her appeal in good faith were matters that entered into the exercise of discretion of the trial court upon motion for alimony pending appeal.

4. Divorce ⇐182—Alimony pending appeal discretionary.

Whether or not alimony pending appeal shall be granted is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by Andrew H. Anderson against Lenna Mae Anderson. From an order denying motion for alimony pending appeal, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. M. Thomas, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying appellant's motion for an allowance to her of alimony during the pendency of her appeal from a judgment against her in an action for divorce instituted by her husband, the respondent herein. She also asks for the allowance of $274.75 in repay money, alleged to have been borrowed by her to pay for the transcript on appeal from the judgment in the divorce action, $10 for filing said transcript on appeal, and also for funds to pay for printing of briefs, on said appeal, and for $300, which she declares she requires for a surgical operation to remove a growth from her back. The action from which this motion was an outgrowth was commenced by the respondent here upon the ground of extreme cruelty; findings were made in his favor, and a decree entered accordingly. The appellant here, upon motion in the trial court, was allowed $50 a month alimony, pendente lite, until the interlocutory decree was entered, and was also allowed counsel fees, costs, etc., upon the trial in the superior court. She is now complaining that the action of the trial court in refusing her motion for an allowance during the pendency of the appeal and for the other amounts she asks for is an abuse of the discretion vested in the trial court. The interlocutory decree was filed on April 17, 1919, and the motion resulting in the order appealed from her was not made until about six months later. At that time appellant asked an allowance of a minimum of $50 a month from the time of the filing of the decree until the determination of the appeal. The evidence, taken at the hearing of this motion, consists almost entirely of affidavits which are before us in the record.

[1] Counsel for appellant devotes many pages of his brief to a criticism of the statement of acts in the brief filed on behalf of respondent. This is because respondent has stated only the facts appearing in said affidavits which are in support of the action of the trial court in denying appellant's motion, and has omitted the contradictory statements contained in appellant's affidavits. Under the record presented to us, such an enumeration of facts was proper for the reason that where the trial court makes a determination upon issues of fact raised by affidavits, that determination is binding upon this court, just as in any other case of conflicting evidence. Almost every material matter set forth in the affidavits of either party is contradicted by statements in the affidavits of the other party. This is not an unusual situation, but upon such a record, the facts supporting the action of the trial court must be taken as true.

Our inquiry here is whether or not the trial court abused its discretion in denying the appellant's motion. Bohnert v. Bohnert, 91 Cal. 428, 27 Pac. 732; Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 237, 79 Pac. 885. The trial court resolved all conflicts in the affidavits in favor of the respondent. It was, assuredly, in a better position to judge between conflicting statements than is this court, for the trial court had observed the parties and their witnesses during a stubbornly contested action, in which the trial extended over a number of days. Our inquiry must be, then, as in a case where a finding is attacked as being unsupported by the evidence: Is there in the affidavits any statements of fact which, taken as true, would justify the trial court in refusing to allow the appellant any further sums of money? An examination of the facts disclosed by the affidavits, with this idea in mind, shows no abuse of discretion.

Respondent's affidavit denied appellant's assertion that she is financially unable to meet the costs of her appeal; denies that she is physically unable to earn money; asserts that she has been working doing "defective work"; denies that his income is as alleged by appellant, and asserts and sets out the figures to substantiate such statement; that the income from the real estate business in which he is engaged, after deducting the expenses thereof, amounted to only $384.82 from January 1, 1920, to October 1, 1920, and that he has no other source of income whatsoever; that he is financially unable to respond to any further orders which the court might make for payment of money to appellant; that he has paid, upon order of the trial court, approximately $200 for the reporter's transcript to be used by appellant in her appeal; that he was forced to borrow this sum to make such payment. He also sets out that the allowance of money for the surgical treatment alleged to be necessary for appellant was refused by the trial court upon the first motion made for alimony pendente lite, and that the growth which appellant states she desires to have removed was one with which she was afflicted prior to her marriage with the respondent. We must assume that the refusal of the trial court, upon the first motion of appellant, to allow money for this purpose was for good cause, and that upon the hearing on this second motion the court has found against the appellant upon the conflicting allegations of fact with relation thereto. Respondent also alleges that appellant is in no way physically incapacitated from earning her living, but, on the contrary, that she is sufficiently robust to harass and annoy him and follow him about on his business trips and physically assault him, all of which he charges her with since the filing of the interlocutory decree of divorce. In detail, he alleges that on May 30, 1920, she followed him to Novato, Cal., whither he had gone on business, and assaulted him on the street, and used vile language to him in the presence of his son and his friends; that she was arrested for disturbing the peace as a result of this outrage. The affidavits of several other persons substantiate these charges, including the affidavits of the deputy sheriff and the justice of the peace before whom the matter was heard. The facts disclosed by those affidavits show a most inexcusable course of conduct, violent scenes on the street, threats and blows, and that after respondent had retired to his mother's house, appellant pounded upon the door, and when unable to gain admittance, went around the house, shouting, "The stove you are cooking on is not yours; it is not paid for," and similar remarks. Upon her arrest she pleaded guilty to the charge of disturbing the peace, and paid a fine of $5. The charges upon which the divorce was granted to the respondent were of a character similar to this last incident. Respondent also filed the affidavit of John Alpi to the effect that the appellant had told him that before she would permit the respondent to get a divorce she would make him pay well for it; that she would "break him" and "torture him."

We are not concerned here with appellant's contradictions of these matters, because the trial court has resolved the conflict against her, and, as stated before, we are rectifying the evidence which appears in the record as a basis for the order made by the trial court, accepting it as true.

It further appears, by the affidavits of the deputy constable of Novato township and of the justice of the peace who heard the charge of disturbing the peace made against appellant, that after a fine had been imposed upon appellant she made the remark in court that—

"Anderson is a dirty dog. I will get even with him; I am going to get some one to beat him. I will go up one side of the street and down the other in this town and tell the inhabitants of Novato about him."

[2, 3] These matters, and other similar ones in the affidavits filed by respondent, in connection with the intimate knowledge of the trial judge of the facts of the case, obtained in the trial of the divorce action, assuredly warranted him in concluding that the appellant was not asking for this money in good faith, and that she was not prosecuting her appeal in good faith, and that it was without merit. It has been recognized that such matters enter into the exercise of the discretion of the trial court upon such a motion as we are here considering. In Gay v. Gay, supra, it was said:

"The fact that the judge of the lower court before whom the case was tried, and who was therefore fully advised of all the proceedings therein, awarded her the alimony, is some evidence that he believed there was merit in her appeal, and that it was being taken in good faith. If he believed otherwise, he would have denied the motion."

[4] Whether or not alimony pending an appeal shall be granted is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court, and its action relative to an application therefor will not be disturbed by this court, save when it appears that such discretion has been abused. The order appealed from is affirmed.

CITY OF REDDING v. DOZIER. (Civ. 2424.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 24, 1922.)

1. Licenses $\S$ 6(1)—Cities have power to license businesses for revenue purposes.

Since the amendment to Municipal Corporation Act, $\S$ 862, subd. 10, adopted in 1903 (St. 1903, p. 93), repealed by implication the provision of Pol. Code, $\S$ 3366, enacted in 1901 (St. 1901, p. 635), limiting the powers of cities and towns to license business to the purpose of regulation, and subsequent amendments of section 3366 passed in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 723) and 1917 (St. 1917, p. 279) have both provided that this act should not be deemed to repeal the power to license for revenue purposes, while amendments of the Municipal Corporation Act in the same years retained section 862, subd. 10, in the same form, a municipal corporation has authority to license businesses for revenue purposes only.

2. Licenses $\S$ 6(2)—Power to license business includes licensing physician.

The authority given municipal corporations to license business for revenue purposes authorized a revenue license upon a physician carrying on the business of practicing medicine at a fixed place.

3. Pleading $\S$ 406(9)—Evidence held to cure omission from complaint of allegation defendant had fixed place of business.

In an action to collect from a physician a city license, testimony by defendant that he received patients at his residence, performed operations there, and kept them there for treatment when they required close observation, conclusively shows that he had a fixed place of business and cures a claimed defect in the complaint which alleged defendant was practicing medicine and had his principal place of business within the city, but did not allege that he had a fixed place of business.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the City of Redding, a municipal corporation, against Earnest Dozier, to recover a license tax. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. Kimball and Roscoe J. Anderson, both of Redding, for appellant.

W. D. Tillotson, of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff was given judgment for $10 alleged to be due as a license tax imposed under an ordinance adopted by plaintiff city. The principal question raised is whether the city has authority to impose the tax.

The defendant is a physician and surgeon residing and practicing in the city of Redding and having his office at his place of residence. Redding is a city of the sixth class, incorporated as such in 1887 under the Municipal Corporations Act of 1883 (St. 1883, p. 93).

The ordinance is entitled:

"An ordinance to license various classes of business, shows, exhibitions and games within the city of Redding for the purpose of revenue and regulation, and fixing the rates of license tax upon the same and providing for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise."

Section 1 provides:

"Every person, firm, association, copartnership or corporation, who has a fixed place of business, and engages in, carries on, or conducts any business, exhibitions or games, described in this ordinance, within the city of Redding, shall pay a license therefor in the amount hereinafter specified. * * *

Section 2 provides:

"Licenses to be paid as provided in the preceding section and the persons who shall be required to pay the same and the business upon which the same is to be paid respectively are the following, to wit: * * * (29) Lawyers, doctors and dentists, $5 per quarter."

[1] Since the question raised seems to have been definitely settled in this state, it is deemed sufficient to call attention to the statutes and decisions on the subject. The ordinance in question was adopted March 1, 1920.

Section 862, subd. 10, of the Municipal Corporations Act, as originally enacted, empowered the trustees of cities of the sixth class "to license, for purposes of regulation and revenue, all and every kind of business authorized by law and transacted or carried on in such city or town; * * * to fix the rates of license tax upon the same, and to provide for the collection of the same by suit or otherwise."

In 1901 (St. 1901, p. 635) section 3366 of the Political Code was adopted, providing as follows:

"Boards of supervisors of the counties of the state, and the legislative bodies of the incorporated cities and towns therein, shall, in the exercise of their police powers, and for the purpose of regulation, as herein provided, and not otherwise, have power to license all and every kind of business not prohibited by law. * * *

In City of Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 Pac. 674, it was held that subdivision 10 of section 862 of the Municipal Corporations Act, "giving to the board of town trustees power to license for purposes of revenue, is repealed * * * by section 3366 of the Political Code."

In 1903 (St. 1903, p. 93) subdivision 10 of section 862 of the Municipal Corporations Act was amended by substituting the words "for the purpose of revenue and regulation" for the words "for the purposes of regulation and revenue" in the original enactment. In Ex parte Jackson, 143 Cal. 564, 77 Pac. 457, it was held that the amendment of 1903 repealed by implication the inconsistent provision of section 3366 of the Political

Code "so far as the application of such section to cities of the sixth class is concerned."

Section 3366 was amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 723), and again in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 279) both amendments containing the following provision:

"This act shall not be deemed to repeal any act vesting municipal corporations with power to license for revenue purposes."

In 1915 (St. 1915, p. 828) and also in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1528), section 862 of the Municipal Corporations Act was amended; the amendment in each instance being approved at a later date than the approval of the amendment in the same year of section 3366. Both amendments of section 862 retained subdivision 10 thereof in the form adopted in 1903. It thus appears that the power of the trustees of a city of the sixth class to impose a license tax for the purpose of revenue has not been changed since the decision in Ex parte Jackson, supra, and that case is controlling here. Counsel for appellant contend that the decision in that case is based on an erroneous interpretation of the law, but no sufficient reason is advanced to support the contention.

[2] In Ex parte Johnson (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 852, it was held that a city may impose a license tax for carrying on the business of a lawyer at a fixed place of business. In Ex parte Galusha, 184 Cal. 697, 195 Pac. 406, the Supreme Court reached the same conclusion. It must be held that the same rule applies to a physician and surgeon.

[3] The complaint alleges that the "defendant was and now is a doctor practicing medicine and having his office and principal place of business in the city of Redding." Appellant argues that the allegation as to place of business is not the equivalent of a "fixed place of business." The criticism is hypercritical. The defendant testified that he has a large practice; that he receives patients at his residence and performs operations there; that he regularly keeps patients at his residence for treatment when they require close observation; that there is no room in his residence designated as an office, but that he treats his patients in the living room; that he treats most of his patients at their homes. The foregoing evidence, coming from the defendant, conclusively shows that he has a fixed place of business and that the alleged defect in the complaint, if conceded to be a defect, could not have prejudiced the defendant's rights.

The judgment is affirmed.

UHL et ux. v. FERTIG. (Civ. 3616.)(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 6, 1922.)

1. Highways ⇐184(3)—In suit for injury in a collision, held that there was evidence of defendant exceeding speed limit which the court had a right to consider.

In an action for injuries to an automobile in a collision, held there was evidence which the court had a right to consider as substantially tending to show defendant was exceeding the statutory speed limit immediately before the collision.

2. Highways ⇐184(3)—Swerving to left to avoid collision not negligence as a matter of law.

Where defendant, to avoid collision with plaintiff's automobile entering the road from private grounds, swerved to his left beyond the center of the highway, he was not guilty of negligence as a matter of law.

3. Highways ⇐176—Motor vehicle going along main artery of travel has right prior to one emerging from private grounds.

As between a motor vehicle moving along a main artery of travel and another vehicle emerging from private grounds, the former has the first right to pass.

4. Highways ⇐184(2)—Evidence held to show contributory negligence in failing to signal was the proximate cause of a collision.

In an action for injury to an automobile in a collision with another, evidence held to show that contributory negligence in failing to sound a signal as required by the Motor Vehicle Act of 1919 was the proximate cause of the collision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Mel Uhl and wife against H. C. Fertig. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller and J. N. Owen, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James E. Kelby, of Los Angeles, and Floyd S. Sisk, of Venice, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs were awarded judgment for damages. They alleged in their complaint that defendant operated in a negligent manner an automobile upon the public highway, with the result that it collided with a similar vehicle owned by the plaintiffs and damaged the latter. It was particularly alleged that the defendant's car was being driven at a speed in excess of 35 miles per hour. The amount of the recovery allowed was the sum of $650, from which judgment the defendant has appealed.

San Fernando boulevard, in the county of Los Angeles, is a paved thoroughfare 24 feet in width. It is one of the main highways carrying traffic to and from points northward in the state, and along its course stage lines and other passenger vehicles are accustomed to travel at a high rate of speed. It is admitted that at the place where the accident hereinafter referred to occurred conditions were such as to authorize a driver of a motor vehicle upon that highway to maintain the maximum speed permitted by the Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382, and St. 1919, p. 191), to wit, 35 miles per hour. The highway from the point mentioned extends in a generally northerly and southerly direction and for a great distance it is straight. On the day in question, at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, defendant was driving a touring car, weighing approximately 5,000 pounds, southerly along the highway and in the direction of the city of Los Angeles. He was driving on the right-hand side of the roadway. Plaintiff's son, a boy 18 years of age, operating a motor roadster which weighed approximately 2,950 pounds, emerged from a driveway leading from private property and from the westerly side of the highway. It was the intention of the boy to go to a point northerly on the main boulevard, and to do this it was necessary for him to cross the boulevard at right angles and turn to the left. This operation would take him directly across the path of the approaching machine which was, as we have stated, operated by the defendant. There was a distance from the property line from which the private driveway proceeded, to the edge of the paved portion of the highway, of 18 feet. To the northward of the driveway and at about the center of this 18-foot strip was a row of large pepper trees which at that time of the day cast their shadows over considerable of the width of the paved highway. There was a rose hedge on the property line 5 or 6 feet high commencing immediately at the driveway and extending northward for some feet, probably 25 or 30, and several palm trees were set outside the rose hedge and immediately adjacent to the driveway on the north and between the hedge and the line of pepper trees. The inner space back of the property line and to the north of the driveway was set with lemon trees which were about 5 feet in height. As to the facts now stated there was no dispute. At this point we will narrate the substance of the testimony introduced on behalf of the plaintiff. George Uhl, the young man who was driving plaintiff's machine, testified that he was proceeding out of the driveway at the rate of 8 or 10 miles per hour, and decreased his speed somewhat (how much does not appear) as he approached the gateway. His further narrative was as follows:

"When the front end of my machine arrived at the point practically coterminous with the property line there are rose bushes obstructing the view of the highway toward the north. Back of the rose bushes about 25 or 30 feet and toward the house I could see in a northerly direction along the highway about 500 feet. The rose bushes referred to obstructed the view of the highway north from the gate along the major part of the fence. As soon as I was even with the property line I could see northerly about 2,000 feet. The road was straight, with a slight decline. As I approached the highway I looked in a northerly direction for the approach of a machine. My speed then was about 8 miles an hour, and I approached the highway at a right angle. As I approached this pavement I again looked north. My machine, which was an Oldsmobile roadster, at the time it was struck by the other machine, was on the easterly side of the road with the exception of the rear wheel and portion of the outer wheel which was about one foot westerly of the center line of the highway, and I was headed a slight degree toward the north when struck, having begun to turn the machine when the collision occurred. When the collision occurred I had crossed the center of the road. The machine which struck me was proceeding southerly. As I started on the pavement I increased my speed as much as the car would pick up. The pavement slightly raises upwards there. When I first saw the machine which collided with me it was about 1,000 feet northerly, and I was just on or without the property line when I saw it, my front wheel just approaching the paved portion of the highway. I did not keep my eye on it all the time. Upon seeing the machine 1,000 feet away, at the usual rate of speed, I knew I had time—that the other car would be coming, I knew I had time to get across, which I did, and my whole machine, except just about one foot of it, was on my side of the road when I was struck by Mr. Fertig's machine. * * * I should judge the Pierce-Arrow was driven at a speed of 40 miles an hour or over. After striking me the other machine driven by Mr. Fertig, went about twice the distance I did. I didn't see Mr. Fertig make any effort to retard his machine. * * * Seated in a car, one can't see over the hedge along the driveway. I did not stop my car before proceeding on the boulevard. My front wheels were just about at the edge of the pavement when I started to pick up speed. From the time I first observed Mr. Fertig until I was struck I had traveled about 15 or 16 feet. I was going about 10 miles an hour, I should judge, when I was struck. Mr. Fertig was going about 40 miles an hour. * * * As I came out of the driveway I looked in both directions to see if machines were approaching. None were approaching from the south, going toward San Fernando, and I saw none toward the north except Mr. Fertig's machine. * * * One can't see in a northerly direction until he is beyond the property line. Just so you are beyond the property line you can see out both directions along the highway. There are no intersecting highways in the vicinity of the accident, the first junction being about 4 or 5 miles to the south. I paid no attention to Mr. Fertig's car from the time I first saw it until I glanced and saw him swerve towards me."

Defendant's machine struck the plaintiff's car on the left side thereof and about midway between the front and the rear wheels. The force of the impact carried plaintiff's machine for a distance of 40 feet, and defendant's car, after losing its contact, went on for a distance of 21 feet before it came to a standstill. There was testimony of one witness showing that, when he arrived shortly after the accident and made certain measurements, he found the distance between the car of the plaintiff and that of the defendant to be greater than we have stated it to be, but there was no evidence showing that the machines were in the same position at the time these measurements were made as they were immediately after the collision.

[1] We have stated in its most favorable light in general substance the testimony for the plaintiffs. We have in addition referred to the fact as to the movement of the two cars after the collision, as shown by their position when they were stopped. We take occasion here to point out that conditions last referred to were not pertinent at all to be considered in estimating the speed at which the defendant was traveling, because the court was not enlightened by the testimony of any witness informed upon that subject as to what might be the movement of machines, after colliding as these machines were shown to have collided. That is, judging from these conditions alone, the court would not have been authorized to conclude that the defendant's speed at the time of the accident was in excess of any particular number of miles per hour. We refer especially to that matter because it is the contention of appellant that there was no substantial evidence conflicting with that given by the defendant and his witnesses as to the rate of speed at which the car driven by the former was being operated at the time. Defendant testified that he was traveling immediately prior to the accident at from 28 to 30 miles per hour. The passenger who was riding with him testified that the speed of defendant's car was 25 or 30 miles per hour at the time of the accident. The statement was made by one witness who arrived on the scene after the accident occurred, in which he expressed to the defendant the opinion that defendant's car must have been going 50 or 60 miles per hour. This testimony was of no evidentiary value whatsoever, notwithstanding that it was further stated that defendant made no response to the estimate given by that witness. It was shown that the defendant did immediately after the collision state that he (defendant) had the right of way and was going at less than 30 miles an hour. It is appellant's claim that there was no substantial evidence showing that defendant was traveling at more than the legal speed of 35 miles per hour. The case for the plaintiff as to this issue rests upon the assertion of George Uhl. That witness stated in one part of his testimony that defendant was traveling at a speed of "40 miles an hour or over," and again that "Mr. Fertig was going at about 40 miles an hour." No objection was made that this witness was not qualified to estimate that speed. This testimony, standing alone, would afford some evidence from which the court might properly find that the speed of the defendant's car was 40 miles per hour. Appellant contrasts the statements which we have quoted with another portion of the boy's testimony, wherein he stated that when he first observed the defendant's car northward on the boulevard it was about 1,000 feet away. As the witness testified that he had traveled 15 or 16 feet going at a rate of 8 or 10 miles an hour when his car was collided with by that of defendant, appellant proceeds to show by a simple mathematical calculation that the boy's statement of 1,000 feet distance was farfetched and utterly unreliable. And indeed it was so. As appellant argues, if the defendant traveled 1,000 feet while the boy's machine, going at the rate of 10 miles per hour, traveled 15 or 16 feet, then it must have been that the defendant's car was moving at the impossible rate of over 500 miles per hour. If we were authorized to assume that George Uhl's capacity for estimating speed at which a motorcar might be traveling was no better than his capacity for estimating distance, then the argument of counsel would be altogether sound, and it would follow, as a necessary conclusion, that all of the testimony given by George Uhl on the question of the speed of defendant's car was unreliable and should be given no consideration in the case. We cannot so assume, and it must be said that the record exhibits some testimony which the court had the right to consider as substantial tending to establish the fact that the defendant, immediately before the collision, was traveling at a speed in excess of that allowed by law. "If facts are doubtful, as the result of uncertain evidence or conflict of testimony, the question should be submitted to the jury." Davis v. California St. R. Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 Pac. 647. So also whenever upon the evidence "the conclusion [of fact] is open to debate, it is for the jury." Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407. The evidence given by George Uhl was more definite than where a plaintiff's witness described by the speed of a defendant's automobile as "very fast," as was the case in Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38. See, also, Finkle v. Tait (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 1031.

[2] And we think that the finding as to defendant's negligence can be sustained only because of the evidence of defendant's failure to observe the requirement not to exceed the maximum of 35 miles per hour while traveling on the highway. As a matter of law, his act in swerving toward the left when it appeared to him that a collision was imminent, instead of continuing on the right-hand side of the road, was not in itself negligence. Defendant's testimony is entitled to be taken as representing the conditions which caused him to guide his machine to the left, for it stands uncontradicted. He testified that when he saw the plaintiff's car it was 60 or 75 feet away and approaching within 2 or 3 feet of the paved boulevard, going 8 or 10 miles an hour. He then testified as follows:

"When I first saw his car I turned to the center of the road to try and avoid an accident with him, thinking that I had plenty of time to go around him and avoid the accident. Just when I applied the brakes I do not know. I had but a fraction of a second within which to act."

There are many cases, several of which are cited by appellant in his brief, which declare the familiar rule that, where a person discovers himself in sudden peril, without sufficient time to weigh all of the surrounding circumstances, that the act which he may then do is not a negligent one, even though it may appear, upon reasoned consideration, that his choice was unwise.

"The rule, judicially stated, is that one who in a sudden emergency acts according to his best judgment, or who, because of want of time in which to form a judgment, omits to act in the most judicious manner, is not chargeable with negligence." 20 Ruling Case Law, p. 29.

[3] Appellant insists that the evidence shows without conflict that the driver of plaintiff's car was guilty of contributory negligence. He prefaces the argument to this point with the assertion that, as between a motor vehicle moving along a main artery of travel and another vehicle emerging from private ground abutting the highway, the former must be conceded the first right to pass. To that proposition we are disposed to give ready assent. It would seem to be a rule founded upon the reasonable necessities of the situation assumed. The conditions which surrounded the parties at the time and place where the accident herein referred to occurred well illustrate the need for declaring the rule to be as indicated. Over that thoroughfare a great deal of vehicular traffic constantly passed, and high rates of speed were maintained. The casual machine that might emerge upon the highway from private property aligning the same could better suffer the small delay by allowing precedence to the highway traffic and so not only avoid obstructing the latter, but decrease the danger of injury by collision.

[4] Once it is determined that the right of way was in the defendant, it follows that the latter was not required to watch with the same vigilance all abutting private property for the coming of possible obstructions to his progress as he would be required to watch along the surface of the highway ahead of him and at intersecting public ways. Traveling at a high rate of speed—35 miles an hour being permitted—the duty was imperative that such driver should keep his eyes on the road. He was not required to anticipate the unexpected event that a motor vehicle would suddenly issue forth from private grounds and cross the highway in front of him. He had not the duty to look across hedges or through shrubbery, nor yet to scan the ground within the line where shade trees bounded the footway outside the property line. We apply here the conclusions just drawn only for the purpose of showing that a situation existed which made it the duty of the driver of plaintiff's car to give ample warning by audible signal of his approach to the main thoroughfare. The Motor Vehicle Act (Statutes of 1915, p. 397), provides that—

"Every person operating a motor vehicle shall sound said bell, gong, horn, whistle or other device whenever necessary as a warning of danger."

In the answer of defendant it was expressly alleged that plaintiff's car was "propelled along said private driveway and upon and across said highway at an excessive and negligent rate of speed and without any warning being given by the person in charge of said car of the presence of the same upon or the movement thereof along said private driveway." It was further alleged that said driver did not use ordinary diligence and care to discover the presence of approaching cars on the boulevard. The trial judge found that plaintiff's driver was not negligent and that plaintiff's car was not driven onto the highway "at an excessive speed, or without giving drivers upon said highway any warning of the movements of said car." It was sufficiently established and without contradiction that George Uhl, the driver of plaintiff's car, sounded no horn or other signal giving warning of his approach from the driveway. In his own testimony he makes no mention of having given any such signal. The defendant testified that he heard no signal or horn sounded by any one. A witness who was riding with defendant testified that he "heard no signal of any kind prior to the accident." One witness for plaintiff testified that he heard the crash of the automobiles in collision, that he had seen plaintiff's son drive the automobile away from the home toward San Fernando, and that he heard the sound of a horn. He did not tell from what direction that sound came, nor did he by any language indicate whether that sound came from the plaintiff's automobile or from some passing machine upon the highway. Plaintiff's machine at no time was stopped in its progress from the driveway across the highway to the point where it was struck. Traveling at from 8 to 10 miles per hour, as George Uhl said it was, the time occupied by its movement from the property line onto the paved portion of the highway would be a matter of about two seconds. We have already pointed out that the estimate of George Uhl as to the distance (1,000 feet) that defendant's car was away from the line of the driveway at the time he first saw it was utterly unreliable. It was so at variance with other facts and circumstances as to furnish no conflict whatsoever with the testimony of the defendant and his witnesses regarding the situation which immediately preceded the collision. The defendant testified that he had been driving on the right-hand side of the road immediately prior to the accident and was looking straight ahead along the road; that there were no street intersections ahead for a distance of 400 or 600 feet, and the country was sparsely built up, there being an occasional ranch. A witness called on behalf of the defendant testified that in his opinion a car of the weight of that of the defendant's, on level asphalt pavement, with three passengers, going at the speed of 30 miles an hour, would require from 80 to 100 feet within which to be brought to a stop. That the car of the defendant must have been approximately at the place and distance where the defendant's testimony stated it to be may be demonstrated by taking into account the speed of 40 miles per hour at which George Uhl said defendant's car was traveling, together with the distances and rate of speed given by the witness George Uhl as referring to the machine which he himself was operating. Regardless of whether George Uhl was negligent in miscalculating the distance between his car and that of the defendant, and was therefore negligent in not conceding the right of way to the approaching machine, it very clearly appears that, had he obeyed the law as well as observed the rule of common prudence, he would have given notice of his approach to the highway by some signal audible to those who might take warning from the sound. Under the evidence we are satisfied that it clearly appeared that the negligence of the driver of the plaintiff's car contributed proximately to the cause of the collision. The findings of the trial court in that particular are not sustained by the evidence.

COLTHURST v. FITZGERALD, Justice of the Peace. (Civ. 2456.)

1. Justices of the peace ⚡64—Time to answer after demurrer should not be extended beyond two-day period.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 872, 874, a justice of the peace was without authority to extend defendant's time to answer after his demurrer was overruled, beyond the two-day limitation fixed by section 874, the amendment (St. 1921, p. 122) of section 872, authorizing an extension not to exceed five days, not applying to orders entered prior thereto.

2. Justices of the peace ⚡95—Time to answer cannot be extended after defendant was in default.

Even if the justice of the peace had authority to extend the time within which defendant might answer after his demurrer was overruled, he could not grant such extension by an order entered after the defendant was in default.

3. Mandamus ⚡177, 190—Damages cannot be recovered unless pleaded and proved; costs recoverable by petitioner.

The petitioner for mandamus to compel a justice of the peace to enter judgment cannot recover damages without pleading and proving them, though he may recover his costs incurred in the mandamus proceedings, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1095.

Original application by J. E. Colthurst for a writ of mandate to be directed to J. A. Fitzgerald, as Justice of the Peace for Vallejo Township, to require him to enter judgment in favor of the petitioner in an action by the petitioner against Mary V. Smylie and husband. Peremptory writ issued.

J. E. Colthurst, of Vallejo, for petitioner.

FINCH, P. J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel respondent to enter judgment in favor of petitioner in an action, pending in the justice court of Vallejo township, Solano county, in which petitioner is plaintiff, and Mary V. Smylie and Charles Frank Smylie, her husband, are defendants.

On the filing of the petition herein, this court caused an alternative writ of mandate to issue requiring respondent to enter judgment as prayed for or, in default thereof, to show cause before this court at 10 o'clock a. m. on February 20, 1922, why he had not done so. The alternative writ, together with a copy of the petition and of petitioner's points and authorities, was duly served on respondent ten days prior to the time set for the hearing. Copies were likewise served on said Charles Frank Smylie and on Joe Lawrence, Jr., attorney for the defendants in the action in the justice court. Neither the respondent nor said defendants appeared at the hearing, and the matter was heard at the time appointed on the verified petition on file, and was argued and submitted by the petitioner.

From the facts presented at the hearing, it appears that the action in the justice court was brought to recover from the defendants therein the sum of $168, alleged to be due the plaintiff for counsel fees and costs advanced by him. The defendants interposed their demurrer to the complaint in that action. The demurrer came on regularly to be heard May 7, 1920, and the same was on that day overruled by the respondent. Respondent attempted to grant the defendants ten days to answer after the overruling of the demurrer. On May 18, 1920, petitioner demanded the entry of judgment by default against the defendants. The respondent refused on the ground that he had granted defendants an additional ten days to answer. May 28, 1920, the petitioner again made demand upon respondent to enter judgment but was again refused. Thereafter the defendants filed separate answers, denying the alleged indebtedness to the plaintiff therein.

[1, 2] It appears clear that the respondent was without authority to extend defendants' time to answer to the extent attempted. Sections 872 and 874, Code Civ. Proc.; Hall v. Kerrigan, 135 Cal. 4, 66 Pac. 868. The amendment of section 872 (Stats. 1921, p. 122), authorizing the court to allow a defendant not to exceed five days to answer, after his demurrer to the complaint is overruled, can have no application, of course, to prior orders. Even if it be conceded that the respondent had authority to extend the time to answer beyond the two-day limitation fixed by section 874, he could not so extend the time after the defendants were in default. Freese v. Freese, 134 Cal. 48, 66 Pac. 43; Union Collection Co. v. Oliver, 162 Cal. 758, 124 Pac. 435.

[3] Petitioner prays for his costs incurred in this proceeding, and, in his argument, he claimed the right to recover damages sustained. He neither alleged nor proved any damage and consequently can recover none. He is entitled to his costs herein incurred. Code Civ. Proc. § 1095; Gould v. Moss, 158 Cal. 548, 111 Pac. 925.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate be issued by the clerk of this court, directed to respondent, J. A. Fitzgerald, justice of the peace in and for Vallejo township, Solano county, Cal., requiring him, as such justice of the peace, to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants, for the sum of $168 and costs of suit, in that certain action, pending in said justice court and described in the petition herein, wherein said J. E. Colthurst is plaintiff and said Mary V. Smylie and Charles Frank Smylie are defendants. It is further ordered that petitioner have judgment against the respondent for petitioner's costs herein incurred.

RUCKER v. HUBLER. (Civ. 3679.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 8, 1922.)

1. Brokers — 88(14)—Finding of ownership of property held sufficient.

In an action by a real estate agent for a commission for negotiating an agreement to exchange property, the finding of a written agreement whereby defendant agreed to exchange his property for the property "owned by" another party named was a sufficient finding that the latter owned the property.

2. Brokers — 61(1)—Commission held earned when agreement for exchange made, and not to be dependent on its being carried out.

A real estate agent, contracting to secure an agreement for the transfer of property in exchange, earns his commission when the agreement to exchange is made, and the commission does not depend on its being carried out.

3. Brokers — 89—Money judgment for commission held proper.

In an action by a broker against a client for damages for refusing to pay a commission for negotiating a contract of exchange of property between the client and another, where the commission was to be paid by conveying to the broker a lot worth $500 and paying him $100, a judgment for $600 was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge pro tem.

Action by M. S. Rucker against S. M. Hubler. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Victor T. Watkins, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph H. Clock and C. C. McWhinney, both of Long Beach, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. [1, 2] By this action plaintiff, Rucker, sued to recover $600 as commission for having represented defendant, Hubler, as agent, and having secured the execution of an agreement of exchange of real estate. Concerning this agreement the court found as follows:

"That on or about the 11th day of January, 1919, in the city of Long Beach, Cal., the defendant, S. M. Hubler, employed the plaintiff, M. S. Rucker, as a real estate broker to secure an agreement for the transfer of the southeast quarter (S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of section twenty-two (22), township five south (5 S.), range six (6), Riverside county, California, for certain real property owned by one Samuel Brown described as lot twenty-three (23), Potter's Woodlawn subdivision, city and county of Los Angeles, for which services the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff as hereinafter found."

The court further found that plaintiff secured the execution of a written agreement by which one Samuel Brown agreed to exchange his property for defendant's and defendant agreed to accept the same in exchange for that described in the agency agreement. The defense interposed was that Brown did not own the property which he offered to exchange, and also refused to carry out the contract which he signed. Appellant contends that the court made no finding upon either of the supposed issues thus presented. In addition to that contained in the finding above quoted, the court in its second finding states:

"And on that date the defendant and one Samuel Brown entered into a written agreement of exchange wherein and whereby the defendant agreed to exchange his property above described for the property owned by Samuel Brown above described."

As to the ownership of the property by Brown, it is true that the finding might have been more direct. However, if a finding on that matter were necessary, the one made is sufficient.

But Rucker earned his commission when the agreement to exchange was signed by Hubler and Brown. The evidence is not contained in the transcript before us, and the findings must therefore be taken to correctly set forth the import of the agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendant. The principal, having accepted the customer by entering into an agreement, will not be permitted to question the ability or the willingness of the customer to carry out the exchange. 9 C. J. 631, 632; 4 R. C. L. 309. This contract only required Rucker "as a real estate broker to secure an agreement for the transfer" of the defendant's property in exchange. Under such an agreement the agent's commission is not dependent upon the exchange being carried out. Jennings v. Jordan, 31 Cal. App. 335, 160 Pac. 576. Appellant cites Connor v. Riggins, 21 Cal. App. 756, 132 Pac. 849. That decision has no application to the instant case for the contract expressly provided that the transaction should be "consummated." Neither of the alleged defenses constituted legal defenses, and no findings upon them were necessary.

[3] Appellant further complains that the court should not have given judgment for $600, but, if at all, the decree should have been that defendant convey a certain lot agreed to be given Rucker as a part of his commission and $100. Such a decree would conform to the agency agreement, but the court found that defendant had broken this agreement, and refused to convey the lot. The action is not one for specific performance, but for damages. The court found the reasonable value of the lot to be $500. This, plus the $100 stipulated in the contract of agency, makes $600, for which amount judgment was properly entered.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OWENS. (Cr. 598.)

1. False pretenses —39—Burden of proof as to lack of funds or credit of one passing a check is on prosecution.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476a, for making and uttering a check on a bank without having funds or credit in the bank to meet the check, the burden is on the prosecution to show that defendant had neither funds nor credit to meet the check.

2. Criminal law —800(1)—Instruction defining "credit" should be given in prosecution for passing check on a bank in which defendant had no funds nor credit.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476a, for making and uttering a check upon a bank without having funds in, or credit with, the bank to meet the check, an instruction defining "credit" as used in the statute should have been given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

George Owens was convicted of making and uttering a check on a bank without having funds or credit to meet it, and he appeals. Reversed.

W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of making and uttering a check upon a bank without having funds in or credit with such bank to meet such check, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The charge is based on section 476a, Penal Code.

[1] The evidence shows that the defendant made the check, delivered it to the prosecuting witness, and received the face value thereof in money, and that the records of the bank did not contain the name of the defendant as a depositor. The evidence further shows that the prosecuting witness took the check to the bank on which it was drawn but did not cash it there. He testified that the bank refused payment, but such testimony was stricken out by the court. The record is silent as to whether the defendant had credit with the bank to meet the check. If he had such credit, then no crime was committed. The burden was on the prosecution to show that the defendant had neither funds nor credit with the bank to meet the check.

Respondent urges that the question whether the defendant had funds in or credit with the bank was peculiarly within his own knowledge, and that the burden of proof on that issue was on him. The Supreme Court has held to the contrary. People v. Frey, 165 Cal. 140, 145, 131 Pac. 127.

[2] The court refused to give an instruction defining the word "credit" as used in the statute. The instruction should have been given. The other instructions refused were contained in other parts of the charge to the jury.

The judgment and order are reversed.

In re HAHN. (Civ. 3834.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 4, 1922.)

Attorney and client —61—Disbarred attorney held entitled to reinstatement.

Evidence considered, and held to show that an attorney disbarred for unprofessional conduct had reformed and was entitled to be reinstated.

In the matter of S. S. Hahn. Application for an order reinstating petitioner as attorney and counselor at law. Order granted.

Grant Jackson, Joseph Scott, and W. H. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Loeb, Walker & Loeb and John W. Hart, all of Los Angeles, for Los Angeles County Bar Ass'n.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner herein on the 26th day of July, 1915, was, after examination duly made, admitted to practice law in all the courts of the state. In November, 1917, the Bar Association of Los Angeles County filed in the superior court an accusation wherein there was set forth a description of certain acts done by this petitioner while practicing his profession. The accusation contained three counts. The first set forth language used by petitioner in the argument of a criminal case in the superior court, which language was offensive and vituperative in character and wholly unjustifiable from every standpoint of professional ethics. In a second count it was charged that petitioner, by way of advice to several persons and in the presence of the officer named, said:

"The next time Officer Whaples comes into this house I advise you to stab, injure him in any way, or even kill him, and I will defend you."

The third count contained the charge that petitioner had procured a complaint to be verified containing a statement which he knew to be untrue. After hearing the evidence in support of the accusation, and petitioner's defense thereto, the superior court on March 5, 1918, made its judgment depriving petitioner of any further right to practice law. On March 8, 1918, petitioner enlisted as a private soldier in the army of the United States and on July 2, 1918, was sent with the Expeditionary Forces to France, where he saw active service on the battle front, attaining the rank of sergeant. In May, 1919, he was returned to the United States and received honorable discharge from the service. In July, 1919, he presented to the superior court his petition that he be reinstated as an attorney and counselor at law. After due consideration of the matter, and assuming that jurisdiction was reposed in that court so to act, the superior court made its order setting aside the judgment of disbarment and reinstating petitioner according to his prayer, whereupon he resumed the practice of his profession and continued thereat until January, 1921. At this time the district attorney filed an affidavit in the superior court alleging that this petitioner had never been legally reinstated in the right to practice and that his appearance in court as an attorney amounted to a contempt. The action of the district attorney was taken under the view that the superior court was without jurisdiction to make the order of reinstatement. The decisions In re Mash, 39 Cal. App. 548, 179 Pac. 897, and In re Danford (Cal. App.) 193 Pac. 272, affirmed this view and the superior court held that judgment of disbarment was still effective. Petitioner thereupon and on the 15th of February, 1921, filed in this court his petition asking for his reinstatement. The Bar Association filed written opposition to the petition and alleged further acts of petitioner, committed subsequent to his disbarment and during the time that he had re-engaged in practice of the law, as evidence of his unfitness. This court denied the application for reinstatement, and petitioner has now, after the lapse of nearly another year, renewed it, offering all of the evidence which was submitted at the prior hearing and additional evidence, by way of showing that he has earned the right to his reinstatement. Part of that evidence consists of written testimonials made by a number of the superior judges of Los Angeles county and lawyers practicing at the bar. Other of the documentary evidence consists of statements from various reputable persons with whom petitioner has been associated during the past year. Petitioner on his own behalf asserts that, whatever may have been his derelictions, they were due to inexperience and youth, and that, by reason of his various experiences in the war and in his business concerns subsequent thereto, he has acquired greater breadth of mind and more thorough appreciation of a proper standard of conduct to guide him in the future. He asserts and promises that, if reinstated, he will not again transcend the bounds of professional ethics in any manner whatsoever. In view of the showing made, we are convinced that petitioner has profited by his experiences and believe that he possesses the foundation of sufficient moral integrity of mind to fulfill his duty to his clients and to the profession. In addition to other recommendations submitted, the fact that three lawyers of long experience at the bar and of unquestioned standing have appeared as counsel and personally urged that favorable action be taken upon the application is entitled to be given weight in resolving the question. Their appearance in this behalf carries with it the guaranty that they act not alone for the best interest of the applicant, but also in the interest of the bar at large. And so we are impelled to the conclusion that petitioner should be given his chance to prove that he can from henceforth discharge the duties of an attorney at law with dignity and integrity, and render that high character of service which is ever demanded of the legal profession.

It is ordered that S. S. Hahn be, and he hereby is, restored all the rights and privileges of an attorney and counselor at law, and is authorized to practice his profession in all the courts of this state.

ALLEN v. LAUGHLIN FRUIT REFINERS, Inc. (Civ. 3651.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 11, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error — 434—Obtaining extension of time to file brief held an appearance.

Where counsel for respondent while an appeal was pending obtained extensions of time for filing a brief, based on stipulations with appellant's counsel, it constituted an appearance and an acknowledgment of the pendency of the appeal.

2. Contracts — 217—Contract construed as subject to cancellation only as to services to be rendered after cancellation.

Where plaintiff, a reporter for a commission, wrote to defendant, agreeing to accept an order for a report of certain investigations subject to cancellation at any time as to reports of subsequent hearings, to which defendant replied, placing an order for the report "subject to cancellation at any time," the contract was for services to be rendered, and, on plaintiff's furnishing a copy of the report, he was entitled to compensation, since the right of cancellation reserved was to cut off the service without being required to accept a further service concerning transcript to be made after cancellation of the order.

3. Contracts — 23—Acceptance held to be an unqualified acceptance of offer of services.

Where an offer to make a report of certain investigations before a committee was to "accept your order subject to cancellation at any time as to the reports of subsequent hearings, * * *" a reply, "We hereby place an order for the report subject to cancellation at any time," was an unqualified acceptance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Franklin W. Allen, doing business under the name and style of Hulse & Allen, against the Laughlin Fruit Refiners, Inc. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Adams, Adams & Binford, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dana Ong, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. At all times mentioned in the complaint the plaintiff was the official reporter for the Interstate Commerce Commission. Commencing on July 7, 1919, the Commission conducted hearings in several cities of the United States relating to increases in charges and changes in rules and regulations proposed in perishable protective tariff No. 1, compiled by the United States Railroad Administration. On July 3, 1919, the plaintiff at New York wrote a letter to the defendant at Los Angeles, stating that these hearings were to be held, and then making the following offer:

"As these increases and changes are of the utmost importance and shippers of perishable freight must follow the hearings carefully in order to protect their interests, we should be advised at once if you want copies of the official reports, which will be furnished at 12½ cents per page, the charge authorized and approved by the Commission, so that we may make enough copies to supply you."

On July 12th the defendant replied as follows:

"In answer to your letter of July 3 regarding Perishable Protective Tariff No. 1, we desire to place our order for same at 12½c per page, provided there are not too many pages. Will you kindly advise us about how many pages are contained in the article?"

On July 17th the plaintiff replied:

"Replying to your letter of July 12, 1919, we cannot tell how long each hearing in docket No. 10664, perishable freight investigation, will last, or how many pages there will be in the report, but we will gladly accept your order subject to cancellation at any time as to reports of subsequent hearings, so that you can control your expenditure, if the length of the hearings makes the cost of the complete report more than your interest warrants."

On July 23d the defendant replied:

"Yours of the 17th at hand. Regarding perishable freight investigation, docket No. 10664, we hereby place an order for the report subject to cancellation at any time."

On July 28th the plaintiff replied:

"Please accept our thanks for your order of July 23, for the reports of the hearings in docket No. 10664, perishable freight investigation, which will have our careful attention."

On the 27th day of August the plaintiff shipped to the defendant a package containing an installment of the report of the evidence received by the Commission in said matter. This was received by the defendant on the 9th day of September. Thereupon, on the same day, the defendant, by its manager, opened the package to see what it was, and immediately closed it up, and sent it back to the plaintiff. At the same time he sent a letter on behalf of the defendant to the plaintiff as follows:

"Referring to your letter of July 7th, we are to-day returning docket No. 10664, perishable freight investigation, as the cost of the report is more than our interest warrants. The writer expected to hear from you before shipping the report stating the number of pages it contained, the subject of our letter of July 12th."

On September 15th the plaintiff replied to the letter of September 9th as follows:

"Replying to your letter of September 9, we regret that we cannot accept the return for credit of the copy of the official report in docket No. 10664, which was furnished on your order, because our charge to you is for the services of our employees in making the copy for you and, as we cannot return that labor to them and get credit for it, we cannot comply with your request. We note the cancellation of your order effective at the end of the hearing of September 13, a copy of the report having been completed for you up to that date."

This is an action to recover compensation at the agreed rate for that part of the report which was delivered or tendered for delivery, up to and including September 13, 1919. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

[1] Preliminary to his argument on the merits, counsel for respondent claims that the appeal should be dismissed on the ground that the purported notice of appeal contained certain defects which rendered it ineffective as a notice of appeal. We deem it unnecessary to discuss these objections to the notice of appeal. After the notice had been given, and after the transcript had been filed, respondent obtained two successive orders, extending his time for filing a brief in response to the brief for appellant. These orders were based upon stipulations obtained by counsel for respondent from counsel for appellant. The obtaining of these stipulations and orders, unaccompanied by any reservation, constituted a complete appearance and acknowledgment of the pendency of the appeal. Thereafter, upon due notice, a formal motion to dismiss the appeal was presented to the court (in Division 2, where the case was then pending), and denied. The renewal of the motion is made by leave of court, but in our opinion it is without merit.

[2] The court in its findings, without referring at all to the letters preceding July 23, all of which were set out in the complaint, found the facts to be as follows:

"That on the 23d day of July, 1919, the defendant placed an order with plaintiff for a copy of the perishable freight investigation report, docket No. 10664, subject to cancellation; that plaintiff accepted this order and its terms and conditions; that on the 9th day of September, 1919, defendant canceled the said order."

It appears, therefore, that the contract was held to have been made completely by defendant's letter of July 23d and plaintiff's acceptance thereof, without regard to the preceding correspondence, and was construed to be an order subject to cancellation at the time and in the manner hereinbefore stated. In this we think that the court erred. The contract was for a service to be rendered. The right of cancellation as reserved in the letter of July 23d was a right reserved, entitling the defendant to cut off the service at any time without being required to accept a further service concerning transcript to be made at any time after cancellation of the order. Viewed in this light, we perceive no conflict between the terms of plaintiff's letter of July 17th and defendant's letter of July 23d. Therefore both of these letters together constitute the contract, under the terms of which the plaintiff is entitled to compensation at the agreed rate for such service as had been rendered prior to the receipt in due course of the order of cancellation. Plaintiff, having tendered the copy in accordance with its agreement, is entitled to payment therefor.

[3] Of course, we agree with the rule contended for by counsel for respondent and supported by the authorities, to which he refers, that an acceptance of an offer on terms varying from those proposed is a rejection of the offer, and that a qualified acceptance is a new proposal. But we hold that respondent's acceptance of the offer made by appellant was an unqualified acceptance.

The judgment is reversed.

SATHER v. SATHER. (Civ. 4134.)

1. Divorce ☞161—Affidavit on application to open default held insufficient.

Affidavit by a wife to open a default decree for divorce entered against her in behalf of the husband, alleging that "at the time of the service of said process defendant was so sorely disheartened by the past conduct of plaintiff that she failed to defend said action fearing that, if she did so, the plaintiff might cause her further arrest on some pretext or another," and that she has suffered illness "brought about by the unwarranted attacks of plaintiff by his either having her arrested or causing her to be arrested on one pretext or another and causing detectives to follow and annoy her," held insufficient under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to justify setting aside the default.

2. Divorce ☞161—Opening default decree held within discretion of court.

On conflicting affidavits on application by a wife to open default decree of divorce, whether the decree should be opened on the ground that defendant's failure to answer resulted from her fear of plaintiff arising from his misconduct held to rest within the discretion of the trial court.

3. Appeal and error ☞957(1)—Discretion as to opening default judgment not disturbed unless abused.

The granting or denial of a motion to set aside a default is largely a matter of discretion, and the action of the trial court will not be reversed unless there is a clear showing of abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by John P. Sather against Emma Rosie Sather. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
George Gelder, of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from an order denying her motion to set aside an interlocutory judgment of divorce and disallowing her application to file an answer. The complaint for divorce was upon the ground of desertion. Personal service of the summons was had upon the defendant, and, failing to answer, her default was entered. On April 14, 1921, an interlocutory judgment of divorce was granted and entered in favor of plaintiff. On June 23, 1921, about six weeks subsequent to the entry of said interlocutory judgment, defendant filed two motions, one to set aside the interlocutory decree, and the other for an allowance of counsel fees and alimony. The motions were noticed for hearing on July 1, 1921, and were heard by the court and denied on August 5, 1921. Defendant's application for relief from the default is based upon her own affidavit, and the proposed verified answer, and the sole reason stated by appellant for failing to answer the complaint, within the statutory period is that—

"At the time of the service of said process defendant was so sorely disheartened by the past conduct of plaintiff that she failed to defend said action, fearing that if she did so the plaintiff might cause her further arrest on some pretext or another."

In said affidavit it is further stated that ever since the service of the summons plaintiff has been ill and under the care of a physician; that her physical condition "has been brought about by the unwarranted attacks of plaintiff by his either having her arrested or causing her to be arrested on one pretext or another and causing detectives to follow and annoy her." Plaintiff, in a counter affidavit, denies the statements contained in defendant's affidavit, and, besides challenging the good faith of defendant's position, sets forth facts, which stand uncontradicted, so far as the record before us discloses, showing that these parties have been engaged in much previous legal controversy concerning their marital and property rights. In said counter affidavit plaintiff states that three previous actions between himself and wife have been brought and disposed of by the superior court of Alameda county. One was an action for divorce commenced by the appellant upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Although the court on September 29, 1920, denied a divorce to either party, it nevertheless found, on the issues raised by respondent's cross-complaint that appellant had on February 20, 1920, deserted and abandoned respondent. The second action was apparently an action in replevin brought by the respondent to recover the possession of certain personal property, presumably furniture. The court, on September 29, 1920, decided in favor of respondent, and again found that the appellant had on February 20, 1920, deserted and abandoned the respondent. The nature of the third action is not revealed by the counter affidavit, but it is shown that it was brought by the respondent, and was afterwards dismissed on stipulation. Subsequent to the disposal of these various actions, to wit, on October 14, 1920, a property settlement was effected between the parties, through appellant's attorney, whereby appellant was given certain household furniture and $200 in cash, in consideration for which appellant waived any and all further claim against the respondent, or his property, or his estate, including future alimony, maintenance, and counsel fees.

It is further stated in said counter affidavit that subsequent to said property settlement the appellant, without respondent's knowledge, purchased on credit certain furniture from a furniture company in San Francisco, upon the representation that she was a married woman and was then living with her husband; that before said furniture was paid for appellant sold it to other parties, which resulted in her being arrested at the instance of said furniture company, and the bringing of an action by said furniture company against the respondent and the appellant for the recovery of the value of the furniture, which action was, at the time of the hearing of these motions, pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco.

At the expiration of one year from the date on which the court in the other action found that respondent had been abandoned by appellant, respondent filed this action for divorce.

[1, 2] The state of the record before us demonstrates two things: First, that the grounds stated in appellant's affidavit are clearly insufficient as a matter of law to justify the granting of any relief under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, secondly, that from the facts stated in both affidavits it was a matter resting entirely with the trial court to say which of the parties should be believed.

[3] It has been repeatedly held that the granting or denial of a motion to set aside a default is largely a matter of discretion to be exercised by the trial court, and that its action either in granting or refusing the application will only be reversed where a clear abuse of discretion is shown. Morton v.

Shannon, 26 Cal. App. 689, 147 Pac. 1179; Kearney v. Palmer, 18 Cal. App. 517, 123 Pac. 611; Garner v. Erlanger, 86 Cal. 60, 24 Pac. 805; Williamson v. Cummings, 95 Cal. 652, 30 Pac. 762; Cass v. Hutton, 155 Cal. 103, 99 Pac. 493; Ingram v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 Pac. 165.

In view of the facts shown by the record here, it is obvious that the court did not abuse its discretion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BORLAND v. BORLAND et al. (Civ. 4102.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California, Feb. 25, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 24, 1922.)

1. Justices of the peace §130—Res judicata when same defense set up in action for subsequent installments under same contract.

A judgment, in an action brought in justice court and tried de novo in the superior court against one guaranteeing the payment of alimony for installments then due, was res judicata, when the same defenses of want of consideration and invalidity were set up in a subsequent action for installments subsequently accruing.

2. Justices of the peace §130—Defense that contract contrary to public policy, etc., held sufficiently set up to be res judicata.

In an action commenced in justice court on a guaranty of payment of alimony, an answer alleging that the agreement was invalid, though not setting up the facts constituting the invalidity, was sufficient to make the question res judicata in a subsequent action in which defendant pleaded that the agreement was part and parcel of a collusive agreement for a divorce, and as such contrary to public policy, etc.

3. Justices of the peace §130—Failure to offer proof in support of defense pleaded does not affect conclusiveness.

Where defendant, sued in justice's court on her guaranty of payment of alimony, pleaded the invalidity of the contract, a judgment rendered against her was conclusive, though she failed to make proof of all the facts bearing on the question of invalidity.

4. Estoppel §78(2) — Recitals in contract cannot be contradicted as between parties.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2, recitals of a guaranty of payment of alimony regarding the divorce proceedings, the filing of the decree, etc., could not be contradicted as between the parties.

5. Costs §80—Properly granted to defendant in cross-action against whom there was no cause of action.

Where a guarantor, sued on her guaranty, made her principal a party by cross-complaint to enable the court to pass on her claimed right to a cancellation of the contract, but asked no relief against him and there was no cause of action against him, judgment in his favor against defendant for costs was proper.

6. Justices of the peace §130—Conclusive between parties though another party joined in subsequent suit.

A judgment against defendant in an action in a justice's court on her guaranty of payment of alimony was res judicata as between the parties in a subsequent suit for installments subsequently accruing, though defendant's principal was made a party to the subsequent suit by cross-complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Flora Borland against E. A. Borland, in which John H. Borland was made a party by cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Morrissey, P. L. Keller, and Chas. H. Brennan, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter Christie, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against her for $450 upon a contract by which, for a valuable consideration, she guaranteed the payment of $50 a month alimony to plaintiff, which sum, said contract recited, had been allowed to plaintiff by a decree of divorce duly entered in her favor dissolving the marriage between her and John H. Borland, the son of the present defendant.

In the present action the defendant filed an answer admitting the execution of the contract set out in the complaint and the fact that $450 past due thereunder had not been paid by her son nor by herself as the guarantor, but alleged that said agreement was invalid and void for several reasons, to wit: That no consideration for the same had actually been paid, despite the recital therein contained; that it was part and parcel of a collusive agreement for divorce, and as such was contrary to public policy; that the recital therein contained to the effect that the decree in the divorce action had previously been entered was false, the fact being that the contract of guaranty was, in reality, entered into before the actual signing and filing of the decree which it recites, and similar matters. A cross-complaint was also filed, containing substantially the same allegations and asking that said contract of guaranty be declared null and void and be surrendered for cancellation. Plaintiff's answer to this cross-complaint denied all these allegations and alleged that these matters were res adjudicata as between plaintiff and defendant because in a prior action in the justice's court plaintiff had recovered judgment against this defendant for the sum of $150, the amount then due under the contract of guaranty involved here, and that all matters of defense against said contract herein set up were decided adversely to said defendant in that action; that, later, upon an appeal from said judgment of the justice's court, a trial de novo was had in the superior court, in which action the same issues were determined adversely to defendant. The court found these allegations of the answer to the cross-complaint to be true, and its finding is based upon the judgment roll in the action in the justice's court and in the action in the superior court, which was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff herein.

[1] The trial court, in harmony with its conclusion that such matters were res adjudicata between the parties, refused to receive evidence offered by the defendant in support of these allegations of her cross-complaint. The one question presented on this appeal is as to whether or not these matters were conclusively settled as between these parties by the prior judgments upon this same contract. We are of the opinion that they were. We find that the case of Koehler v. Holt Mfg. Co., 146 Cal. 335, 80 Pac. 73, is peculiarly in point. In that case, as in the present one, a suit had been brought to recover certain installments due under a contract between the parties. The defense was that there had been a valid revocation of the same on the part of the defendant. This matter was decided in favor of defendant in the justices' court and, upon appeal, by the superior court. Later, suit was brought for other installments then due. The trial court held that the former judgments were a bar and our Supreme Court affirmed the judgment, saying:

"We are of the opinion that the plaintiff is estopped by the former judgment. It is true it was not rendered in a suit to recover the same installments that are involved in this action, and, consequently, it is not technically a bar to the present action. But it appears by the record in the former action that it was a suit to recover the amounts due under the terms of the same accepted order for the four months previous to the time here involved; that in defense the defendant relied upon the same revocation of January 25, 1902, upon which he relies in the case at bar; that the validity and effect of that revocation was litigated and submitted to the court in that action, and that the court decided that it was valid; that its effect was to abrogate and annul the defendant's acceptance of the order and put an end to its liability thereon, and rendered judgment accordingly. The case comes clearly within the principle that a judgment operates as an estoppel to preclude the parties and privies from contending to the contrary of that point or matter of fact, which, having been once distinctly put in issue by them, has been, on such issue joined, solemnly found against them."

[2] Appellant contends that the answer of the defendant in the former action did not put in issue the matters of fact sought to be litigated in the present action. It is true, of course, that the pleadings in the justice's court were more informal and less carefully drawn than the pleadings in the present action. But in the former action defendant alleged that the agreement sued upon had been entered into by her without any consideration or without any valid consideration, and also alleged that said agreement was "invalid." True, the facts constituting the invalidity were not set up, but in the justice's court defendant would have been permitted to show such facts as she alleges in the present case, in support of her contention that the agreement was invalid. The difference in form between the pleadings in the two actions is not material, and upon this question the case of Koehler v. Holt Mfg. Co., supra, is again directly in point, for it is therein said:

"The objection that the validity of the revocation was not put in issue in the former suit is not tenable. There was, it is true, no formal answer setting up the revocation such as might be considered necessary in a suit begun in the superior court. But the pleadings in justices' courts are not required to be in any particular form, and when the case comes before the superior court on appeal their effect and sufficiency are to be judged by the same standards as when it is before the justice of the peace. In construing them, when they come under consideration collaterally as in the present case, the rule excluding conclusions of law as no proper part of a pleading does not apply."

[3] If defendant failed in the first action to offer proof as to each and every one of her contentions regarding the invalidity of this contract, the judgment therein rendered against her, upon the question of its invalidity, is, nevertheless, conclusive. In the case of Matter of Viola Frazier (Cal. App.) 194 Pac. 510 the court said:

"The principle of res adjudicata applied as well to matters which might have been proven as to those actually offered in evidence. Were this not the law, the doctrine would not be efficacious, for a party could withhold evidence in one case and defeat the plea of res adjudicata by introducing it at a later trial of the same issues. The fact of the divorce existed, and was known at the time of the former hearing, and petitioner cannot now take advantage of her failure to produce the evidence."

So in the present case. The defendant set up the alleged invalidity of the contract as a defense in the justice's court. She knew at that time all the facts in relation to the alleged invalidity. If she failed to make proof of all the facts bearing upon that matter, that failure will not warrant a reopening of the question from time to time to permit her to introduce her evidence piecemeal. The fact of the validity of the contract involved here was a question which the court was compelled to determine before it could pronounce judgment in the prior actions between these parties. It was a fact directly in issue and the prior determination is conclusive as between the plaintiff and defendant. Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 514, 521; Rucker v. Langford, 138 Cal. 611, 613, 71 Pac. 1123; Southern Pacific Co. v. Edmunds, 168 Cal. 415, 418, 143 Pac. 597; Estate of Bell, 153 Cal. 331, 339, 95 Pac. 372; Suisun Lumber Co. v. Fairfield School District, 19 Cal. App. 587, 596, 597, 127 Pac. 349; Williams v. Hawkins, 34 Cal. App. 146, 149, 166 Pac. 869; Jones, Commentaries on Evidence, vol. 3, p. 855.

Our conclusion that the validity of the contract between these parties was conclusively settled as between them in the former action disposes of the only real question on this appeal, for it follows that the trial court properly refused to hear evidence offered by defendant bearing upon the alleged invalidity of the contract.

[4] Furthermore, although it is unnecessary for the determination of this appeal, we might add that the offer of proof by defendant was also open to the objection that it was inadmissible under the provisions of section 1962, subd. 2, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that recitals contained in a written instrument (except recitals of consideration) are conclusively presumed to be true as between the parties. Here defendant was endeavoring to contradict the recitals of this contract regarding the divorce proceedings, the filing of the decrees therein, etc. It is settled in this state that this cannot be done. Moore v. Earl, 91 Cal. 632, 635, 27 Pac. 1087; Elizalde v. Murphy, 163 Cal. 681, 687, 126 Pac. 978.

[5, 6] The only other point which it is necessary to mention is the contention of appellant based upon the fact that upon her motion John H. Borland was made a party to the action. This motion was made, according to appellant, upon the theory that it was necessary to have said John Borland before the court to enable it to pass upon defendant's right to a cancellation of the contract between herself and the plaintiff. John Borland was the former husband of the plaintiff, and it was his payments of alimony which were guaranteed by his mother, the defendant. He entered his appearance, after the motion of the defendant that he be brought into the action as a party defendant had been granted, and then failed to answer the cross-complaint. As there was no cause of action against him and as no relief of any kind was asked against him, the court, necessarily, gave judgment in his favor against the defendant for his costs. This was proper, because the defendant in no way made out any case against him. She seeks to gain an advantage, however, by the fact of his entrance into the case, by contending that, as he was a party to this action and was not a party to the former action before the justices' court and the superior court, the parties to the actions are different and the rule of res adjudicata does not apply. This contention is without merit. We do not see that John H. Borland was a necessary party to this action; but, if he were, his joinder does not change the rule with reference to the plaintiff and defendant; the reason of the rule remains the same. Of course, the question of the validity of this contract was not res adjudicata as to John H. Borland, but he did not contend in the present case that it was invalid and presented no pleadings or proof upon any matter. But the plaintiff and defendant E. A. Borland are the same parties who have litigated before the question of the validity of this contract, and that question is settled conclusively between them.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: STURTEVANT, J.; NOURSE, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. We withhold approval from the statement in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal to the effect that proof that the contract sought to be enforced by the plaintiff was part and parcel of a collusive agreement for divorce, and as such contrary to public policy, was inadmissible to show the invalidity of the contract sued on, because it contradicted the recitals of the contract. We are not prepared to say that, where the question is whether or not a contract is contrary to public policy, proof of facts contradictory to its recitals may not be given to impeach it, if they show the illegal intent and purpose of the contract, and we prefer to leave the question open.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

SCHOOLEY v. FRESNO TRACTION CO.
(Civ. 4099.)

1. Street railroads ⇨114(14)—Evidence held to show pedestrian's negligence in stepping on track.

In an action for death of a pedestrian, evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff which showed that decedent was struck before he reached the middle of the street car track, and probably just as he stepped over the first rail, held to show that he stepped onto the track immediately in front of the approaching car when it was too late for the motorman to stop.

2. Street railroads ⇨101—Gross negligence in stepping on track bars recovery.

The gross negligence on the part of a pedestrian in stepping onto a street car track immediately in front of an approaching car is gross negligence contributing to his injury which bars recovery for his death.

3. Street railroads ⇨98(6)—Pedestrian not on regular crossing must exercise more care.

A pedestrian undertaking to cross street car tracks by a diagonal route at a place other than a regular crossing must exercise greater care than if he were attempting to cross directly over the street upon a regular sidewalk crossing.

4. Street railroads ⇨98(6)—Pedestrian on crowded thoroughfare must exercise more care.

The fact that the place of crossing is on a busy thoroughfare in the business district of a city requires a pedestrian attempting to cross a street car track to exercise especial care.

5. Negligence ⇨80—Contributory negligence affirmatively appearing bars recovery.

Where it affirmatively appears from plaintiff's own evidence that want of due care on the part of deceased was the proximate cause of his injury, plaintiff cannot recover, and it was error to refuse instructions requested by defendant to that effect.

6. Negligence ⇨65—Contributory negligence determined without regard to defendant's negligence.

The question of contributory negligence must be determined without regard to any negligence on the part of defendant.

7. Street railroads ⇨93(2)—Speed within legal limit held not unreasonable.

Even though a speed within the legal limit may not be reasonable under all the circumstances, the fact that a street car struck a pedestrian who suddenly stepped on the track immediately in front of it does not establish that the speed was unreasonable.

8. Street railroads ⇨114(7)—Evidence held not to show negligent outlook or stop.

Where there was no direct evidence that the motorman failed to keep an outlook or failed to use the brakes promptly to stop the car, negligence in those respects is not established by the striking of a pedestrian who stepped onto the street car track immediately in front of the approaching car.

9. Street railroads ⇨102(1)—Ineffective fenders held not proximate cause of death of negligent pedestrian.

Where a pedestrian was contributorily negligent in stepping upon the track immediately in front of approaching car, the negligence, if any, of the street car company in failing to equip the car with effective fenders was not the proximate cause of the pedestrian's death and it was error to instruct the jury that, even if deceased was negligent, defendant was liable if they further found that, if the car at that time had been equipped with a suitable fender, deceased would not have been killed.

10. Street railroads ⇨103(2)—Doctrine of "last clear chance" held inapplicable.

The doctrine of "last clear chance" only applies where the defendant or its servant was actually aware of the danger of the injured person in time to have avoided the accident and is not applicable where pedestrian stepped upon a street car track immediately in front of an approaching car.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Erie G. Schooley, as administratrix of the estate of C. P. Schooley, deceased, against the Fresno Traction Company, to recover damages for death of plaintiff's intestate. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and T. M. Stuart, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Harris & Hayhurst and Henry Hawson, all of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it for $30,000. The plaintiff is the administratrix of the estate of C. P. Schooley, deceased, and sues to recover for the death of her intestate caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant in the operation of its street railway.

The complaint charged that deceased was run over and killed by one of defendant's street cars at a point near the westerly intersection of M and Tulare streets, in the city of Fresno, and alleged that his death was caused by defendant's negligence. The alleged negligent acts were specified in six different subparagraphs, substantially as follows: (1) Excessive rate of speed of the street car. (2) Motorman failed to keep a lookout, and hence failed to discover the deceased upon the track in time to avoid running over him, and failed to use proper care in stopping the car after discovering deceased's peril. (3) The brakes and other safety appliances upon the car used for stopping same were worn and defective. (4) Car was equipped with an old, defective, out-of-date, insufficient and inadequate front fender, on account whereof the deceased was not protected, but instead was run over by the wheels of the car. (5) Car was not equipped with an automatic fender such as was in general use, by reason whereof the deceased was run over by the front wheels of the car. (6) Car was not equipped with up-to-date automatic air brakes such as ordinarily used, on account whereof the motor-man was unable to stop the car.

The defendant denied each specification of negligence, and alleged that the collision and resulting death of the deceased were brought about by his own contributory negligence.

The place of the collision is in the business district of the city of Fresno, and the point where Schooley was attempting to walk across the track was not upon a regular crossing, nor at a place provided for or used by pedestrians in crossing the street car tracks. Tulare street is one of the principal business streets of Fresno, running generally east and west. It is crossed at right angles by K street, L street, and M street, in the order named, from west to east. The deceased resided on the easterly side of M street, and at the time of the collision was on an errand from his home to a grocery store located on the southerly side of Tulare street near the center of the block between L and M streets, and was pursuing a diagonal shortcut in a southwesterly direction from his home to the store.

The defendant operates two street car tracks on Tulare street, east-bound cars running over the southerly track or "toward the Santa Fé depot" and west-bound cars over the northerly track or "toward the Southern Pacific depot." The deceased, while attempting to cross Tulare street in a diagonal direction at some point between the crossing on M street and an alley between L and M streets, was struck in the back, a little to the left side, by a west-bound car which came from his rear. At the time he was struck he was upon the first track that he attempted to cross. The evidence is that he was struck by this car immediately after he stepped upon the track. True, one witness stated that deceased was approximately in the middle of this first track; the others stated that he was just over the first rail; but this variance is of slight importance, because, the approximate width of a street car track being a matter of common knowledge, it is plain that, whether deceased was in about the middle of the track or just over the edge of the first rail when he was struck, he must have stepped over the first rail he reached immediately in front of the approaching street car. In other words, he stepped from a place of safety into imminent danger. Traffic was heavy on the street at the time and place of the collision. The deceased was a man of the age of 44 years, and had been employed as a boiler maker for 20 years. The plaintiff, who was his wife, testified, upon being examined as to his hearing, that it was better than the average boiler maker's. He had, however, sustained an injury to his left eye. This was caused by particles of steel getting into his eye in the course of his work, which had seriously impaired the sight of this eye. This eye was the one nearest the street car which struck him. As deceased stepped over the rail, his head and face were away from the car, and the car struck him in the back, slightly to the left side. These facts are agreed upon by all the witnesses who testified regarding them.

We shall now discuss in some detail the proof made by plaintiff in support of her action. The witness Longuevan testified:

That he was riding on "the front platform of the east-bound car, and noticed the car coming from the east, going west, with a man walking diagonally toward the street car track—that is, the track on which the west-bound car was running. After taking, I should judge, 6 or 8 steps, possibly more and may have been a few less, he got approximately in the middle of the car track, and was struck in the back by the street car, knocking him forward on his face, and apparently rolled him up like a ball, until he got underneath the front fender, and it appeared to me that he had also gotten partly under the wheel guard. * * * In the meantime, the car had been brought to a halt and likewise our car had been brought to a halt and I got off."

In response to further questions, this witness testified that he judged the car which struck deceased was going about 15 miles an hour; that he thought the car ran between 20 and 30 feet after striking deceased; that, when witness first saw deceased, deceased was from 6 to 8 feet from the track on which he was struck, and was walking diagonally; that he saw him go under the front fender, and apparently he went under the wheel guard, but as to this latter fact the witness was clearly unable to give any satisfactory information, as he did not go near the scene of the accident after the car stopped, but left the car on which he was riding and went home, not desiring to see more of this ghastly occurrence. This witness admitted that he had stated at the coroner's inquest, on the day after the accident, that he was unable to judge the speed at which the car was going, and on cross-examination, he admitted that deceased had just gotten over the first rail when he was struck.

The next witness was J. P. Langston, who testified that his business was "air brakeman and safety appliance," and that he was employed by the Santa Fé. His testimony was confined entirely to measurements regarding the fenders on the car and descriptions of these appliances which we shall not consider here, for the reasons which will later appear.

Frank Digioia was next produced on behalf of plaintiff. He was the conductor on the car which struck Schooley. He stated the car was going at about six or seven miles an hour; that the car came to a sudden stop; that he got off the car and found Mr. Schooley lying flat on his back; that he was in between the slat fender and the pilot board. It might be stated here that the car was equipped with two safety appliances or fenders, one a so-called "slat apron" in front, and wheel guards to prevent bodies from being mangled by the wheels of the car. A detailed description of these appliances is unnecessary here under our view of the law governing this case. This last witness stated that the body had gotten under the slat apron, but had not passed the wheel guard.

The witness Peterson testified that he was on the front platform of the car which struck Schooley; that he saw the man when he was just stepping on the car tracks; that the car was going about 12 or 15 miles an hour; that the man was crossing the track diagonally and was struck in the side; that he was walking at an ordinary gait. This witness did state that when he saw deceased after the accident the body was partly under the car, but he admitted that at the coroner's inquest, the day after the accident, he had testified that the body was not under the car. It also appears that immediately after the accident this witness made a statement in his own handwriting to the defendant company. He admitted on the stand that in that statement he had written that the accident was due to the "carelessness of the victim" and that the deceased was entirely at fault.

The physician who examined the body of deceased at the coroner's office testified for plaintiff, and stated that he had found "lacerations on the face, a broken jaw and several ribs broken; that his chest was crushed in and the jugular vein in the neck punctured by one of the ribs. That the punctured jugular vein caused deceased to bleed to death." The balance of the testimony for plaintiff was that of expert witnesses, and had to do solely with the different kinds of fenders in use upon street cars. The substance of this testimony was that "Eclipse" and "Worcester" fenders are projecting fenders, and are the ones in common use in Los Angeles and San Francisco. These were described in detail, and photographs introduced. Upon cross-examination it was admitted that wheel guard fenders, which was the type used upon the cars of the defendant, were in use to some extent in Venice, Pomona, Long Beach, San Bernardino, Santa Monica, Riverside, Redlands, Pasadena, San Francisco, and other places.

[1] The foregoing is the substance of the testimony offered on behalf of plaintiff. That testimony shows beyond question that the deceased was negligent in stepping upon the tracks of the defendant company, directly in front of an on-coming car, which was plainly in view at the time he stepped upon the track if deceased had chosen to glance in its direction. We think that the negligence of deceased is not only overwhelmingly established by a perusal of the entire record, but it is sufficiently established upon an examination of plaintiff's own evidence. Taking the highest estimate of the speed of the car—15 miles an hour—it is plain that, even if deceased was not struck until about the time he reached the middle of the track (although the testimony strongly leads to the conclusion that he was struck immediately upon stepping over the first rail), he must have stepped over the rail into a place of danger when the car was practically upon him, and at a time when it was too late for the motor-man to have stopped the car or for any appliance to have saved a dangerous collision. Surely, under the language of the cases hereafter cited, and under any rational system of law, defendant could not be charged with a duty to anticipate that any one would suddenly step from a place of safety onto the car tracks in the middle of a block, directly in front of an approaching street car.

[2] We think such gross negligence on the part of a pedestrian will bar all right of recovery for any injuries which he may sustain. It is said in 25 R. C. L. 1285:

"However, where a foot passenger walks or steps directly in front of an approaching car and is struck the instant he sets his foot between the rails there is but one inference that can reasonably be drawn from that fact; that is, the inference of contributory negligence."

Cited in support of this doctrine, among other cases, is the case of Driscoll v. Cable Railway Co., 97 Cal. 553, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203. In that case it was said:

"While, therefore, the owners of these railroads [street railroads] are to be held to due care in the management of their lines, they, when exercising such care, are not responsible in damages to a person who, in a careless, or reckless, or absentminded way, walks suddenly in front of a moving car, and is injured before there is time to stop it. The person in charge of a car, with a clear track before him, has a right to assume that people will not suddenly undertake to cross in front of it; otherwise he could not make any headway, and no street car line could be successfully operated, either for the profit of the owner or the convenience of the public. And the general rule is, that where the negligence of the injured party is a contributing proximate cause of the accident, he cannot recover damages."

In the Driscoll Case it is pointed out that the question of whether or not the negligence of the pedestrian did contribute to his injury is generally one upon which there is conflicting evidence, which makes it difficult for a railroad company which was itself guilty of negligence at the time of the accident to relieve itself from an unfavorable verdict. We recognize this rule, and so we have discussed herein only the plaintiff's evidence upon this question of deceased's negligence. Quite apart from the testimony offered by defendant, some of it from disinterested witnesses, we think it must appear without conflict, from plaintiff's own evidence that her intestate was negligent, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of his death. Under such circumstances there can be no recovery. Section 1714, Civ. Code; Flemming v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 49 Cal. 253; Studer v. Southern Pac. Co., 121 Cal. 400, 53 Pac. 942, 66 Am. St. Rep. 39; Nagle v. Cal. S. R. R. Co., 88 Cal. 86, 25 Pac. 1106; Rudd v. Eyrnes, 156 Cal. 640, 105 Pac. 957, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 134, 20 Ann. Cas. 124; Esrey v. So. Pac. Co., 88 Cal. 399, 26 Pac. 211.

In the case of Lee v. Market Street Railway Co., 135 Cal. 293, 67 Pac. 765, it is said:

"That a man under these circumstances should thus heedlessly cross a public street in the middle of the block and know nothing of the approach of a street car until the moment when it struck him is a demonstration of carelessness and negligence so complete as to require no comment."

[3] It is also well settled in this state that a pedestrian undertaking to cross street car tracks by a diagonal route at a place other than regular crossing must exercise greater care than if he were attempting to cross directly over the street upon a regular sidewalk crossing. Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 166 Pac. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493; Scott v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677; Moss v. Boynton Co. (Cal. App.) 186 Pac. 631, 632.

[4] The fact that the place of crossing was on a busy thoroughfare in the heart of a business district required plaintiff's intestate to exercise especial care. Davis v. Breuner Co., 167 Cal. 683, 140 Pac. 586. Giving to plaintiff's evidence and to the undisputed facts all the value to which they are legally entitled, the inevitable conclusion must be that the deceased did not exercise ordinary care in crossing at a place and under conditions which required of him a greater degree of care than would have been required had he crossed at a regular crossing in a section of the city less subject to travel.

[5, 6] In an action for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, it is incumbent upon plaintiff to make out a prima facie case in his own favor showing that the damages claimed resulted from the defendant's negligence, and, where it affirmatively appears from his own evidence that deceased's want of due prudence was the proximate cause of the injury, plaintiff cannot recover. Dufour v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 67 Cal. 319, 7 Pac. 769. The question of contributory negligence must be determined without regard to any negligence on the part of the defendant. Moss v. Boynton (Cal. App.) 186 Pac. 631, and cases cited therein.

Under these facts, the refusal of the trial court to give, upon the request of the defendant, two instructions stating that the deceased was negligent as a matter of law, and could not recover, was prejudicial error.

[7] Under our view with reference to the negligence of deceased, the question of defendant's negligence becomes immaterial, because the law of comparative negligence which obtains in some states is not recognized by the courts of this state. Sego v. Southern Pac., 137 Cal. 405, 70 Pac. 279; Straten v. Spencer (Cal. App.) 197 Pac. 540. But, in justice to the defendant, it may not be amiss to say that we do not think the record establishes any of the allegations of the complaint respecting negligence on its part. Let us revert for a moment to such allegations. With reference to the speed of the car, it is admitted that the speed limit allowed by law for street cars at the place in question was 16 miles an hour. Defendant was well within this limit, according to even the highest estimate placed by plaintiff's witnesses upon the speed of its car. True, as stated by respondent, this legal limit may not be a measure of what was a reasonable speed under all the circumstances. But there is nothing to indicate that the speed at which the car was traveling was not a reasonable rate of speed under the conditions then existing. Its unreasonableness is not established, as contended by respondent, by the fact that the car struck a man stepping suddenly directly in its path. And, if this were not true, the matter would then fall within the rule announced in the case of Davis v. Breuner Co., 167 Cal. 683, 140 Pac. 586, which held that, where the negligence of the plaintiff in not looking both ways before starting to cross a street in a busy thoroughfare in the business district of a city is established, it will bar his recovery notwithstanding the defendant was driving an automobile at a speed in excess of the speed allowed by ordinance. A fortiori, there can be no recovery in the present case where the street car was being operated at a legal rate of speed.

[8] There is no proof that the motorman failed to keep an outlook or that he failed to use proper care in stopping the car after discovering deceased's peril. Indeed, it is plain that, if the deceased stepped over the rail, and was almost instantly struck, as appears in the present case, then no outlook which the motorman could possibly have kept would have enabled him to stop the car in time to avoid the accident. Deceased was not in a position of peril until he stepped upon the rail, and he could not have taken more than a step or two, going at an ordinary gait, before he was struck. Until almost the moment he was struck, then no outlook would have disclosed him in a position of danger, for he was not in such a position. This negatives any possibility that any failure to keep an outlook, if such there was (and on that matter the evidence is to the contrary), could have contributed to the accident. There is not the slightest evidence that the motorman failed to use proper care in stopping the car after discovering deceased's peril, or that the brakes or other appliances for stopping the car were worn and defective. There is no evidence that the car could have been stopped in a shorter distance, nor that any other car otherwise equipped could have been stopped more quickly. Furthermore, there is no proof that the deceased was run over by the wheels of the car. The nearest approach to such proof is in the testimony of a witness who at the time of the accident was on a car going in the other direction, who stated that it appeared to him from a distance of about 75 feet that the deceased had gotten under the car; but this witness admitted that he did not go nearer to the scene of the accident after the car stopped, but hurried away so as not to see the injured man. His testimony, then, as to what his impression was at that distance is without weight in view of the evidence of several eyewitnesses who saw the position of the body when the car stopped, and who testified that the body was not under the wheels nor under the car. It is apparent, then, that the only possible theory for the judgment is that the jury believed the fenders upon the car were improperly constructed, and that this condition was the proximate cause of the injury.

[9] Now, if by any course of reasoning, in the light of defendant's evidence on this subject, the jury had been justified in concluding that the fenders and safety appliances on defendant's car were not reasonably well suited for the purpose for which they were intended, nevertheless we think it cannot be successfully contended, under the facts of this case, that this matter was the proximate cause of the injury and death, for it conclusively appears from all the evidence that the negligence of deceased was the proximate cause of his death. Craven v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 72 Cal. 345, 13 Pac. 878. If a person, while crossing the track of a railroad on a public highway, is injured by a passing train, his negligence, if it contributed at all to the injuries, contributed directly and proximately. Hearne v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 50 Cal. 482.

Under such a state of facts, we are unconcerned with the contradictory opinions of numerous witnesses produced by both sides as to the relative merits of different types of fenders or safety appliances. It is admitted that the defendant was under no duty statutory or under the common law, to equip its cars with any particular kind of fenders. But we may go a step further, and point out that even if defendant had been violating a statute by the use of the fenders attached to this car, the presumption of negligence raised by such unlawful conduct would only furnish ground for a recovery where it was the proximate cause of the injury. McKune v. Santa Clara V. M. & L. Co., 110 Cal. 480, 486, 42 Pac. 980; Fenn v. Clark, 11 Cal. App. 79, 81, 103 Pac. 944. We apprehend it would not be contended that, if a pedestrian, with murderous intent, pushed another directly in front of a moving car, the injured person could recover regardless of the fact that the car was unequipped with any safety devices, in direct violation of a statute, or that if one, with suicidal intent, hurled himself in front of a moving car, his representatives could recover regardless of the type of fender the car carried, and the question of the violation by defendant of an ordinance regulating fenders would not change the rule of law. The present case furnishes but a difference in degree, and not in kind.

Because of the conclusions we have reached regarding the matters herein discussed, it is unnecessary for us to discuss all of appellant's specifications of error. We shall mention merely an error in an instruction, which, together with the other matters herein discussed, compels a reversal of the judgment. The jury was instructed:

"That if they find from the evidence in this case that the deceased at the time of the accident and at the time he met his death was guilty of negligence in going upon the track of the street car, but should they further find that said car at the time was not provided with a suitable fender or appliance placed in front or attached to the trucks of such car or dummy for the purpose of removing and clearing obstructions from the track and preventing any obstacles, obstructions or persons on the track from getting under such dummy or car, and removing the same out of danger or out of the way of such dummy or car, and that it was negligence on the part of the company to so operate said car without such suitable fender or appliance; and if they further find that, if said car had at said time been provided with such suitable fender or appliance, the deceased, notwithstanding his negligence, if any, in getting upon said track, would not have been killed, then the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for the damage occasioned by his death, and it is the duty of the jury to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff."

The foregoing instruction is in conflict with the cases hereinbefore cited, and is also in direct conflict with the case of Waterman v. Visalia Electric R. R. Co., 23 Cal. App. 350, 357, 137 Pac. 1096, 1099, where it is said:

"They would then apply said instruction to that contingency and necessarily reach the conclusion that though the child's mother was guilty of negligence that contributed directly to the injury, yet, since defendant, if it had furnished suitable brakes, might have avoided the accident, plaintiff was entitled to recover. This would be, of course, to set at naught and completely nullify the doctrine of contributory negligence. It would be in effect that the prior negligence of defendant, if contributing to the accident, would render defendant liable notwithstanding the succeeding negligence of plaintiff which contributed directly and proximately to the injury. In other words, contributory negligence would be entirely eliminated from the case."

[10] There is no theory of the instant case under which the above-quoted instruction would have been proper. Appellant suggests that it was given under the doctrine of "last clear chance," but, as pointed out by appellant and admitted by respondent, that doctrine has no application here, because, as clearly stated in the case of Waterman v. Valsalia Co., supra, 23 Cal. App. at page 356, 137 Pac. at page 1096, that doctrine could only apply where the defendant or its servant was actually aware of the danger of the injured person in time to have avoided the accident and, as demonstrated by the evidence in the present case, deceased was not in a position of danger until he stepped upon the track, which was just an instant before he was struck, and the defendant was afforded no opportunity by the exercise of the greatest possible diligence to avoid the accident. This instruction was therefore erroneous, and greatly prejudicial to defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

MILLS v. RICHMOND CO., Inc. (Civ. 4129.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California, March 9, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 8, 1922.)

1. Deeds ¶94—Evidence ¶441(8)—Collateral matters in sale contract, such as grading streets, placing curbs, etc., are not merged in deed.

A deed made in execution of a contract for the sale of land merges the provisions thereof as to the quantity or identity of the land, but collateral matters, such as grading streets, placing sidewalks and curbs, etc., may be inquired into.

2. Cancellation of Instruments ¶37(1) — Plaintiff need not plead materiality of defendant's payment of costs of grading, etc., as part of consideration for sale.

In a suit to rescind a contract of sale for grantor's failure to grade the street and place sidewalks and curbs in front of the lot sold as agreed, plaintiff need not plead facts showing that the cost thereof was a material element of the consideration.

3. Vendor and purchaser ¶110 — Seller's agreement to grade street, etc., held not an independent covenant, breach of which would not be ground for rescission.

A clause in a contract of sale whereby the seller agreed to grade the street and place sidewalks and curbs in front of the lot sold held not an independent covenant, a breach of which would not be ground for rescission, in the absence of express language to such effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Mrs. L. Mills against The Richmond Company, Incorporated. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Forrest A. Cobb, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a rescission of a contract to purchase two lots in the town of Richmond, Contra Costa county, Cal. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint, and, she declining to amend, judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

In her amended complaint the plaintiff sets forth that on the 1st day of February, 1913, she agreed to buy of the defendant's assignor two lots at $500 each, and to pay thereon $10 down and $10 per month until the full purchase price had been paid, and that in consideration therefor the said Herbert F. Brown agreed that he would, when all payments had been made, execute and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed to said premises, and also that "the seller agrees to grade the street and place concrete sidewalks and redwood curbs in front of the within mentioned lot"; that the said Herbert F. Brown transferred said contract to the defendant, which accepted the same, and agreed to fulfill all of its terms. The plaintiff made all payments, and the defendant did, on the 19th day of December, 1919, make and deliver to plaintiff its deed.

It is further averred that, when said contract was made, February 1, 1913, the plaintiff was a widow of 80 years of age, living on a farm near Kelseyville, Lake county, Cal., and that plaintiff has been unable to leave Lake county since the year 1915 because of her extreme old age and the condition of her health, and that she has never seen said lots; that on the 1st day of March, 1921, the plaintiff received the information that the defendant had never done the grading and other improvements above referred to; that plaintiff relied on defendant's agreement and would not have purchased the lots except by reason of each and all of the re-itals in her contract. The plaintiff pleads in appropriate averments a notice of rescission, an offer to reconvey, and a demand for the return of her money.

[1] The demurrer which was interposed and sustained pleaded, among other things, that the amended complaint did not state facts sufficient. In support of its demurrer the defendant makes two points. It contends that a deed made in execution of a contract for the sale of land merges the provisions of the contract therein. As to the quantity of land described or the identical body of land to be conveyed, it may be conceded that respondent's point is good. Riley v. North Star Mining Co., 152 Cal. 549, 556, 93 Pac. 194. But there is no such dispute involved in this case. As to the matter of a clear title, the payment of taxes, the grading of streets, the placing of sidewalks, and curbs, one would not expect to see anything on those subjects in a deed. If such matters existed between the parties they were collateral to the deed and may be inquired into. Blahnik v. Small Farms Improvement Co., 181 Cal. 379, 383, 184 Pac. 661.

[2] The respondent's second point is that, even if appellant had not accepted performance, she has not pleaded facts sufficient to entitle her to rescind; that the facts pleaded, at most, entitle her only to damages for breach of a contract. In making this point the respondent argues that it is not as to every contract concerning the sale and purchase of a lot that the cost of the grading, sidewalks, and curbs constitute a material element of the consideration, and that one who would rescind must plead facts showing that such an element is material. There are two answers to that argument. No one, we take it, would have the temerity to claim, as a matter of law, that the cost of the street work fronting a city lot could be treated as de minimis. Again, so far as the item may be said to be trivial, the question seems to be settled in California against the contention of the respondent. Walker v. Harbor Business Blocks Co., 181 Cal. 773, 186 Pac. 356. If, as argued by the respondent, the construction of the improvements in question was a matter of no great cost, the fact may be developed at the time of the trial (Fountain v. Semi-Tropic L. & W. Co., 99 Cal. 677, 34 Pac. 497), but no duty rested upon the plaintiff to add any additional allegations than those contained in her pleadings.

[3] We understand the respondent to contend that the clause, "The seller agrees to grade the street and place concrete sidewalks and redwood curbs in front of the within mentioned lot," is an independent covenant, and therefore that a breach thereof is not a ground for rescission. This is a strained interpretation of the contract. There is no express language showing it to be an independent covenant. In Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 7, 16, the court said:

"No time was stipulated for the performance of these acts, nor is there any provision from which it can be inferred that one was to precede the other. In such cases the law implies that they are to be performed concurrently. In the Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Pet. 455, it is said that 'in contracts of this description the undertakings of the respective parties are always considered dependent unless a contrary intention clearly appears. A different construction would, in many cases, lead to the greatest injustice, and a purchaser might have payment of the purchase money enforced upon him and yet be disabled from procuring the property for which he paid it.'"

For the foregoing reasons we think the demurrer should have been overruled, and that the trial court erred in sustaining the same.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. APPLE. (Cr. 605.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 18, 1922.)

1. Criminal law — 1069(6)—Time of taking appeal is jurisdictional.

The limit of time fixed by the Code within which an appeal may be taken is jurisdictional, and no jurisdiction is conferred on the court to hear and determine an appeal attempted to be taken after the expiration of the time fixed.

2. Criminal law — 1024(3)—Appeal by people must be taken from judgment on demurrer and not from order sustaining demurrer.

Under Pen. Code, § 1238, authorizing an appeal by the people from a judgment on demurrer, and section 1008, authorizing amendment of indictment or information and providing for judgment, if the district attorney does not amend after a demurrer is sustained, a judgment should be entered on the demurrer, and the appeal must be taken from such judgment, and not from the order sustaining the demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Criminal prosecution by the People against S. N. Apple. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the indictment, the People appeal. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion granted, and appeal dismissed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.
James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, and E. L. Randall, of Corning, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of Tehama county for the crime of felony embezzlement. The defendant demurred to the indictment on the ground, among others, that the facts therein stated do not show the crime of embezzlement or the commission of any offense, and the court sustained the demurrer.

The district attorney appeals from the order sustaining the demurrer.

The defendant has moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the same was not taken within the time prescribed by law.

Section 1240 of the Penal Code provides:

"An appeal may be taken by the people by announcing in open court at the time the order is made that the people appeal from the same."

The record discloses that the order sustaining the demurrer was made and entered in the minutes of the court on the 29th day of November, 1921, and that the district attorney, on the 5th day of December, 1921, appeared in court and thus attempted to take an appeal from the order sustaining the demurrer, as follows:

"District Attorney, M. J. Cheatham, now announces that this being the first law day and the first time when he was present in court since the making of the order sustaining the demurrer to the indictment in the above-entitled action, which order was made in his absence, that the plaintiff now appeals to the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, of the State of California, from the order sustaining the demurrer to the indictment in the above-entitled action."

[1] Assuming that the order sustaining the demurrer is itself tantamount to a judgment on said demurrer, it is clear that under section 1240 of the Penal Code, above herein quoted, the appeal was not taken within due legal time, and for that reason could not be reviewed by this court. It is well settled that the limit of time fixed by the Code within which an appeal may be taken from an order or judgment is jurisdictional, and that therefore, where an appeal has been attempted after the expiration of the time within which the Code provides it shall be taken, jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal is not conferred upon the court to which the appeal is sought to be taken. Under this view of the situation, as it is presented by the record, the motion to dismiss the appeal would have to be granted.

[2] But a more serious proposition arises upon the question whether there was, in fact, any action by the trial court upon which, as a matter of law, an appeal may be predicated.

Section 1238 of the Penal Code provides, among other things, that an appeal may be taken by the people "from a judgment for the defendant on a demurrer to the indictment, accusation or information." In the case of People v. Ah Own, 39 Cal. 604, which was an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to an indictment for kidnaping, it was held, by a divided court, however, that an order sustaining a demurrer to an indictment constituted the final action in the case, and that such order therefore amounted to a final judgment, from which an appeal might be prosecuted and maintained. A similar ruling was made in the case of People v. Jordan, 65 Cal. 644, 4 Pac. 683. In the Ah Own Case the reason upon which the ruling was founded was that a criminal pleading was not, as was and is true of a pleading in a civil action, amendable. In the Jordan Case it was held that—

"The Penal Code does not provide for any entry of judgment on demurrer other than the entry of the order upon the minutes. § 1007. The order in the minutes is the judgment. Although it is better to employ the language of the Code, a judgment that a demurrer be 'sustained' is in effect a judgment that a demurrer be allowed."

When the above decisions were handed down, there was no provision in the Penal Code authorizing the amendment of an information or indictment. Since then, however, section 1008 of the Penal Code has been amended so as to read as follows:

"An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. An indictment cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged, nor an information so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination. If a demurrer is sustained and an amendment is not allowed, or, if allowed, is not made, within such reasonable time as the court may fix, the court shall give a judgment of dismissal, which shall be a bar to another prosecution for the same offense. The defendant shall thereupon be discharged, unless the court directs the case to be submitted to the same or another grand jury, or directs a new information to be filed; provided that after such order or resubmission, the defendant may be examined before a magistrate, and discharged or committed by him, as in other cases."

It will be thus noted that under the existing law the district attorney has the right to amend an indictment or information without leave of court at any time before a plea to the charge by the defendant, provided, of course, that the amendment does not change the offense charged or does not involve matters of substance, but only matters of form. People v. Anthony, 20 Cal. App. 586, 129 Pac. 968. It will also be observed that, after demurrer sustained to an indictment or information, the district attorney is entitled to a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, within which to amend the pleading, and if, within such time as the court in its discretion may fix, he does not amend, the court must cause a judgment of dismissal to be entered. It would seem to be clear, from this provision, that it is contemplated that either a judgment of dismissal or a judgment upon the demurrer itself without a dismissal based upon the order sustaining the demurrer should be entered, and, this being so, it would follow that there can be no appeal except from a judgment so entered. In other words, under section 1008 as amended, whereby amendments of criminal pleadings in matters of form are allowed, the situation with respect to the action of the court in sustaining a demurrer to a criminal pleading is precisely the same as that with respect to the same matter in civil actions. It has often been held, and, indeed, it is clear from the Code provisions themselves, that an order sustaining a demurrer to a complaint in a civil action is not appealable, but that in such case the appeal must be from the judgment entered upon the order sustaining the demurrer. Since section 1008 of the Penal Code was amended, as indicated above, there is no reason why the rule as to appeals in civil cases for the purpose of having the order of the court sustaining a demurrer reviewed should not be applicable in criminal cases, and that the appeal in such instances should be from the judgment entered upon the order sustaining the demurrer and not from the order itself.

Our conclusion is that the attempted appeal here is futile and that this court is without jurisdiction to review the purported record before us.

We may add that the Attorney General did not at the oral argument seriously resist the motion to dismiss the appeal, probably being of the opinion that the attempt to bring the matter before this court was not legally successful. No briefs have been filed herein by either side. We have therefore been guided in our conclusion entirely by the Code sections themselves and what little light is to be gathered from the earlier decisions, cited above, which, as we have shown, were rendered before section 1008 of the Penal Code was revised, as indicated above.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

PACIFIC STATES CORPORATION v. GILL
et al. (Civ. 2386.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 16, 1922.)

1. Principal and agent §99—Judgment on theory of ostensible agency not sustainable, where parties dealing with alleged agent did not know of circumstances relied on.

A judgment for defendants on the theory that one from whom they purchased plaintiff's cattle was his ostensible agent cannot be sustained, where many of the circumstances tending to show an ostensible agency occurred after the first purchase and some of them after a second purchase, and there was no evidence that defendants at the time of the purchases had any knowledge of the circumstances which had already occurred tending to establish an ostensible agency.

2. Principal and agent §103(7)—General authority to sell cattle held not to authorize sale of cattle covered by feeding contract providing for sale by mutual agreement.

Under a contract whereby plaintiff's foreman was to take plaintiff's cattle to his own ranch, and feed, water, and fatten them, and under which the cattle were to be marketed at such times and for such prices as should be mutually agreed on, and the proceeds divided, the foreman had no authority to sell the cattle under any general power he might have had as plaintiff's agent to sell other cattle or live stock, and evidence tending to establish a general authority to sell cattle or other live stock did not tend to show any authority to sell the cattle covered by the contract.

3. Animals §22—Contract for feeding and division held a bailment.

A contract under which plaintiff's foreman was to take plaintiff's cattle to his own ranch and feed, water, and fatten them, and they were to be sold at times and prices mutually agreed on, and the proceeds divided, was a contract of bailment, under which the foreman was a depository of the cattle for hire.

4. Principal and agent §173(1)—No presumption that draft received by principal from agent about time of unauthorized sale represented proceeds of sale.

There was no presumption that a draft sent plaintiff by its agent about the time of his unauthorized sale of cattle to defendant was delivered to plaintiff as payment of its interest in the selling price of such cattle.

5. Principal and agent §173(1)—Inference that check received from agent was in settlement of selling price of cattle sold held overcome.

Any inference that a check sent plaintiff by its agent about the time of his unauthorized sale of cattle to defendant was in payment of plaintiff's interest in the selling price of the cattle was overcome by uncontradicted evidence that it was not given for that purpose.

6. Principal and agent §166(3)—Receipt of check not ratification of unauthorized sale, of which principal did not know.

Though a check sent plaintiff by its agent about the time of his unauthorized sale of cattle to defendants was intended by him as payment of plaintiff's share of the proceeds of the sale, there was no ratification of the sales, where plaintiff and its officers did not know of the sale, or know that the check was sent for such purpose.

7. Principal and agent §173(2)—Letter written by agent or under his direction admissible to show purpose of accompanying check.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, a letter accompanying a check received by plaintiff from its agent and explanatory of the purpose for which the check was sent was admissible, if written by the agent himself or by some one under his direction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Pacific States Corporation against Fred Gill and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Pendleton & Lewis, of Los Angeles, Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, and Howard S. Lewis, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lamberson & Lamberson, of Visalia, and Karl A. Machetanz, of Exeter, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for the alleged conversion of 257 head of steers, property of the plaintiff; it being the contention of the latter that said steers were, without authority or right, sold to the defendants by one George H. Loughery, who at the time of said sale had possession of said animals. The cause was tried before a jury. At the close of plaintiff's case a motion for a nonsuit was granted as to the defendant Western Meat Company. The jury gave the defendants a verdict, and thereafter a motion was made by the plaintiff for a new trial upon all the statutory grounds appropriate to a verdict for a defendant in a civil action for damages. Section 657, Code Civ. Proc. Said motion having been denied, judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the defendants. This appeal, supported by a bill of exceptions, is by the plaintiff from the judgment so entered.

The plaintiff was at the time of the transaction involved herein engaged in the business of raising, buying, and selling beef cattle in Tulare county. The cattle were kept and ranged on lands belonging to the plaintiff in said county, one of said tracts of land being known as the "Tagus ranch." G. H. Loughery was at the times referred to in the complaint also engaged in the stock-raising business on lands owned by him and situated in Tulare county and not far distant from the cattle ranges of the plaintiff. Loughery, it may here be stated, was, during a portion of the year 1915, employed by the plaintiff on the Tagus ranch as one of the foremen having charge of the stock of the plaintiff on said ranch. On the 25th day of September, 1915, the plaintiff and the said G. H. Loughery entered into a written agreement, by the terms of which said plaintiff was to and did turn over to the possession of said Loughery 257 head of beef cattle, weighing in the aggregate 201,560 pounds, "to be fed and marketed upon the terms and conditions herein contained." Said agreement provided that the said cattle were to be taken by Loughery to his ranch in Tulare county, consisting of 1,065 acres and known as the "Ammawage ranch," and there feed, water, and fatten said cattle, "giving them the best of care until marketed and sold as provided in this agreement." The agreement further provided that Loughery at his own expense should "provide all water, feed and help necessary to properly feed and fatten said cattle, so that they shall be ready for slaughter for the California fall and winter trade of 1916 and 1917; it being agreed that no cattle shall be marketed earlier than September 1, 1916, and that all shall have been fattened and marketed by not later than March 1, 1917." The agreement proceeds:

"Said cattle may be sold in whole, or in part at any time between said last-mentioned dates, but said Loughery agrees to notify Pacific States Corporation by written notice mailed to it at the Merritt Building, Los Angeles, Cal., whenever he is ready to have any of said cattle sold, stating the number of head ready to be marketed and giving Pacific States Corporation an opportunity to co-operate with him in obtaining the best price for said cattle. It is agreed that said cattle shall be marketed only at such times and for such price as shall be mutually agreed upon by said Pacific States Corporation and said Loughery: Provided, however, that in the event said parties fail to agree as to said matter, or as to whether said cattle are being properly fattened or as to whether said cattle are in proper condition to be sold as fat beef cattle for killing purposes, then the decision in said matters shall be left to Mr. James C. Drake, president of Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, Los Angeles, Cal., as sole arbitrator, and his decision in said matters, and each of them, shall be final. As said cattle are marketed and sold, all the proceeds therefrom shall be paid over to Pacific States Corporation until 201,560 pounds net weight (this being the total number of pounds that the cattle weighed at the time of their delivery to Loughery) of said cattle shall have been sold. Thereafter, as any of said cattle are sold, two-thirds of the selling price shall be paid over to Pacific States Corporation and one-third thereof to said Loughery, until all of said cattle are sold."

The agreement finally provides that, after all said cattle have been marketed and paid for, a final settlement shall be had between the parties to the agreement, whereby the plaintiff shall be allowed credit for 201,560 pounds of cattle weighed in at the commencement of "this feeding agreement at the average price per pound received for all of said cattle, and the balance received for said cattle shall be divided equally between Pacific States Corporation and said G. H. Loughery, taking into account the moneys received by the respective parties prior to said final settlement." In other words, Loughery was to receive 50 per cent. of all increase made in weight by said cattle "by growth and feeding," after the plaintiff had received payment for the cattle as weighed at the time of the execution of the agreement, to wit,

201,560 pounds. The final clause of the agreement provides that said Loughery, by not later than March 1, 1917, "shall cause to be sold under this contract at least 201,560 pounds of fat, marketable, beef cattle."

The complaint alleges that on or about the 15th day of June, 1916, the plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to the immediate possession of the cattle referred to in the above agreement; that the value of said cattle on said day was $35,924; "that on or about said last-mentioned day, and while the plaintiff was the owner of, and entitled to the immediate possession of, said cattle, as aforesaid, the above-named defendants, and each of them, wrongfully took and carried away said personal property, said 257 head of cattle, and disposed of the same, and converted the same to their own use, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $35,924."

The answer, after specifically denying the essential or vital averments of the complaint, sets up three special defenses, to wit: (1) That during the year 1915 and a portion of the year of 1916 said George H. Loughery, with other men, were employed by the plaintiff on its said Tagus ranch; that during a portion of said years the said Loughery was held out by the plaintiff to be a manager of the business of said plaintiff at said ranch, "and the said George H. Loughery was, during said time, held out by the plaintiff to be and was actually in control of the buying and selling of cattle at said Tagus ranch; that in the month of December, 1915, the defendants believing from the appearances, as such appearances were presented to them at the time, and from the fact that said George H. Loughery was, during such time, occupying the position as manager of said Tagus ranch, and was and had been for several months prior thereto actually engaged in the business of buying and selling cattle for and on behalf of said Pacific States Corporation, plaintiff herein at said Tagus ranch, and believing that the said George H. Loughery was the manager of said Pacific States Corporation for the purpose of buying and selling cattle, did purchase from said George H. Loughery, as the agent of said Pacific States Corporation, about 246 head of cattle which defendants believe are a portion of the same cattle attempted to be described by the plaintiff in its complaint on file herein, but the said defendants did not purchase or receive from the said George H. Loughery, or from any other person, 257 head of cattle." It is further alleged, in connection with this defense, which, as will be observed, is that of ostensible agency, that said defendants, at the time that they made such purchase, paid to said Loughery "as the agent and manager of said Pacific States Corporation" the full amount and value of said cattle so purchased, "and at said time believed that the said Loughery had full and complete authority as the agent of said plaintiff to sell said cattle and receive payment therefor"; that said Loughery had possession of said cattle and delivered possession thereof to defendants at the city of Visalia in said county of Tulare, at the time of the purchase of the same by the defendants, who at said time believed said Loughery to be the agent of the plaintiff herein. (2) That the plaintiff is estoppel from denying the agency of Loughery and the full power of the latter to sell the cattle in question as the agent of the plaintiff for the reason that the plaintiff by its own acts and conduct, at the time of the purchase of said cattle by the defendants, led the latter to believe that said Loughery was its manager and agent for the purpose of buying and selling cattle and that by reason of such acts and conduct "the plaintiff caused the defendants to change their position in the premises and to purchase the said cattle from the said George H. Loughery as the manager and agent of the plaintiff at said Tagus ranch," etc. (3) That at the time of the sale of said cattle to the defendants by said Loughery the plaintiff was the owner of an undivided two-thirds interest and the said Loughery the owner of an undivided one-third interest in and to said 246 head of cattle so sold to defendants; that at the time of said sale said Loughery had full power and authority to sell, market and dispose of said cattle or any part thereof, and during all of said time said Loughery had possession of said cattle; that (on information and belief) immediately after the sale and delivery of said cattle by said Loughery to defendants the former delivered and paid to the plaintiff two-thirds of the sum which was then and there paid by defendants to said Loughery as the purchase price of said cattle, to wit, the sum of $7,583, "and that said sum was the true value of the share and interest of said plaintiff in said cattle at the time of said sale and the delivery thereof."

[1] It is manifest from the special defenses set up in the answer that the theory upon which issue was tendered by the defendants was that Loughery, in the transactions involved in the sale of the cattle to the defendants, was the ostensible agent of the plaintiff with authority to negotiate the sale. The second special defense, which is that of estoppel, really amounts to no more than that of ostensible agency. In the brief of respondents, however, it is claimed that the testimony shows actual agency in Loughery, or, in other language, that Loughery was actually the agent of the plaintiff, with full authority to negotiate the sale of the cattle referred to in the pleadings to the defendants. Counsel for the plaintiff, in their closing brief, state that the defendants, in accordance with the theory upon which their answer was framed, presented the case below upon the hypothesis of ostensible agency, but that since the appeal has been taken they have abandoned the theory of ostensible agency and adopted that of actual agency. It is upon the theory upon which the defendants present their appeal that the case will be reviewed here. Indeed, it is to be stated that, if the defendants had rested their case upon the theory of ostensible agency, it is clear that a vast amount of the testimony offered in support of that claim would be wholly irrelevant and incompetent, since many of the circumstances which were brought out by the evidence at the trial occurred subsequently to the date of the purchase of the first lot of cattle by the Gill Bros. from Loughery, and some occurred even after the date in February, 1916, when the second lot of cattle was likewise purchased. For this reason alone, upon the theory of ostensible agency, a reversal would be required, for there is no evidence showing or tending to show that at the time the purchases of the cattle were made the defendants had any knowledge of those few circumstances which occurred before the sales and which might otherwise be held to be competent as tending to establish ostensible agency. In fact, Fred Gill, the only one of the two defendants called to the witness stand in their behalf, testified that he negotiated with Loughery for the purchase of the cattle and that he had met Loughery only a few days prior to the 15th day of December, 1915, on which day the first lot of cattle was purchased from Loughery by him. He did not then know what Loughery's contractual or business relations with the plaintiff were or what his authority was, except such information upon the subject as was involved in the statement made by one Townsend when the latter introduced Loughery to said Gill as one of the foreman of the plaintiff's Tagus ranch.

It is first contended by the defendants that there is testimony tending to show that the cattle sold and delivered to the Gill Bros. by Loughery were not the cattle as to which the written contract between the plaintiff and Loughery was made. In other words, it is the claim that the cattle sold to the Gill Bros. were not the cattle described and referred to in the contract between plaintiff and Loughery. This contention, however, is at variance with the admission made by the defendants in their amended answer to the complaint, wherein they allege that the defendants "did purchase from said George H. Loughery, as the agent of said Pacific States Corporation, about 246 head of cattle which defendants believe are a portion of the same cattle attempted to be described by the plaintiff in its complaint on file herein." The second defense of the answer, as we have seen, admits that the plaintiff was the owner of a two-thirds interest in the cattle.

Moreover, the claim of the plaintiff that the cattle described in the complaint were the cattle sold to the Gill Bros. is supported by the testimony of witnesses who knew the cattle and who were present at the time they were sold.

As to the present theory of the defendants, however, that Loughery, in executing the transactions culminating in the sale of the cattle to the defendants, was the actual agent of the plaintiff, authorized as such to negotiate the sale, it will be necessary to review the evidence which it is claimed tends to establish that proposition. It appears that, at some time in the year 1913, one H. C. Merritt, Jr., became vice president and general manager of the plaintiff, and remained in those positions continuously up to and during a portion of the year 1917. Said Loughery, subsequent to the time in 1913 when Merritt became general manager of the corporation, was given employment as a foreman of plaintiff on the Tagus ranch. Besides Loughery there were several other men employed by the plaintiff on said ranch, and acting as foremen and discharging duties similar to those performed by Loughery. The cattle referred to in the complaint were kept at the Tagus ranch down to the time of the execution of the contract between plaintiff and Loughery. Upon the making of the contract between the plaintiff and Loughery the cattle in question (257 head in number according to the plaintiff) were driven to Goshen Junction, in Tulare county, and were there weighed and delivered to Loughery. The weighing of the steers was conducted by Merritt, assisted by Loughery, a man by the name of Charles Sage, one Clark, and several other persons whose names are not mentioned. After the weighing and counting of the cattle Loughery drove them from Goshen Junction to his Ammawage ranch. At some time in the year 1916 Merritt visited the Ammawage ranch for the purpose of inspecting the cattle. He did not see Loughery on that occasion, but saw the steers.

Several months thereafter Merritt again visited the Ammawage ranch and was informed that Loughery had departed for the East. He did not see the cattle at this time, but, inquiring of Davidson, foreman of Loughery, as to the whereabouts of the cattle, was informed by said Davidson that, all the feed on the Ammawage ranch having been exhausted, the cattle had been removed and were then on the mountain pasture of Loughery. Merritt thereupon sent Loughery a wire in the East, asking him about the cattle, and Loughery replied that "he had them on good feed, and as soon as he came back he would show them to me." Shortly thereafter Loughery returned to Tulare county and accompanied Merritt to a place (not in the mountains) where there was a band of cattle grazing, and pointed out the animals to Merritt as those mentioned in the contract. They were not, however, the cattle so referred to. Merritt became suspicious, and some time later inquired of one of the employees, whom he designated as one of the "riders of our cattle," where the cattle in question were, and the said employee replied that "those cattle had been sold a long time ago to the Gill Bros." At this time, which was in the year 1917, Loughery was at the home of his mother-in-law in Pasadena, and Merritt called him on the telephone, and requested him to come to the Tagus ranch immediately and "straighten out" the matter of the sale of the cattle to the defendants. Loughery did not go to the Tagus ranch in response to said request, and, although Merritt heard of his having been a few days later in the county of Tulare, did not see him, and had not heard from or of him from that time until the time of the trial of this action. In connection with the statement of the facts thus far made, it should be said that Davidson, foreman of Loughery, testified that Loughery instructed him "to say to anybody connected with the Pacific States Corporation" who might make inquiries about the steers, that they were in the mountains, and that, Merritt having subsequently, and after the cattle had been sold to the Gill Bros., asked where the steers were, Davidson, in obedience to Loughery's instruction, told him that "they were in the mountains."

We come now to a consideration of the testimony which it is claimed supports the theory upon which the defendants insist that they are entitled to an affirmance of the judgment, to wit, that Loughery, in disposing of the cattle to the Gill Bros., was vested with full authority so to do by the plaintiff. Said testimony may be briefly stated as follows:

As above shown, Fred Gill, who conducted the negotiations resulting in the sale of the cattle by Loughery to the defendants, admitted that he met the former for the first time a few days only prior to the day in December, 1915, on which the first "bunch" of the steers was purchased; that Loughery was introduced to him by one James H. Townsend as the agent of the plaintiff. Of other previous transactions of Loughery, acting for plaintiff, Fred Gill, at the date of the first purchase, had no knowledge.

Townsend testified that in the summer of 1915 he was employed by Loughery to work on the Tagus ranch for two days; that Loughery gave him his (Loughery's) personal check for the sum due for the services so performed, but that within a brief time thereafter he received a draft from "the Tagus people" in payment for the same services; and that thereupon he returned to Loughery the money he received on the check or draft the latter had given him. This witness testified that a day or two before the purchase of the first lot of cattle by the Gill Bros. he introduced Loughery to Fred Gill as "the foreman on the ranch out there," and added: "I had always known him as such."

Len Bequette testified that, at some time in the fall of 1915, Merritt, manager of plaintiff, stated to witness that Loughery was one of his foremen.

George E. Waddell stated that he accompanied his son to the Tagus ranch some time in the latter part of 1915 or the first part of 1916, his son having gone to said ranch to buy some cattle; that at that time he did not hear any negotiations between Loughery and his son regarding the purchase of cattle; that, at the time the cattle were selected and weighed, Mr. Merritt, Jr., was present; and that the only part that Loughery took in the transaction, so far as he observed, was to assist in selecting and weighing the cattle.

G. H. Waddell, son of the witness last above named, stated that at the time referred to by his father he purchased some cattle from the Tagus ranch, the transaction being carried on by Loughery. He further stated that, a short time previously to the purchase of the cattle, he met Loughery at the town of Tulare, and that the latter stated to him that he had charge of the cattle at the Tagus ranch and had some there he would like to sell to the witness; that Loughery said that the cattle were not at that time in good form, but that he was feeding them, and that he agreed with Loughery to purchase a number of head; that in the month of January, 1916, he went to the Tagus ranch and selected the cattle, and he and Loughery together weighed them. The witness further testified that he did not remember whether he gave Loughery the check for the cattle at the Tagus ranch at the time of the purchase, or whether Loughery "came to Lindsay for it. I was doing business at Lindsay; had a butcher business at that time." He also testified that he saw Merritt, Jr., at the Tagus ranch at the time that the purchase was made, but that he had no conversation with him about Loughery, and that he had no conversation with Merritt about settling for the cattle; that "Mr. Loughery did that."

H. C. Heizeg testified that he had business transactions with the plaintiff in the years 1913, 1914, and 1915; that in 1915 he sold some mules to Loughery, and that the latter gave him a check for the amount the sale came to, but he could not state whether it was a Tagus ranch check or Loughery's own personal check. He also stated that all he knew of the nature of Loughery's business relations with the plaintiff was what he was told by a Mr. Hollingsworth, who worked on the Tagus ranch, and who said to the witness that Loughery wanted to buy some mules for the ranch.

The foregoing testimony was given by witnesses for the defendants. There were some 12 or more other witnesses who testified for the defendants; but, as the transactions which they testified they had had with Loughery on the Tagus ranch were of the same general character as those testified to by the witnesses last above named, no useful purpose could be subserved by reproducing their testimony herein.

[2, 3] Conceding that the evidence produced by the defendants, and of which the above is a summarized statement, is sufficient to warrant the inference that Loughery was, at the time of the consummation of the transactions involved in this litigation, an agent of the plaintiff having general power to buy and sell stock for the latter, still it is very clear that said evidence falls far short of showing, or even tending to show, that in the transactions concerned herein he was authorized to negotiate and consummate the sale of the cattle described in the written contract between him and the plaintiff. Indeed, it may be conceded that Loughery, while employed as a foreman on the Tagus ranch, was authorized by the plaintiff to buy and sell cattle and other domestic animals for the latter, and yet that fact would not be proof of authority having been vested in him by the plaintiff to sell the cattle described in the written contract to the defendants, or, for that matter, to any other person or persons. The transaction relating to the cattle sold by Loughery to the defendants was a special or particular one between the plaintiff and Loughery, and had no reference to or connection with any other contractual relations existing between the plaintiff and Loughery. In other words, it was an independent transaction, and was the subject of a special contract, reduced to writing, whereby the plaintiff agreed to and did, upon certain specified terms and conditions, turn over to Loughery the possession of said cattle for a specified purpose. In fact, it was, in effect, a contract of bailment, and under it Loughery was a depository of the cattle for hire. It provided, among other things, as we have seen, that—

"Said cattle shall be marketed only at such times and for such price as shall be mutually agreed upon by said Pacific States Corporation and said Loughery."

Thus it will be observed that, even if it be true that Loughery was, at the time of the execution of said contract, an agent of the plaintiff, with general powers with respect to the sale and purchasing of other domestic animals for the former, there is nothing in the evidence which shows or tends to show that Loughery was authorized to sell the cattle described in the contract, in the absence of an agreement upon the part of the plaintiff that he might do so. Indeed, nothing could be clearer than that Loughery had no authority to sell the cattle referred to in the contract under any general power he might have had as an agent of the plaintiff to sell other cattle or live stock for the latter. And it is equally clear that, as pointed out above, the evidence tending to establish authority in Loughery to sell cattle or other live stock for the plaintiff other than those mentioned in the contract in question does not tend to show that there was, as the written contract referred to provided, an agreement by the plaintiff with Loughery that the latter had authority to sell the steers referred to in said contract. In other words, while the evidence produced by the plaintiff tends to show that Loughery, while acting as foreman on the Tagus ranch, had the authority as such foreman to buy and sell cattle and other stock for the plaintiff, still the proof so adduced does not show nor tend to show that it had been mutually agreed between plaintiff and Loughery that the steers which were made the subject of the special written contract between said parties should be sold or marketed by Loughery at the times and for the prices at which the latter sold the steers to the defendants, or that he had any authority to sell them at the times that he disposed of them to the defendants.

Where, as here, the authority to do a particular act under a written contract between two parties must alone be found in the contract itself, or, in other words, where authority to do an act by one party to a written contract cannot be exercised, except upon the express agreement or consent of the other party thereto, mere evidence of the fact that the party assuming to perform such act was, prior to and at the time of the making of such written contract, the agent of the other, cannot of itself justly be held to be proof of authority given to the agent by the principal to do such act. Indeed, the very fact that as to the cattle in question and the condition upon which they were to be marketed by the parties a special contract was made, and the further fact that the cattle were to be and were removed to Loughery's ranch from the Tagus ranch, themselves constitute convincing evidence that the intention was to take the subject-matter of said contract from within the scope of any authority Loughery might have had prior to and at the time of the making of the contract to buy and sell cattle or other domestic animals for the plaintiff other than those described in the said contract, and therefore to show that Loughery disposed of the cattle in question to the Gill Bros. by and with the consent of the plaintiff, there should have been evidence, either direct or circumstantial, disclosing that such consent had been obtained, or that the sale of the steers to the defendants was by and through the mutual consent and agreement of both plaintiff and Loughery. There was as we have shown, absolutely no such testimony introduced into the case.

The third defense interposed by the defendants involves the claim that the plaintiff received and accepted from Loughery its share of the purchase price of the cattle and that thus it ratified the sale made by Loughery to the defendants. The defendants offered in evidence a draft issued on the 14th day of February, 1916, by the National Bank of Visalia, upon the First National Bank of Los Angeles, payable to G. H. Loughery, for the sum of $1,962.24 and indorsed, "Pacific States Corporation, by C. H. Dickinson, Secretary." This draft, having been issued near the time at which the second lot of cattle was sold by Loughery to the defendants, was offered in evidence by the latter upon the theory that it was in payment to plaintiff for its interest in said second lot of cattle so sold. Further than the mere check itself, the defendants presented no evidence showing the particular purpose for which the check was delivered to the plaintiff by Loughery. On the other hand, C. H. Dickinson, secretary, auditor, and assistant treasurer of the plaintiff at the time that said check was received by the latter, testified that the check was in payment for neither of the two lots of cattle sold to the Gill Bros., but was to pay for cattle which Loughery had sold to G. H. Waddell. The testimony of Dickinson as to this matter is as follows:

"I did not receive from George H. Loughery, in any month in 1916, or at any other time, any money on account of the sale of the Gill cattle or of the cattle to Gill. The corporation did not receive any such remittance; if the corporation had received it, I would most certainly have known it. * * * I know for what purpose that check was received by the plaintiff; it was in payment for cattle sold by Loughery to George H. Waddell."

And in this connection it should be stated that the plaintiff offered in evidence a letter which Dickinson said came with the check referred to, the offer having been made on the ground that it explained the purpose for which the check was sent to the plaintiff, and that the court sustained the objection of the defendants to the admission of the evidence on the ground that, the same having been signed by "George H. Loughery, per H," no showing was made that Loughery either dictated the letter or that it was written under his direction or by his authority. Merritt, Jr., general manager of plaintiff, testified, as we have already shown, that neither he nor the corporation learned of the sale of the cattle to Gill Bros. by Loughery until the month of March, 1917, over a year after the last lot of cattle was sold and the check in question was received by the corporation from Loughery. He further stated that the plaintiff received a check in question, but explained that it was for the sale of cattle by Loughery without plaintiff's consent; that he had learned of the sale of cattle by Loughery to persons other than the Gill Bros., through pressing the persons to whom the cattle were so sold, and that he thereupon forced Loughery to draw his check for the amount and then discharged him from the employment of the company.

[4-6] It is first to be remarked that there is no presumption that the check referred to was delivered to the plaintiff as in payment of the latter's interest in the purchase price of any of the cattle sold by Loughery to the Gill Bros.; but, even if it might be said that the circumstance of the receipt of the check near the time at which the last lot of cattle was sold to Gill afforded such an inference, such inference is clearly overcome by the testimony of Dickinson and Merritt to the effect that the check was not given for said purpose, and which testimony must be accepted as revealing the truth of the matter, since there is absolutely no contradiction thereof. Moreover, Merritt testified (and his testimony as to this is nowhere contradicted) that the corporation first learned of the transactions involving the sales of the cattle to the Gill Bros. in the month of March, 1917, which, as above stated and as is obviously true, was over a year after the last sale to Gill Bros. was made. It follows that, if Loughery intended the said check for $1,962.24 as in payment of the plaintiff's share of the proceeds derived from the sale of the last lot of cattle to the Gill Bros., neither the plaintiff nor any of its officers knew that such was the purpose of said payment, and certainly it will not be contended that the plaintiff, not having any knowledge of the sale of the cattle to Gill Bros. or that the check was sent by Loughery with the intention that it should go in payment of its share of any moneys received on said sales, had ratified the transactions involving said sales. A party cannot be held to have ratified an act of which he had no knowledge at the time of the alleged act of ratification.

[7] There are numerous exceptions to the rulings of the court on the evidence and certain assignments of error as to certain instructions given and refused. In view of the conclusion at which we have arrived as to the effect of the evidence introduced for the purpose of showing that Loughery was authorized to sell the cattle, these assignments need not be specifically noticed herein. We may assume that, upon a retrial, the trial court will avoid the repetition of any errors, either in the rulings or in the matter of the giving or refusing to give instructions, into which it might have fallen at the trial of which this appeal is the outgrowth. It is hardly necessary to suggest, however, that in the event of a retrial of the cause, the letter, which was above referred to as having accompanied the check for $1,962.24 received by the plaintiff from Loughery, should be admitted, provided it be shown that it was either written by Loughery himself or by someone under his direction and that its contents are explanatory of the precise purpose for which Loughery transmitted the check to the plaintiff. KOERBER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 3979.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. March 10, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 8, 1922.)

1. Courts $\S$ 200 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Probate court cannot adjudicate title to personalty, in proceedings to discover assets of the estate.

The probate court cannot, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1459-1461, to discover assets of the estate, adjudicate the disputed title to personal property.

2. Courts $\S$ 200 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Claim of property, in proceedings to discover assets, does not give court jurisdiction to adjudicate ownership.

That the party summoned by the probate court, in proceedings for discovery of assets of the estate, filed an answer claiming ownership of the assets involved, does not give the probate court jurisdiction to adjudicate the title to such property.

3. Prohibition $\S$ 10(2)—Can issue to prevent probate court from entering judgment beyond jurisdiction and enforcing it by contempt.

Prohibition will issue to prevent a judge of the probate court from entering a judgment, without jurisdiction, determining the title to personal property, requiring its delivery to the administrator, and reserving power to enforce the order by contempt proceedings, against which a remedy by appeal was not plain, speedy, or adequate.

Original application for writ of prohibition by Alice L. Koerber against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and Hon. Frank H. Dunne, as Judge thereof, to restrain the defendant from rendering a decision or judgment adjudicating title to certain personal property. Writ issued as prayed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

C. J. Heggerty and J. E. Barry, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain and prohibit department 9 of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the judge thereof, from rendering any decision or entering any judgment adjudicating the title to certain personal property, which it is claimed belongs to the estate of May Ferguson, deceased.

The admitted facts are that May Ferguson, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, died therein on July 23, 1920, leaving an estate. The heirs at law, surviving her, are her husband, William J. Ferguson, and the petitioner herein, Alice L. Koerber, who is a daughter by a prior marriage. On December 20, 1920, the surviving husband, William J. Ferguson, filed in said court a petition for the probate of a purported will of said decedent, for his appointment as administrator with the will annexed, and for his appointment as special administrator of said estate. On February 7, 1921, pursuant to said petition, he was appointed, and immediately afterwards qualified as such special administrator, but no action has been taken on that part of the petition relating to the probate of the will and for the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed. In said petition, filed December 20, 1920, it was also, among other things, alleged that, during the last illness of said May Ferguson and a few days prior to her death, the said Alice L. Koerber surreptitiously obtained possession of the keys to the safe deposit box of said May Ferguson and wrongfully removed therefrom the will of the said May Ferguson, and also cash in the sum of $9,995, and jewelry of the value of $3,250, and that she has converted said cash and said jewelry to her own use.

As part of the relief asked for in said petition, the court was requested to issue a citation pursuant to sections 1459, 1460, and 1461 of the Code of Civil Procedure, directing the said Alice L. Koerber to appear before said superior court and be examined on oath on the matters alleged in said petition. Upon the return day of that citation, and in obedience thereto, the said Alice L. Koerber appeared personally and by counsel and filed a written answer to the said petition. She was afterwards examined orally, under oath, concerning all of the matters alleged in said petition. By her answer and in her testimony she claimed that, acting upon the instructions from and at the direction of her mother, she removed said cash and said jewelry and said will from said safe deposit box and brought them to her mother; that her mother thereupon made her a gift of said money and jewelry and instructed her to destroy the will, which she did. During said hearing a dispute also arose as to the ownership of certain pictures and paintings, of which said Alice L. Koerber also claimed to be the owner, by virtue of a bill of sale executed by her mother prior to her death.

At the conclusion of the hearing of said citation, counsel for William J. Ferguson moved said court to make its findings and enter its judgment, adjudicating that the disputed property belonged to the estate of May Ferguson, deceased. Thereupon the court filed the following memorandum opinion:

"While there is a grave question as to the power of the court to make the order asked for by petitioner, yet as I am convinced from the evidence adduced at the hearing that the property in question taken from decedent's safe deposit box is the property of decedent's estate and should be returned thereto; and as the respondent, Alice L. Koerber, has by her answer put in issue the title to said property, the order prayed for will be granted. Counsel will file findings accordingly."

Pursuant to the court's opinion, findings and judgment were prepared and were signed by the court and delivered to the clerk for filing and entry.

[1] The main question, presented by this proceeding, is whether or not the court, sitting in probate, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, pursuant to sections 1459, 1460, and 1461 of the Code of Civil Procedure, may try and determine questions of title to personal property. The trial court expressed grave doubts about it, and, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, there can be no question that such power does not exist, and that any attempt to exercise such authority is in excess of the probate jurisdiction. Ex parte Casey, 71 Cal. 269, 12 Pac. 118; Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 406; Levy v. Superior Court, 105 Cal. 600, 38 Pac. 965, 29 L. R. A. 811; Estate of Klumpke, 167 Cal. 415, 139 Pac. 1062.

It has also been held in other jurisdictions, in construing statutes similar to ours, that the power of the probate court ends with the discovery of the property and the enforcement of the remedial provisions of the statute, and does not extend beyond that, so as to allow the court to adjudicate the title to disputed property. In re Robert's Estate, 48 Mont. 40, 135 Pac. 909; Barto v. Harrison et al., 188 Iowa, 413, 116 N. W. 317; In re Manser's Estate, 60 Or. 240, 118 Pac. 1024; Humbarger v. Humbarger, 72 Kan. 412, 83 Pac. 1095, 115 Am. St. Rep. 204.

Respondents do not seriously dispute the correctness of this rule, but they endeavor to justify the action of the trial court, upon the theory that Alice L. Koerber, by her answer, put in issue the title to said disputed property, and that, in the prayer of her answer, she not only asked that the petition filed against her be denied, but that "she be accorded such other relief to which, under the facts, she is entitled," from which respondents argue that she thereby voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction of the probate court, in this proceeding, the question of the title to said property, and that she is consequently bound by any determination the court may make thereof.

[2] We are of the opinion that such contention cannot be sustained. This proceeding was one purely in probate, ancillary and summary in its character, instituted for the purpose of the discovery of property, claimed as the property of the estate. There was no pretense, either at the time the petition was filed, or during the course of the hearing thereof, that it was an action at law or a suit in equity, to determine the title to the property. Alice L. Koerber was charged therein, by a verified petition, with having wrongfully taken and unlawfully embezzled the property of the estate, which admittedly was in her possession prior to her mother's death. Certainly, under those circumstances, she had the right to deny those accusations by written, verified answer, and to assert her own claim of ownership to said property, without forfeiting her right to have the question of the title to said property tried in the regular legal way. If respondents' contention were sustained then, in every proceeding commenced under the provisions of those Code sections, the mere assertion of a claim of ownership to the disputed property, by the person cited to appear, would at once transform the probate jurisdiction of the court, convert the proceeding into an action at law, and thereby deprive the person, claiming the title to the property, of a trial by jury.

The cases relied upon by respondents are not in point, for the reason that, in each of them, the party against whom the proceeding was instituted was cognizant of the character of the proceeding, the purpose for which it was brought, and the result sought to be accomplished by it, and, notwithstanding such knowledge, openly acquiesced in having the questions presented, considered, and adjudicated in that particular proceeding. Furthermore, the judgments rendered in those proceedings were such as the court had the full power, under its jurisdiction, to render.

[3] By the terms of the judgment proposed in this proceeding, it is adjudged that the estate of May Ferguson and the special administrator thereof do have and recover from said Alice L. Koerber, the said sum of $9,995 and said jewelry, and that, within 10 days after the service upon her of a copy of said findings and judgment, that she return and deliver to said estate and said special administrator the said sum of money and jewelry, and the court reserves—

"the power and authority to enforce this order and judgment, and to enforce and compel compliance therewith by said Alice L. Koerber by such further and other orders, executions, writs, process, and proceedings for contempt in case of the refusal of said Alice L. Koerber to comply with and fully perform the command and requirement of this order and judgment, as shall be and appear to the court to be proper and necessary to enforce and compel compliance with this order and judgment."

In view of the terms of this judgment, we are of the opinion that the petitioner has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy by appeal, and that this proceeding in prohibition, which this court, under the Constitution has power to entertain, is the proper remedy. Primm v. Superior Court, 3 Cal. App. 209, 84 Pac. 786; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 247, 58 Pac. 450; Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 727, 145 Pac. 101; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 397, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192.

SOLOMON v. RED RIVER LUMBER CO.
(Civ. 2420.)

1. Negligence — 23(1) — Attractive nuisance doctrine inapplicable to swing constructed for children.

Though one who constructed a swing to be used by school children for play is liable for failure to use ordinary care in constructing it, the doctrine of attractive nuisance does not apply in such a case, since that doctrine requires one maintaining a dangerous mechanism to use proper care to prevent a child from playing on it; whereas the swing, if properly constructed, was not a dangerous mechanism, and was intended to be used by the children.

2. Negligence — 139(1) — Modification of instruction as to fitness of swing by including attractive nuisance doctrine held misleading.

In an action for the negligent construction of a swing for school children to play on, the modification of an instruction requested by defendant that if the swing was properly made for the purpose for which it was intended to be used, and that no injury would result while it was being so used, defendant was not liable, by adding thereto, "unless you find such appliance constituted" an attractive nuisance, made the instruction confusing and misleading.

3. Negligence — 27 — Person properly constructing swing for children not liable for injuries from inherent danger.

A person who properly constructed a swing intended to be used by school children for play thereon is not liable if the swing was properly constructed for that purpose, though it was made attractive to children and though there was inherent danger in their playing with it.

4. Negligence — 140 — Instruction held erroneous as holding maker of swing liable notwithstanding intervening cause of injury.

The modification of a charge requested by defendant that if, after the swing was made by defendant, its character and use was materially changed without the knowledge or consent of defendant, after which the accident occurred, the defendant was not liable, by adding a proviso requiring the jury to find that the swing as first constructed was not an attractive nuisance, was erroneous as giving the impression that, though the accident was due to the act of third persons who changed the character and use of the swing without the knowledge of defendant, they must find for the plaintiff if the swing was originally an attractive nuisance.

5. Negligence — 140 — Instruction excusing defendant from liability for changed condition of swing held correct.

Where there was evidence that a swing constructed by defendant on school grounds was used for some time without accident, and that plaintiff's son was killed by the breaking of the swing immediately after its character and use had been changed by others so as to impose a greater strain upon its parts, a requested instruction that if the change imposed an additional burden on the swing, and was made without the knowledge or consent of defendant, the verdict must be for defendant, was proper and supported by the evidence.

6. Negligence — 121(1) — Plaintiff held to have burden of proving swing was defective when constructed.

In an action against the maker of a swing for the use of school children, the plaintiff has the burden of proving that the swing was defective when constructed by defendant, which is not met by proof that on the day of the accident the wood appeared rotten, without proof as to the length of time the swing had been in use.

7. Negligence — 27 — Schools and school districts — 89 — Maker of swing for school playground is not charged with its maintenance.

One who constructed on school grounds a swing for the use of school children is not charged with the duty of maintaining the swing after it was constructed, which devolves upon the school district.

8. Negligence — 62(3) — Change in condition of swing after construction held to relieve maker of liability.

Where a swing was originally constructed by pivoting a wheel on the stump of a sawed-off tree and suspending six ropes therefrom on which the children could swing, a change, without the maker's knowledge, in the swing by suspending from the ropes three long planks lashed together at their ends so as to form a triangle on which a large number of children could ride at the same time, was a change imposing an additional strain upon the swing so as to relieve the maker of the swing from liability for death resulting from the breaking of the tree, the first morning the swing was used after it was changed.

9. Negligence ⚡62(3)—Maker of swing for school could not anticipate dangerous change therein would be made by teacher.

Even if the maker of a swing for use by school children should have anticipated that the children would attempt to make changes in its construction and use which added to the danger of its breaking, the maker could not have anticipated that such changes would be made by a teacher in the school, and is not liable for death resulting from the breaking of the swing after such changes were made by the teacher.

10. Pleading ⚡237(6)—Defendant held entitled to amend to conform to proof.

In an action for injuries resulting from a swing constructed by defendant for a school, where the answer alleged the swing had been changed from its condition as constructed by defendant, by some of the children, and testimony at the trial that the change was made by the teacher was excluded because it varied from the answer, defendant was entitled, on statement it had not discovered until two days before that the change was made by the teacher, to amend his answer to conform to the proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by John Solomon against the Red River Lumber Company to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's minor child. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, and A. E. Bolton and Arthur W. Bolton, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dodge & Barry, of Reno, Nev., for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from a judgment based upon the verdict of a jury for $5,000 against the defendant, in an action for damages for the death of plaintiff's minor son, Joseph Solomon, aged 9, who, with 25 or 30 other boys, was playing with a playground apparatus in the school yard of the Westwood public school in the county of Lassen. The apparatus broke, a portion thereof striking him and causing his death. This apparatus was a swing constructed as follows: A white fir tree about 12 inches in diameter, standing in the school yard, was sawed off about 12 or 14 feet from the ground. An iron pin or bolt was driven or placed perpendicularly in the top of the stump. On that pin a wheel was placed horizontally so that it revolved around the pin. A nut on the top of the pin prevented the wheel from coming off, and an iron washer was placed under the hub of the wheel and resting on the top of the stump of the tree. The evidence does not show the diameter of the wheel, but it was described as being the front wheel of a dump wagon and weighing from 80 to 120 pounds. Six ropes were attached to the rim of the wheel, and they hung down to a point near the ground with a loop at the lower end.

The school children played therewith by hanging on to the ropes or putting a foot in the loop at the end thereof and swinging themselves around the tree. On October 31, 1916, three of the ropes were cut off. The use of the swing continued and it remained in that condition until the day of the accident, September 27, 1917.

That morning three boards, each 12 or 14 feet long, 10 or 12 inches wide, and 1½ inches thick, were placed in the loops of the three remaining ropes, so as to form a triangle from 10 to 12 feet on each side and were lashed together where they joined. These board were teeter boards taken from another apparatus in the school yard. The apparatus being thus changed, about 25 or 30 boys got on to the board, some standing, some sitting, while others pushed, so that they swung around. Before school opened that same morning the stump broke about 5 feet from the top. In falling the wheel struck Joseph Solomon on the head, causing his death as before stated. It is alleged in the complaint that "said Joseph Solomon was standing near said contrivance or appliance" at the time of the accident, but the evidence shows that he was upon one of the boards riding around with the other children.

It is not disputed that said swing was constructed and furnished by said defendant to be used as a plaything by the children attending said school. The liability of defendant for the accident is claimed by plaintiff to be based upon the theory:

"That said contrivance or appliance was very attractive to children, but that the same, by reason of the unsoundness of said stump and the weight of said wheel, was naturally and inherently unsafe and dangerous, and was constructed in a careless and negligent manner, and in its condition was unsafe and dangerous for the children using the same, or for children coming in close proximity to said contrivance or appliance while the same was being used by other children."

In its answer appellant denied that said contrivance was constructed in a careless and negligent manner, "or that its condition at the time alleged in plaintiff's complaint or at any other time or at all was unsafe or dangerous to the children using the same or for children coming in close proximity to said contrivance or appliance where the same was being used by other children or at all." It is also claimed in the answer that said contrivance was so constructed as to be a safe and proper thing for use as a plaything by said children, and that had said appliance been used in the manner and for the purpose for which it was constructed no injury could have resulted therefrom. It was further alleged in the answer that pupils attending said school without the knowledge or consent of the defendant caused a triangle to be made around said tree as hereinbefore described, and that the same was caused to revolve at a high rate of speed, and "a great tension placed thereon caused the wheel to give way and be disconnected from the said tree and in so doing the said Solomon as alleged and set forth in said complaint was struck and injured."

It is also set out that said appliance was manufactured and placed upon said playground by the said Red River Lumber Company at the instance and request of the board of trustees of said school district, and that defendant at no time alleged in plaintiff's complaint nor at any other time had any direct control or management of said appliance or of said pupils attending said school "or the method or manner in which said appliance could be used or was used than any other citizen in the said town of Westwood."

[1] No doubt exists that the complaint states a cause of action upon the theory that defendant did not exercise ordinary care in constructing said contrivance. This conclusion follows from the application of familiar principles of the law of negligence, but respondent contended in the trial, and the court seems to have agreed with him, that there was involved also the doctrine of what is known as the turntable cases. Respondent, indeed, states in his brief:

"The plaintiff's theory of this case is: (1) That the apparatus was attractive to children, and not only was it attractive but that the children of the Westwood school were invited to play upon and about it, and that it came under the rule of the turntable cases."

We are satisfied, however, that the effort to apply the doctrine of those cases to the situation herein could result only in uncertainty and confusion and was likely to produce prejudicial error. In those cases is involved a machine or contrivance that is both "dangerous" and "attractive." It can be said, also, that a swing of the kind used herein may be both dangerous and attractive. Thus far the analogy may be complete, but the vital element in the turntable cases which makes the owner or the one maintaining the dangerous and attractive mechanism liable for injury to another is the failure to use proper care to "prevent" the injured person from using said contrivance. Herein no such negligence could, of course, be imputed, because the swing was constructed for the use of the children. In one case the contrivance is used by different persons and for an entirely different purpose from what was contemplated, while in the other it was constructed for the use of the injured person and for the very purpose for which he was using it, that is, as a plaything. In the turntable cases the machine is required to be secured so that it cannot be used as a plaything, while herein it is required to be left unsecured so that it can be so used. The element of allurements, also, has no such significance herein as in the other cases. That quality therein is considered as equivalent to an invitation to children to "meddle with such machinery" or to go about or upon it and attempt to use it for their own pleasure, so that it cannot be said that, in so doing, they are trespassers. Herein, however, the fact that the swing was made attractive has no relation to the question of negligence. The element of trespassing is not involved, and it was entirely proper for the defendant to make the swing as attractive as possible to promote the purpose had in view.

The dangerous character of the machine in those cases referred to in the decisions is also an inherent and uncommon feature peculiar to the particular instrumentality which is known to the owner and with which children are not supposed to be familiar, and is independent of any fault in its construction. It is true that some hazard attends the operation and use of such a swing as the one in question, but it is not the novel and hidden danger that is regarded as so important in the turntable cases.

That the essential principle of those cases is foreign to any consideration herein we think is made plain by the decisions of the appellate courts of this state.

In the leading case of Barrett v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, the basis for the holding is indicated in this quotation:

"And it has been held in numerous cases to be an act of negligence to leave unguarded and exposed to the observation of little children dangerous and attractive machinery which they would naturally be tempted to go about or upon, and against the danger of which action their immature judgment opposes no warning or defense."

In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 598, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, the principle is declared to be limited to a particular class of cases and resting upon the ground that the immature judgment of a young child could not well determine or provide against the danger of meddling with such machinery. Furthermore, the court said:

"And the cases to which the rule has been applied, so far as our attention has been called to them, are nearly all cases where the owner of land had erected on it dangerous machinery, the consequences of meddling with which are not supposed to be comprehended by infant minds."

In the opinion by the learned chief justice denying the petition for rehearing the limitations of the doctrine are clearly set forth, and it was declared:

"As to common dangers existing in the order of nature, it is the duty of parents to guard and warn their children, and, failing to do so, they should not expect to hold others responsible for their own want of care. But, with respect to dangers specially created by the act of the owner, novel in character, attractive and dangerous to children, easily guarded and rendered safe, the rule is, as it ought to be, different, and such is the rule of the turntable cases, of the lumber pile cases, and others of a similar character."

In George v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 126 Cal. 357, 58 Pac. 819, 46 L. R. A. 829, 77 Am. St. Rep. 184, it was held that trailer cars standing upon a track when not in use, and secured in place by ordinary brakes, are not "dangerous machines" within the meaning of the rule applied in certain turntable cases. Therein the cars were secured and that circumstance distinguishes the case from Cahill v. Stone Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, wherein the car was left entirely unfastened. The unfastened car was a trap for children, but when fastened with a brake in the ordinary manner, it would be a common and familiar appliance and would put the child upon guard against the danger incident to its operation.

In Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 217, 65 Pac. 380, it is said:

"To what was there said [referring to Peters v. Bowman, supra], it may be added that the turntable might well be considered peculiarly attractive to children—a movable machine in the nature of a merry-go-round—but at the same time, the children being ignorant of the dangers and injury to which they were exposed in revolving it, the unprotected machine itself became a trap for them, and these cases may therefore be properly classed with those which hold the owner responsible for that reason."

It is furthermore said that it is not true that anything which may be found to be attractive as a playground or plaything for children "casts a responsibility of guard and care upon the owner of that thing."

In Giannini v. Compodonico, 176 Cal. 548, 169 Pac. 80, the foregoing earlier cases are reviewed, and it was held that the doctrine of the turntable cases did not apply, since a stable is not an "attractive nuisance" within the meaning of the decisions.

In Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 37 Cal. App. 624, 174 Pac. 414, the elements involved in the turntable cases are clearly pointed out, and it is held that—

"A cemetery association maintaining an unguarded reservoir alongside a driveway near an entrance to the cemetery is not liable, under the rule of the turntable cases, for the drowning of a child of the age of eight years."

In Faylor v. Great Eastern Quicksilver Mining Co. (Cal. App.) 187 Pac. 101, the deceased child fell to his death into a stope driven through the floor of the tunnel on mining property into which the child had wandered while playing with the cars in which the ore was moved, and "it was held to be a question for the determination of the jury whether the mining company was negligent in failing to close the mouth of the tunnel." Therein the conditions that exist in the turntable cases are pointed out, but emphasis is laid upon the fact that the actionable negligence grows out of the failure to adopt suitable precautions to prevent the use of the contrivance by children. In passing we may state that in the Faylor opinion the court was in error in declaring that in Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Association, supra, "the rule of turntable cases was applied to a reservoir of water in which a child was drowned, apparently because the reservoir was so concealed as to be dangerous to persons passing it." The fact is that in the Polk Case it was clearly held that said doctrine did not apply for reasons stated therein.

In considering the philosophy of the rule in those cases, it is said in some of the decisions that the owner or the one in charge of the dangerous contrivance ought reasonably to anticipate that an injury to children would occur, if the machine is not properly guarded, and therefore he must be held to have anticipated it and to be guilty of negligence if it does cause injury. The reason for the rule, and therefore the rule itself, must fail herein because the swing was not naturally dangerous to children but a safe and common apparatus with which children habitually play without injury. Hence, injury from its use in the ordinary way would not be likely to occur, and no one is under obligation to anticipate what is unlikely to happen. In this connection it will not be disputed that one who furnishes or maintains such an instrumentality is bound to anticipate and provide against only the natural and probable consequences that may result therefrom.

The question then arises whether the erroneous view of the trial judge as to the application of said doctrine resulted in prejudice to appellant. This consideration requires an examination of some of the instructions given to the jury.

[2] Defendant requested the following instruction:

"If you believe from the evidence that the appliance was made and manufactured by the Red River Lumber Company and the Red River Lumber Company knew the purpose for which it was to be used, and it was manufactured sufficiently strong for the purpose for which it was intended to be used, and while used for that purpose no injury or loss occurred, I charge you that you cannot find damage against the defendant."

The court gave the instruction, but added the following modification:

"Unless you find such appliance constituted an attraction calculated by its nature to attract or lure children of immature mind to meddle with it or otherwise interfere with or make use of it, and as a fact did so to their injury by reason of the inherent danger attendant to the setting of such appliance in motion, as otherwise instructed you herein."

[3] It may be doubted whether the jury fully understood the instruction as given. Indeed, it seems to us quite confusing and misleading. It was likely to be construed as meaning that, although the jury believed that the defendant constructed the swing sufficiently strong for the purpose for which it was designed, yet if they believed that it constituted an attractive and alluring contrivance and there was danger connected with its operation, then defendant would be liable for the injury. The truth is that, if properly constructed for the purpose for which it was intended, culpability does not attach to the defendant by reason of the fact that it was made attractive and alluring, or that inherent danger may have attended its operation. It was proper, as we have seen, for the defendant to make the swing attractive and alluring, and any inherent danger, that is, danger arising from the nature of the contrivance, is a common and familiar danger not imputing negligence to the defendant. We do not think that the instruction as proposed by defendant and thus modified should have been given.

[4] Again, defendant requested this instruction:

"If you believe from the evidence that after the appliance had been made and set up by the defendant's agent or employees, its character and use was materially changed without any knowledge of or consent of the defendant, and after its character and use was changed the accident occurred, I charge you that you cannot find against the defendant."

The court gave it, but added the following:

"Provided you find such appliance as so first constructed was, and continued to be, not inherently dangerous, or was not, or did not continue to be an appliance attractive to children of immature mind and calculated to attract them to meddle with, interfere with it, or otherwise set it in motion to their injury by reason of the inherent danger attendant to the setting of such contrivance in motion."

As proposed, it may be admitted that the statement was somewhat inaccurate, but the natural effect of the instruction as given would result in this impression that, although the jury believed that the accident was directly and proximately due to the act of third persons who changed the character and use of the swing without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, yet they must find for the plaintiff if they believed it was originally an attractive and alluring contrivance inherently dangerous. In other words, the probabilities are that the jury would understand from the instruction that, although they might be satisfied that the injury was caused by the intervention of a separate and independent agency, yet they were at liberty to apply the rule of the turntable cases, and so might find for plaintiff. The trial court probably did not intend this result, but the peculiar language used makes the instruction susceptible to such criticism.

[5] A similar addition was made to this proposed instruction:

"If you find from the evidence that after the appliance was set up and had been used in accordance with the purpose for which it was constructed, and it was so changed that an additional burden and weight was put thereon and that the additional burden and weight caused the breakage, and you further find from the evidence that the change was made without any knowledge or consent of the defendant, then I charge you that your verdict must be for the defendant."

There was evidence to support the theory therein contained, and we can see no legal objection to the instruction as proposed, and we think it ought to have been given without adding a recital of the inappropriate and inapplicable doctrine.

[6] Another contention of appellant is that there is no evidence that the swing was negligently constructed. In this connection we recall that respondent relied only upon the claim that the tree was unsound and therefore unsafe, and that appellant was charged with knowledge of its condition. The burden of proof was upon plaintiff to support this claim, and, of course, the defect must have related to the time when the swing was constructed. Defendant would not be liable in consequence of any unsoundness that may have developed after the swing had been used since it was under the care and control of the school authorities. But plaintiff offered no evidence as to the time when it was constructed or as to the condition of the tree when the swing was placed upon it. His witnesses apparently never saw the tree before the accident or ever examined it before it broke. For example, Paul Tessoroff testified:

"I recall the occasion of the little Solomon boy getting killed. I was present about ten minutes afterwards. I saw the appliance on which the children were playing at the time. The appliance was in the first place a rotten tree. * * * I examined the stump when I went there about five minutes after the child was hurt. * * * It was not rotten, but it was old and kind of—it wasn't like a young tree; a young tree is full of life, but this tree was dried out like. * * * At the time I saw it, I am not able to say whether or not the tree had been dead for some time. I can't say exactly how long it had been dead. It did not have the appearance of having recently died. It had the appearance as if that wheel had been on the tree a long time and it had in that time decayed or dried out."

There is evidence that the swing had been in use since October of the preceding year, but how much longer does not appear. Evidence that the tree had dried out a year or longer after the swing had been constructed would not be sufficient to support the contention that it was defective at the time the plaything was installed.

In Ferraris, Adm'r, etc., v. Kyle, 19 Nev. 435, 14 Pac. 529, it was said:

"The district court correctly considered that a knowledge of the condition of a brush fence at the time of trial was not a fact from which the jury could infer its condition 29 months before."

[7] Nor could such evidence be regarded as sufficient to disclose the negligence of defendant upon the theory that there was a continuing obligation upon its part to keep the swing in a safe condition. This duty devolved upon the school district, its officers and teachers, under the general mandate to maintain, supervise, and repair public school buildings and premises. After the swing was put in place through the order of the school board, it was at all times under its care and control. The duty belonged to the school authorities to keep the apparatus in repair and to supervise the play and conduct of the children on the school premises. They are charged with knowledge of what takes place thereon, and if through use or the flight of time, the stump or any other portion of the contrivance deteriorated and became unsafe and thereby the accident happened, defendant could not be held responsible.

In Bruenn v. North Yakima School District, 101 Wash. 374, 172 Pac. 569, some of the boys removed a teeter board and placed it across a swing, using it as a combined teeter swing. When the school bell rang, the boys jumped off the board, one end struck the plaintiff's ankle and severely injured him. The court held that the school district and the teachers were negligent in permitting the boys to take the board and place it upon the swing. The court said:

"If the teacher knew it, it was negligence to permit it; and, if she did not know it, it was negligence not to have observed it."

In Kelley v. School District No. 71, 102 Wash. 343, 173 Pac. 333, a child was injured by the breaking of a swing which was suspended from an iron ring which passed through the eye of a staple. When the ring wore sufficiently thin, it broke. It was held that the negligence of the school district in failing to inspect the apparatus and keep it in repair was the proximate cause of the injury.

Other cases along the same line cited by appellant are the following: Redfield v. School District No. 3, 48 Wash. 85, 92 Pac. 770; Howard v. Tacoma School District No. 10, 88 Wash. 167, 152 Pac. 1004, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 792; McCarton v. New York, 149 App. Div. 516, 133 N. Y. S. 939; Ching v.

Surrey County Council, 102 L. T. R. N. S. (Eng.) 414; Morris v. Carnarvon County Council, 102 L. T. R. N. S. (Eng.) 524, 1 K. B. 840.

[8] Another serious question is presented by the contention of appellant that the injury was proximately caused by the intervening act of a third party. The principle of law involved in this claim is, of course, well settled; the only difficulty is in its application to the peculiar facts of the case. It is the position of appellant that the proximate cause of the injury was the intervening act of the third party who attached the boards to the swing and thereby broke the line of causation from any negligence of defendant in the original installation of the contrivance. Among the cases cited is Schwartz v. Cal. G. & E. Corporation, 163 Cal. 398, 125 Pac. 1044. Therein one of defendant's servants dropped on the land of plaintiff an insulator from the defendant's power line. The suit was brought for injury to plaintiff's horse caused by his stepping on the insulator so dropped. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that the defendant was not liable unless the evidence showed:

"That the employees of defendant negligently placed said insulator on the premises where it is claimed said horse was injured, and at the point where the evidence shows said horse was in fact injured."

The instruction was modified so as to read:

"That the employees of defendant negligently placed or permitted said insulator to remain on the premises where it is claimed said horse was injured, and at a point where the evidence shows some injury might result."

The Supreme Court held this to be prejudicial error, saying:

"It seems plain that if appellants carelessly dropped the insulator upon the premises and did not remove it they would be guilty of negligence, but after it was dropped if somebody else picked it up and moved it to this spot where the damage was done, it was the negligence of the latter that proximately caused the injury. It would not be a case of correlative and concurring causes, but of proximate and remote agencies independent of each other."

Other interesting and instructive cases cited by appellant are: Pittsburg Reduction Co. v. Horton, 87 Ark. 576, 113 S. W. 647, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 905; Carter v. Towne, 103 Mass 507; Cole v. German Savings & Loan Socy., 124 Fed. 113, 59 C. C. A. 593, 63 L. R. A. 416; Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co., 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L. R. A. 97; Claypool v. Wigmore, 34 Ind. App. 35, 71 N. E. 509; Dolan v. Callender et al., 26 R. I. 198, 58 Atl. 655; Marsh v. Giles, 211 Pa. 17, 60 Atl. 315; Saverio-Cella v. Brooklyn Union Elevated R. R. Co., 55 App. Div. 98, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1021; Fishburn v. Burlington, etc., Ry. Co. (Iowa) 93 N. W. 380.

Respondent also cites a line of authorities which he claims upholds him in the contention that the case is not one of intervening independent agency, among which we may specifically notice only the two California decisions. Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87, and Merrill v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 Pac. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134. It is apparent in these cases that the original negligence was operative until the accident and was a contributing cause thereto. Its effect was not broken or disturbed by the intervention of the other cause but was simply accelerated or augmented thereby. In the Pastene Case the lumber remained in the same negligent condition in which it was piled by the defendant and the one who drove against it was guilty of a concurring and contributing act of negligence. If, after the defendant had negligently piled the lumber, some one had changed it and thereby made it dangerous, and the injury had thereafter occurred, would not the causal connection with the original negligence have been destroyed? Fowles v. Briggs, 116 Mich. 425, 74 N. W. 1046, 40 L. R. A. 528, 72 Am. St. Rep. 537.

If in the Merrill Case the pipe had been defectively constructed, but the leak had been caused by the act of a third party in tampering with it, the gas company would hardly be liable for the injury unless it had an opportunity to repair it. Luehrmann v. Laclede Gas Light Co., 127 Mo. App. 213, 104 S. W. 1128.

Herein we must remember that, when the swing was placed in position there were six ropes attached to it, some time thereafter three of these were removed and for a long time with the remaining three ropes the children swung around from day to day without any accident. Then came the vital change in the structure produced without any participation on the part of appellant and the injury immediately followed.

It seems clear that in consequence of this intervening act appellant was relieved of liability for any negligence in the construction of the swing, unless it can be said that the danger was not increased by the addition of the boards and the change in the manner of using the swing, or that this deviation from the original method should have been reasonably anticipated by appellant.

As to the increased burden and strain thereby imposed upon the stump of the tree, there can hardly be any question—not only was it subjected to a greater weight than when used as before, but by reason of the weight's immobility and unequal distribution it greatly added to the tension. It cannot be said that the change was unimportant or that the break would have occurred if the children had used the swing as it had been used for some time.

[9] As to the remaining consideration, the rule admittedly is that appellant was required to foresee and make preparation for the natural and probable consequences of the installation of the swing, in other words, what a reasonable person would be supposed to anticipate in reference to its use. Is it a proper application of this principle to hold that notwithstanding the swing was constructed, as we have seen, with ropes, appellant should have foreseen that planks would be attached thereto and the additional burden thereby imposed? Manifestly, there is no certain test for the determination of this question and it is doubtful whether much aid is furnished by the adjudicated cases. Appellant, however, claims that many analogous cases hold that a party cannot be held to anticipate such a contingency. Among these, in the Marsh Case, supra, the defendant left a stone three feet long, six inches wide, and three inches thick leaning against an electric pole in a street. Two boys attempted to ignite the light on the top by jarring the pole in pulling the top of the stone a few inches back and letting it fall against the pole. In doing so one of the boys injured his finger. It was held that the injury "was the immediate consequence, not of the position of the stone as placed by the defendants, but of the independent, intervening act of the plaintiff's companion in making a use of the stone not reasonably to have been foreseen." The court further declared that "plaintiff's injury could not reasonably have been contemplated as a result of the defendant's act in placing the stone on the footway."

In the Saverio-Cella Case, supra, defendant left a windlass standing in the street with the drum and cogs tied with a rope so that they could not be revolved. Boys cut the rope and placed another around the drum and by pulling it caused the drum and cogs to revolve, thereby injuring another child who had climbed on the windlass and had his foot caught in the cogs. It was held that the defendant was not negligent, since it left the windlass safe, and that it could not be reasonably anticipated that the rope would be cut and another placed on the drum; it being said in the opinion:

"I think that a man of reasonable prudence and care, under the circumstances of this case, might not reasonably have expected that the rope might be cut, and the machine might thereupon be completed by a new drum rope, and that thereupon the drum rope might be manned and tugged upon by a gang of lads so that the wheels might be put in motion, and that thereupon at such a time a lad playing in the street might so clamber upon the machine as to come in contact with the revolving cogs; and so the law frees the defendant."

[10] But if it should be thought that herein defendant should have anticipated that the natural curiosity and venturesome disposition of the immature mind might prompt the children to so change the apparatus, it could hardly be supposed and foreseen that any person of mature judgment would so recklessly convert it into a dangerous instrumentality. Herein it may be said that one of the children testified that the boards were put upon the swing by the teacher. This answer was stricken out on the ground that the answer had alleged that this was done by the children. Thereupon appellant asked permission to amend the answer, by substituting "some person" for "pupils attending said public school," stating that it had not discovered until two days before that the change was made by the teacher instead of by the boys. The court denied the motion. The general rule is that an amendment of pleadings should be allowed at any stage of the trial when it is necessary for the purpose of justice. Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 630, 30 Pac. 786. As stated in the Guidery Case:

"If, by reason of such amendments, the court was satisfied that the plaintiff was taken by surprise, and required further time in which to make suitable preparations for meeting such defense, it could have continued the case or postpone the further hearing until the plaintiff should have reasonable time to make such preparation, and at the same time would impose upon the defendant such terms as would compensate the plaintiff for the expense and delay caused thereby."

It is seldom that a court is justified in denying a party the privilege of amending his pleading so that he may properly present his case, and obviate an objection that the fact sought to be proven is not embraced within the issues made by the pleadings. Marr v. Rhodes, 131 Cal. 267, 63 Pac. 364.

We can perceive no good reason why the amendment should not have been allowed so as to permit the real situation to be developed by the evidence.

Under well-established principles, we are satisfied the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. MANDEVIL et al. (Cr. 858.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1922.)

Homicide §234(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for assault with deadly weapon with intent to murder.

Where, in a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder, the evidence was ample to establish identity of both accused and that they both participated in the assault, as opposed to testimony supporting the defense of an alibi, held sufficient to support a verdict of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Alferdo Mandevil and another were convicted of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Albert D. Trujillo, of San Bernardino, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendants were convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder. They have appealed from the judgment of imprisonment.

The sole contention urged in the brief of appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment. At the trial both defendants insisted that they did not commit the assault; that they were not, at the time at or near the place referred to in the information and testimony. The complainant was the marshal of the city of Colton. He testified that on the 14th day of July, 1921, at about 6 o'clock in the afternoon, he went to a point where a bridge crosses the Santa Ana river, and there observed an automobile and a man standing near to it, and also a quantity of new shoes in the brush close at hand; that he alighted from the automobile in which he was riding, went over to the other machine in which the man he had observed was, by this time, seated, and talked to the latter; that he (the marshal) wore his badge of office in plain sight; that after some preliminary conversation he asked the man what he was doing with the shoes and that thereupon the individual in the car produced a "gun" and began to fire at him; that the first shot was fired when the marshal was about three feet away from the person mentioned and that about nine shots in all were fired at him; that before the firing ceased he had taken refuge behind a telegraph pole and that he fired from that point of vantage until he had emptied his gun, after which he went to a neighbor's and procured an old rifle. In the meantime a second individual had joined the first in the automobile and the tires of the officer's machine had been punctured and the two men were driving away. The marshal discharged several shots from the rifle, but the men made their escape. Notwithstanding the great number of shots fired, it was a bloodless battle. These defendants were arrested at different places a considerable time after the commission of the alleged offense and in counties other than San Bernardino. There was ample evidence to establish the identity of both defendants and to show that both participated in the assault upon the officer. Aside from the individual who fired the shots from the automobile (Martinez), the second defendant named was observed by another witness, who testified that Mandevil was concealed in the brush close at hand; that he had a revolver; and that he fired it at the officer. The marshal did not observe Mandevil, but he did not state that all of the shots fired at him proceeded from Martinez's weapon. There was, to be sure, unequivocal testimony supporting the defense of an alibi, but the facts were for the jury to resolve. There was substantial evidence to support the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Insurance Ⓔ332¼, New, vol. 14 Key-No. Series—Employer's agreement, as part of compensation policy, that no person below legal age would be employed, held a "warranty."

Employer's agreement, constituting a part of workmen's compensation policy, that no person was or would be employed in violation of law as to age, held a warranty in view of Civ. Code, § 2608, since employment of person under legal age materially affected the risk.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Warranty.]

2. Insurance Ⓔ437—Insurer relieved of obligation to defend employer against claim for compensation by employer's breach of warranty not to employ persons under legal age.

Illegal employment of boy, in violation of warranty constituting part of compensation policy, held to relieve insurer of the obligation imposed upon it by policy of defending the employer, in proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation for injury to the boy.

3. Insurance ~~388~~(5) — Employer's insurer held not estopped to deny liability for expenses incurred by employer in workmen's compensation proceeding.

Where insurer promptly repudiated any liability for compensation to insured's employee, and refused to defend insured in employee's proceeding for compensation, it was not estopped to deny liability for expenses incurred by insured in such proceeding, by appearing therein solely to protect its own interests.

4. Insurance ~~601~~ — Insurer required to pay compensation to one employed under legal age, in violation of warranty, could recover amount thereof from insured.

Where compensation policy contained warranty that employer would not employ persons under the legal age and that no default of the employer should affect the right of employees to recover from the insurer, the insurer could recover from the employer compensation it was required to pay injured employee who was under legal age.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by E. C. Gise against the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, a corporation. From judgment rendered, both parties appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Amend & Amend, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted by the plaintiff, an employer, to recover of the defendant, his insurance carrier, the sum of $521, expended by him in resisting a claim made against defendant and himself, by an injured employee, upon the refusal of the defendant plaintiff's interests in a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission. In addition to a general and specific denial, the defendant interposed a counterclaim for the sum of $1,590.21, the amount of the award made by the Commission, and paid to the injured employee by the defendant. The court denied relief to the plaintiff, and refused judgment to the defendant on its counterclaim, leaving the parties in the same situation as they were before the action was commenced. Thereupon both the plaintiff and the defendant perfected appeals. The matter is presented to this court by stipulation, upon one transcript and one set of briefs. Since both the parties are appellants and likewise respondents, we shall, for the sake of clarity, refer to them by their original designation as plaintiff and defendant. Plaintiff claims that the lower court erred in refusing to give judgment in his favor, for the sum expended in defending himself before the Industrial Accident Commission. Defendant's contention is that this ruling of the lower court was correct, but that the court erred in refusing to give it judgment against the plaintiff for the amount paid to the injured employee.

Both parties base their claim upon the terms of a California workmen's compensation policy, issued by the defendant and designed to cover the workmen employed by the plaintiff in a butcher shop operated by him. The policy contains the usual stipulations as to the liability and duty of the insurance carrier. The defendant agrees, among other things, to defend, in the name and on behalf of the plaintiff, any suits or other proceedings instituted against him under the provisions of the compensation law, and covered by the insurance agreement. Another provision in the policy, styled "Condition M," provides that the plaintiff, by his acceptance declared certain statements, indorsed thereon and numbered 1 to 17, inclusive, to be true. One of these declarations (item 14) is to the effect that no person was or would be employed by the assured in violation of law as to age. It is further stipulated, in said condition, that the policy is issued in consideration of these statements, and the provisions of the policy, as respects its premium and the payment thereof. The same clause provides, however, that—

"Nothing in this condition (M) and no default on the part of the assured with respect to any of the provisions or conditions of the policy, shall in any way affect the right of any employee, or his dependents, to recover from the company the compensation provided for by law and intended to be insured hereunder."

In plain disregard of the agreement on his part, not to employ any person in violation of the law as to age, the plaintiff employed Wesley Clark, a minor, not yet 15 years of age, who, while engaged in operating a meat grinding machine in plaintiff's shop, suffered an injury which resulted in the loss of the fingers of one hand. Thereafter the injured employee filed an application for compensation before the Industrial Accident Commission, against both the plaintiff, Gise, and the defendant, insurance company. The defendant refused to defend the proceedings before the Commission in behalf of the plaintiff, upon the ground that the plaintiff had breached the policy of insurance by employing Wesley Clark, in violation of the law as to age. The plaintiff thereupon expended, in his own behalf, the sum of $521 for counsel fees and costs, which sum the lower court finds to be a reasonable amount to have been paid for such purposes. The insurance company defended, the proceeding on its own behalf, not only upon all grounds of defense urged by plaintiff Gise, before the Commission, but also sought to evade liability for compensation to Wesley Clark, because of the violation of the declaration or warranty in the policy by the plaintiff to the effect that no person would be employed by him in violation of the law as to age, and upon the further ground that the injured employee was not covered by the policy. The Industrial Accident Commission held that the plain terms of the proviso in the policy, contained in said condition M, voided any contradictory provisions contained in the warranty as to employment of any one by the plaintiff in violation of the law as to age, in so far as any employee was concerned, and rendered the defendant liable for the payment of compensation to any such injured servant of Gise. Clark v. Gise et al., 5 Dec. of Ind. Ac. Com. 219. The Commission, therefore, dismissed the plaintiff from the proceeding, and made an award in favor of Clark and against the defendant in the sum of $1,590.21, for compensation and doctor's bills. The defendant made an application for a writ of review, for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the order making the award inquired into and determined. This court held that the Industrial Accident Commission correctly construed the policy of insurance, and denied the application. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Ind. Ac. Com'n, 178 Pac. 896. Defendant thereupon paid the amount of the award to the injured employee. When the plaintiff sought to recover the amount expended by him in defending against the claim of the injured employee, it interposed a counterclaim for the amount of the award paid by it.

[1, 2] The trial court found, and the finding is amply supported by the evidence, that, by reason of the employment of Wesley Clark by the plaintiff, and because of the boy's age, the manner and place of his employment, and the nature of his work, coupled with the failure to obtain for him from the superintendent of schools a permit to work, the plaintiff breached the contract or policy of insurance. Consequently, it held, and correctly so, that the defendant was released from the obligation to defend the plaintiff in the proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission. In that behalf, we adopt the portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, material to the appeal prosecuted by the plaintiff:

"A statement in a policy, which imports that it is intended to do or not to do a thing which materially affects the risk, is a warranty that such act or omission shall take place." Civ. Code, § 2608. Under this language it would seem that the terms of item 14 amounted clearly to a warranty. The item imported that plaintiff intended not to do a thing; that is, employ a person in violation of law as to age, and the thing he intended not to do, if done, would materially affect the risk, for immaturity of years is accompanied by immaturity of judgment, and lack of judgment in an employee will always affect the risks of his employment and, therefore, the risk insured against by such a policy as the one now in question. It is to be remembered, also, that, according to the provisions of condition M, the policy was issued in consideration of plaintiff's declaration of the truth of the statements made in items one to seventeen. In addition to the section of the Code the terms of which are above set forth, the fact that item 14 carried a warranty into the policy is established by several decided cases (McKenzie v. Scottish U. & N. Ins. Co., 112 Cal. 548, 44 Pac. 922; Porter v. Gen. Acc. Assur. Corp'n, 30 Cal. App. 198, 157 Pac. 825), although the decision last cited is based upon a section of the Civil Code (2607) concerning statements of existing facts, as distinguished from statements of things to be done or omitted. Also, it is plain from cases cited by plaintiff himself that, after the illegal employment of Clark, and but for the exception contained in condition M, the policy would have been ineffective with respect to any considerations arising from the injury to Clark, including, of course, any claim attempted to be made under its terms by him; this because of the inclusion of item 14 in the instrument. Louis F. Kleeman Co. v. New Amsterdam Cas. Co., 177 Mo. App. 397, 164 S. W. 167; Mason-Henry Press v. Aetna L. Ins. Co., 211 N. Y. 489, 105 N. E. 826; Maryland Cas. Co. v. Ind. Ac. Com'n, 179 Cal. 716, 178 Pac. 858. We have to consider, therefore, nothing but the meaning of the exception. It seems plain to us, beyond the necessity of construction. It saved to Clark (the injured employee) the right 'to recover from the company the compensation provided for by law and intended to be insured' under the policy; but, considering what we have said above, it saved nothing else. Upon plaintiff's violation of the law in the employment of Clark, the policy at once became ineffective as indemnity for any expense or outlay arising through any injury to Clark, save that covered by the exception. The plaintiff was not entitled to recover."

[3] When the injured employee made his demand for compensation, the defendant promptly repudiated any liability under the policy, and refused to defend plaintiff in the proceeding instituted before the Industrial Accident Commission. It in no way controlled or sought to direct his action, but confined its efforts solely to a protection of its interests. It was not thereby estopped to deny any liability for the expenses incurred by plaintiff in making his affirmative defense before the commission. Mt. Vernon, etc., Co. v. Frankfort, etc., Ins. Co., 111 Md. 561, 75 Atl. 105, 134 Am. St. Rep. 636; Mason-Henry Press v. Aetna L. Ins. Co., 211 N. Y. 489, 105 N. E. 826; Sargent Mfg. Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 165 Mich. 87, 130 N. W. 211, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 491.

While the foregoing authorities, and those cited in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, clearly deny to the employer the right to recover from the insurance carrier in cases like this, and that is so, even though the injury was not the proximate result of the illegal employment (Goodwillie v. London Guarantee, etc., Co., 108 Wis. 207, 84 N. W.

164) we have been cited to, and have found, no case involving the question presented by the counter action of the defendant, to recover the amount it paid to the injured employee under the award of the Industrial Accident Commission. In none of those cases was consideration given to the effect of a provision, such as that contained in condition M of the policy here, on the reciprocal rights of the parties under such circumstances. The trial court decided that as, by reason of the terms and provisions of such condition, the injured boy, although employed in violation of the law as to age, was covered and protected by the policy, the defendant was legally held and obligated to pay the amount of the award, and could not recover any part of the sum from plaintiff. The District Court of Appeal held that, as the policy provided, by the exception in condition M, that the injured employee should "recover" compensation from defendant, despite the fact that he was illegally employed, if the plaintiff should be required to reimburse defendant, the "recovery" would not be from the defendant but from the plaintiff. We are unable to agree with either of these positions. The latter court was correct in its interpretation of the policy when, in dealing with the effort of the plaintiff to recoup his costs, it said that the provision of condition M was one for the benefit of the employee, and was not intended to protect the employer from the consequence of his own breach of the insurance compact. The effect of that stipulation was not, as urgently contended for by the plaintiff, to read out of the policy the warranty, on the part of plaintiff, that he would not employ any person in violation of law as to age, which was one of the covenants, and a material part of the consideration on which the policy was issued. As we understand its decision (supra), the Industrial Accident Commission held that condition M voided any contradictory provision contained in the policy, only so far as the employee was concerned, and the opinion of this court on denying the writ of review (supra) goes no farther. Notwithstanding the right reserved to the employee to recover from the insurance carrier in case of injury, which was assented to by the defendant when it issued the policy containing the proviso, the basic contract between plaintiff and defendant was unaffected thereby. The employment of the boy, Clark, by plaintiff in violation of the child labor law, was illegal, and, as between the plaintiff and defendant, was not included in the policy of insurance. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com'n, supra; Mt. Vernon, etc., Co. v. Frankfort, etc., Ins. Co., supra. In some of the cases we have examined, in looking for precedent applicable to the facts here, it has been suggested that a contract to insure one against injury, arising out of employment in violation of law, would be against public policy, and therefore void, but we deem it unnecessary to pursue that phase of the matter any farther.

[4] It seems only reasonable to hold, and, in the absence of authority to the contrary, we are of the opinion, that, when the plaintiff, in plain disregard of the terms of the policy of insurance, employed Clark, in violation of the law as to age, the defendant, not having in any way consented thereto, and, not being estopped to deny its liability in the matter in so far as the plaintiff was concerned, a burden was cast upon defendant which it would not have had to assume but for the unwarranted and illegal act of the plaintiff. It was not contemplated by the parties to the contract that such a situation would arise. On the contrary, it was expressly stipulated against. It seems only reasonable to hold, therefore, that the facts presented by the appeal of the defendant call for the application of the simple rule of law that one party to a contract, who is caused to suffer loss by reason of the violation of its terms by the other party thereto, may recover from the one at fault the amount he has been damaged thereby.

It is conceded that the defendant paid the amount of the liability covered by the policy as aforesaid and, on account of the injury to said employee, Wesley Clark, the aforesaid sum of $1,590.21. There is no dispute about the fact. Under these circumstances there is no necessity for a new trial. The rights of the parties can be fully adjusted by directing a judgment in accordance with our conclusions aforesaid.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded, with directions to the lower court, upon the going down of the remittitur, to forthwith enter a judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendant recover of the plaintiff the sum of $1,590.21, together with costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David S. Johnston, also known as D. S. Johnston, deceased. From a judgment, refusing admission of alleged olographic will to probate and dismissing petition for probate thereof, Margaret Matilda Mesmer appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. Carter, of Los Angeles, (Flint & Mackay and Wm. A. Brown, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, Marshall Stimson, and Noel C. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, sitting in probate, adjudging and decreeing that a certain olographic will of David S. Johnston, deceased, offered for probate on behalf of the appellant as the beneficiary thereunder, is not the last will and testament of said decedent, and dismissing the petition for the probate of the same.

David S. Johnston died in the county of Los Angeles on or about the 18th day of November, 1919, leaving real and personal estate therein of an amount in excess of $10,000 in value. He was unmarried, but left as his heirs at law a brother, Arthur Charles Johnston, and certain children of a deceased brother. Thereafter, and on or about April 9, 1919, letters of administration on the estate of said deceased were granted and issued to said Arthur Charles Johnston, upon his petition therefor, showing that no will of the decedent had been found. Thereafter, and on or about May 27, 1920, Margaret Matilda Mesmer filed a petition in the matter of said estate for the probate of an alleged olographic will of said decedent, bearing the date of March 23, 1917, and found among the effects of said deceased on or about May 10, 1920, and in which alleged will she was named as the sole beneficiary. To this petition Arthur Charles Johnston filed a contest upon two main grounds: First, that the document for which probate was sought was not a will, and that it did not purport to transfer, will, or dispose of any of the decedent's property to any person whatever; that it was not wholly or at all in the handwriting of said decedent; and that said decedent had not subscribed his name thereto as and for his last will and testament, or as and for any testamentary or other purpose whatever or at all. Second, that said document was not the last will and testament of said decedent for the reason that said deceased did, on or about April 25, 1918, make and execute a document as and for his last will and testament in the presence of, and which was duly attested by, two witnesses, wherein and whereby he directed the disposition of his estate in accordance with the laws of the state of California, and also wherein and whereby he expressly revoked all former wills made by him.

The contestant did not offer said will for probate, relying solely upon the revocatory clause thereof as the foundation for this latter ground of objection to the probate of said purported olographic will. To this contest an answer was filed by Margaret Matilda Mesmer, wherein all of its allegations were specifically denied, and wherein the purported olographic will was again asserted to be the last will and testament of said decedent. This contest came on for hearing before the court, and considerable evidence pro and con was presented thereon, and, the matter having been submitted, the court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court did not assume in these to deal with the first ground of opposition presented by Arthur Charles Johnston assailing the testamentary character or due execution of the said purported olographic will, but, in its said findings, dealt exclusively with the question as to whether or not the decedent made and executed the alleged later will bearing the date of April 25, 1918, and containing the clause revoking all former wills. In that behalf, the court found that the decedent, being of sound and disposing mind, did, on said last-named date, make and sign a will, the full text of which is set forth in said findings; that said will was, on the date thereof, signed, sealed, and published as, and declared by him to be his last will and testament, in the presence of two witnesses, Ethel L. Lich and William T. Blakely, each residing in said county of Los Angeles, who, at his request and in his presence and in the presence of each other, subscribed their names as witnesses thereto. The court further found that, although all reasonable and possible effort had been made to find said last will and testament of said decedent bearing said date, the said document could not be found. The court further found that, by said document, the said decedent did expressly revoke all former wills by him made. As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact, the court found that the document offered for probate by said Margaret Matilda Mesmer was not the last will and testament of said decedent, and hence that the petition of said Margaret Matilda Mesmer for the probate thereof should be dismissed. Judgment was entered accordingly, and it is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken.

The question as to whether or not the alleged olographic will of the decedent is in form a valid will is discussed by respective counsel in their briefs upon this subject. The trial court made no express finding upon that subject, and we do not deem it necessary to pass upon it nor to present or discuss the form, the changes in, or the final substance or effect of, said document for reasons which will hereafter appear. The sole question which requires discussion and determination herein is as to whether the evidence in the case is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that the decedent, David S. Johnston, did, on the 25th day of April, 1918, make and execute the will bearing that date and containing the express revoking clause which, according to the finding of the court, was effective to work the revocation of former wills by him made.

On the threshold of this discussion there are certain preliminary matters to be considered and disposed of. First of these is the fact that the contestant of the probate of the so-called olographic will of May 23, 1917, has not offered the document purporting to be the will of April 25, 1918, for probate as the decedent's last will and testament, but has based his contest of the olographic will upon the existence and effect of the revoking clause in the later document.

[1] The next consideration is that the uncontradicted evidence in the case shows that said later document bearing the date of April 25, 1918, and purporting to be the said decedent's last will and testament, was, when last seen or known to exist, in the possession of the decedent. The uncontradicted evidence also shows, and the court finds, "that all reasonable and possible effort has been made to find said last-named will and testament * * * but that said document cannot be found." From the foregoing facts and finding, the presumption arises that the will, last seen and known to have been in the possession of the decedent and which cannot be found after his death, has been destroyed by him with the intention of revoking it. Estate of Sweetman (Cal.) 195 Pac. 918; 14 Ency. of Evidence, 440; Matter of Cunnion's Will, 201 N. Y. 123, 94 N. E. 648, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 834; In re Keene's Estate, 189 Mich. 97, 155 N. W. 514, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 367; In re Miller's Will, 49 Or. 452, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1051, 14 Ann. Cas. 277, 90 Pac. 1002; Van Dyke v. Mack, 139 Ark. 524, 214 S. W. 23; Rape v. Cochran (Tex. Civ. App.) 217 S. W. 250; In re Wear's Will, 131 App. Div. 875, 116 N. Y. Supp. 304.

[2] We are thus brought by the undisputed proofs in the case, by the findings of the court, and by the operation of the foregoing presumption, to the conclusion that the purported last will and testament of the decedent, dated April 25, 1918, is to be treated as a document which was revoked by the decedent during his lifetime by its destruction by him animo revocandi. This being determined, the immediate question which is next presented is as to the effect of such revocation upon the express clause therein revoking all former wills. As to this question but little discussion is required since it is settled by the provisions of the sections of the Civil Code relating to the matter of the revocation of wills. Section 1292 of the Civil Code provides that:

(1292) "Except in the cases in this chapter mentioned, no written will, nor any part thereof, can be revoked or altered otherwise than (1) by a written will or other writing of the testator, declaring such revocation or alteration, and executed with the same formalities with which a will should be executed by such testator."

Section 1296 of the Civil Code provides:

(1296) "A prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will, unless the latter contains an express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will."

Section 1297 of the Civil Code provides:

(1297) "If, after making a will, the testator duly makes and executes a second will, the destruction, cancellation, or revocation of such second will does not revive the first will, unless it appears by the terms of such revocation that it was the intention to revive and give effect to the first will, or unless, after such destruction, cancellation, or revocation, the first will is duly republished."

This court has recently construed these sections of the Civil Code to mean that a former will is revoked by a later will containing an express revoking clause, and is not revived by the revocation of such later will unless it appears by the terms of such revocation of such later will that it was the testator's intention to revive and give effect to the first will. Estate of Thompson (Cal. Sup.) 198 Pac. 795. We are thus brought to the precise controversy in the present case. Upon the trial of the contest herein, the contestant offered as a witness, to prove the due execution of the purported will of the decedent, dated April 25, 1918, one William T. Blakely, an attorney, who testified, in substance, that, on said April 25, 1918, he had drawn, at the request of David S. Johnston, the document purporting to be his last will of said date, and that said David S. Johnston had thereupon signed, sealed, published, and declared the same to be his last will and testament in the presence of said Blakely and of one Ethel L. Lich, who, at his request and in his presence and in the presence of each other, subscribed their names as witnesses thereto. The said witness also testified that he had retained a carbon copy of said document, from which he had later made other copies thereof, which he had sent to certain relatives of the deceased. The original carbon copy he testified that he had retained in his office for a time, but that it had been stolen out of his office, but that he was able to identify one of the copies thereof from which he was able to state the precise terms of the original document and which, upon his identification as a copy thereof, was admitted in evidence. The contestant did not, however, produce or offer as a witness Ethel L. Lich, the other subscribing witness to said document. The reason for this sufficiently appears from other evidence in the case, showing that said Ethel L. Lich had no recollection of having witnessed the alleged execution of said document or of having signed her name as a subscribing witness thereto.

[3] Upon this state of the record, the question at issue arises, the appellant insisting that, in order to give effect to the revoking clause in the decedent's purported will dated April 25, 1918, it was necessary to prove the due execution of said document by two witnesses, and that, this not having been done, the evidence was sufficient to justify the finding that said instrument was duly executed by the decedent as and for his last will and testament so as to give effect to its revoking clause as working the revocation of his former olographic will. This question has, however, been recently set at rest by the decision of this court in the case of the Estate of Thompson, supra, for, while in that case the court was divided upon the question as to whether evidence less than that required under section 1339 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the proof of a lost or destroyed, but unrevoked, will, namely, that "of two credible witnesses" could be permitted to establish and give effect to a revoking clause in such will, the court was in agreement in holding that the due execution of a will, which was either proved or presumed to have been destroyed animo revocandi, might be proved so as to give effect to its revoking clause by one witness, or, in other words, by the same amount and quality of evidence generally required and held sufficient for the proof of any fact under section 1844 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the prevailing opinion of the court in Estate of Thompson, supra, Mr. Justice Wilbur thus stated the rule:

"If the will of 1916 had been revoked by cancellation or otherwise the evidence of one witness to the contents of the will of 1916 would be sufficient to establish that it contained a revoking clause; for section 1297, Civil Code, declares that the revocation of a revoking will does not revive the first will 'unless it appears by the terms of such revocation that it was the intention to revive and give effect to the first will.' No doubt can be entertained that, where the second testamentary act is revoked, evidence of the contents of the revoked will may be considered to determine the effect of such revocation upon an earlier will still in existence."

In the dissenting opinion in the same case, Mr. Justice Olney states:

"The leading opinion admits that, if the will containing the revocation clause is in turn revoked, the revocation is yet effective, the instrument cannot be probated, and, if destroyed, two witnesses as to its contents are not required for the purpose of proving the revocation."

The same learned justice cites, as supporting this rule, the case of In re Wear's Will, 131 App. Div. 875, 116 N. Y. Supp. 304, which interprets sections 2621 and 1865 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure (from which sections 1292 et seq. of our Civil Code were taken), relating to the character of proof required to entitle a lost will to probate, as distinguished from that required to prove the existence of such later will for the purpose of giving effect to its revoking clause. This case is so nearly identical as to its facts with the case at bar that we deem the following excerpt from it profitable:

"The objection urged, on this appeal from the decree of the surrogate refusing probate to the first will, is that the proof offered and received of the execution of the second will is inadequate. The appellant contends that the proof must be of the character required by sections 2621 and 1865 of the Code of Civil Procedure, entitling a lost will to probate. The requirement of this section is that the provisions of such lost will must be established 'by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness.' We are of the opinion that this contention cannot be sustained. It is one thing to admit to probate a will disposing of a man's estate where the will cannot be found, and quite another thing to merely establish that a second will, revoking a former will, has been duly made and executed and left in the possession of the decedent. In the one case, we are assuming to dispose of property in a manner different from that prescribed by law in the absence of a will, while in the latter case we are merely permitting the property to descend in the manner which the law designates. In the case now under consideration the execution and delivery of the will to the decedent was proved by Mr. Eckstein, who drew both wills, and who was a subscribing witness in both of them. He would have been entirely competent to have proved the execution of the will, if it had been found, the remaining subscribing witness being dead; and he was equally competent to prove the execution and delivery of the will to the decedent, not for the purpose of establishing a lost will, but to show that the will offered for probate was not the last will and testament of the decedent, and that such an instrument was executed and left in such a custody that the presumption is that it was destroyed with the intention of revocation, with the result that the decedent died intestate. We are of opinion that the authorities relied upon by the learned surrogate support his conclusion, and that the decree refusing probate to the will of June, 1900, was properly made."

From the foregoing discussion we conclude that the evidence of the witness Blakeley was sufficient, if believed by the trial court, to establish the fact as found by it, that the will of the decedent dated April 25, 1918, had been duly executed by him so as to render effective its revoking clause to the extent of revoking all former wills by him made, and that said revoking clause remained in full force and effect as to former wills of the decedent, although said later will had been presumptively destroyed by the testator with the intention of revoking same. This conclusion renders unnecessary any further discussion as to the form, substance, or effect of the prior holographic will of the decedent, which the trial court by its judgment rightly held to have been revoked and hence properly denied admission to probate.

Judgment affirmed.

VETERANS' WELFARE BOARD et al. v. RILEY, State Controller. (S. F. 10161.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1922.)

1. States ☞114—Application of money for soldiers' benefit is for "public purpose."

Legislation having for its purpose the giving of a benefit to soldiers having served their country in time of war is the application of public money for a public purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Purpose.]

2. States ☞114—Loan to soldiers expenditure for "public purpose."

A loan to soldiers who had served their country in time of war is an expenditure of money for a public purpose.

3. States ☞119—Veterans' Welfare Act and Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act not unconstitutional as a "gift from state" or "loan of state's credit."

St. 1921, p. 969, establishing the Veterans' Welfare Board, known as the California Veterans' Welfare Act, providing for the purchasing and improving of lands and selling in small parcels to veterans who will become actual settlers, and St. 1921, p. 815, creating Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act, in so far as the laws relate to the appointment of the Veterans' Welfare Board and the incurring by them of expenses for carrying out of the laws, are not invalid within Const. art. 4, §§ 31 and 32, as a gift from the state or loan of its credit.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift; Loan.]

4. States ☞119—Veterans' Welfare Act and Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act held not "grant of extra compensation" or "allowance" prohibited by Constitution.

Const. art. 4, § 32, prohibiting the granting of extra compensation or allowance to a public servant after service rendered, repudiates claims based on moral obligations growing out of service to the state, and if St. 1921, pp. 815 and 969, known as the Veterans' Welfare Act, and Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act, provide for gifts or loans of credit in violation of Const. art. 4, § 31, they cannot be excepted from its provisions on the ground that the payments are made in discharge of a moral obligation, but such acts are not "grants or allowances of extra compensation," and hence are not prohibited by section 32.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Allowance; Extra Compensation.]

5. States ☞115—Appropriations for veterans held not to create any "debt."

Appropriations by the Veterans' Welfare Act and Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act (St. 1921, pp. 969, 815), from the public funds available for purposes thereof held not to be a creation of "debt," and within the limitation of Const. art. 16, § 1.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Debt.]

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by the Veterans' Welfare Board and others against Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California, requiring him to issue warrants for the payment of certain obligations of petioners as members of the Board. Writ granted.

Milton Sapiro and George J. Hatfield, both of San Francisco, and M. B. Silberberg, Walter K. Tuller, O'Melveny, Milliken & Tuller, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

H. C. Lucas and Dion R. Holm, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The Veterans' Welfare Board, appointed under and by virtue of section 3 of an act entitled "An act creating a veterans' welfare board and defining its powers and duties and making an appropriation in aid of its operations," approved May 30, 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 969), petitions for writ of mandate to compel the respondent, the state controller, to issue warrants for the payment of certain obligations incurred in the performance of its duties under the above-entitled act, and also to issue warrants for obligations incurred by the Board in carrying out the provisions of "An act to provide educational opportunities for persons who served in the army, navy or marine corps of the United States in time of war, and making an appropriation therefor," approved May 30, 1920 (Stats. 1921, p. 967), and also to issue warrants for the payment of expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of an act entitled "An act providing for farm and home aid for veterans, defining the powers and duties of the Veterans' Welfare Board in respect thereto, and making an appropriation therefor," approved May 30, 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 815).

The respondent has refused to issue the warrants, upon the ground that each of these statutes is unconstitutional and void. The claims involved in this proceeding have each been audited and approved by the Veterans' Welfare Board and by the State Board of Control. The respondent has demurred to the petition herein, and claims that these acts, and each of them, is in violation of article 4, §§ 31, 32, article 16, § 1, article 1, § 21, and article 4, § 25, subd. 19, and cites in support of that contention People v. Johnson, 6 Cal. 499; Nougues v. Douglass, 7 Cal. 65; Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230; Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 321, 28 Pac. 951, 15 L. R. A. 431, 27 Am. St. Rep. 203; Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, 99 Cal. 17, 33 Pac. 753, 21 L. R. A. 474, 37 Am. St. Rep. 17; McClure v. Nye, 22 Cal. App. 248, 133 Pac. 1145; Molineux v. State of California, 109 Cal. 378, 42 Pac. 34, 50 Am. St. Rep. 49; Taylor v. Mott, 123 Cal. 497, 56 Pac. 256; Powell v. Phelan, 138 Cal. 271, 71 Pac. 335. He also cites a recent decision of the Court of Appeals of the state of New York, People v. Westchester County National Bank, 231 N. Y. 465, 132 N. E. 241, 246, 15 A. L. R. 1344, wherein an act authorizing the payment of a bonus to veterans was held violative of article 7, § 1, and article 8, § 9, of the New York Constitution, prohibiting the giving or loaning of the credit or money of the state.

The court has concluded that further argument is desirable with regard to the demand for obligations incurred under the "Act to provide educational opportunities for persons who served in the army, navy or marine corps of the United States in time of war." Stats. 1921, p. 967. That branch of the case is entirely separable from the demand under the other two acts. As to that branch, the matter will be continued for additional argument under the order hereinbefore made to that effect. The demands under the other acts involve different questions, which have been fully argued, and upon which we have reached a conclusion which may be announced at once.

[1, 2] The fundamental question involved in this legislation, or any legislation by which individuals profit by the moneys raised by public taxation, is the question as to whether or not such moneys are expended for a public purpose. This question is discussed by the petitioners, and the point is apparently conceded by the respondent. However, in view of the importance of the question and the bearing it has upon the points raised and discussed, it should be stated that legislation having for its purpose the giving of a benefit to soldiers who have served their country in time of war is uniformly recognized as the application of public money for a public purpose. It is so thoroughly established that a public purpose is accomplished by such legislation, even though the appropriation or benefit is conferred by legislation enacted after the service is completed that it is only necessary to cite a few of the more recent cases on the subject wherein will be found a discussion and collation of the earlier cases supporting that view. Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 608, 98 N. E. 338; People v. Westchester National Bank, 231 N. Y. 465, 132 N. E. 241, 15 A. L. R. 1344; State ex rel. Atwood v. Johnson, 170 Wis. 218, 175 N. W. 589, 7 A. L. R. 1617; State ex rel. Atwood v. Johnson, 170 Wis. 251, 176 N. W. 224; State ex rel. Hart v. Calusen, 113 Wash. 570, 194 Pac. 793, 13 A. L. R. 580.

The loaning of money to private persons has been held violative of the express or implied constitutional requirement against taxation for private purposes. This was held to be true even where the city of Boston had been nearly destroyed by fire, and it was proposed to aid private persons to rebuild (Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39), and similar legislation for the purpose of rebuilding Charleston was also declared unconstitutional (Feldman & Co. v. City Council of Charleston, 23 S. C. 57, 55 Am. Rep. 6). Although it was held by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts (Lo- well v. Boston, supra) that the making of a loan for such a purpose is not a public purpose, a grant of money to ex-soldiers in the nature of compensation or bonus was nevertheless subsequently held to constitute a public purpose. Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 608, 98 N. E. 338. It is manifest, if an outright gift of public moneys in aid of ex-soldiers is a public purpose, that a loan to them would also be an expenditure of money for a public purpose.

The rule is stated in the recent case of People v. Westchester County National Bank, supra, where the Court of Appeals in New York held that the statutes of that state providing for the sale of bonds and a payment of a bonus to soldiers who served in the world war was violative of certain provisions in the New York Constitution, but also held that the payment of such bonus was a public purpose. In that connection the court made the following statement:

"It is said that this act serves no such purpose. We think, however, that it does. In deciding whether the object for which taxation is imposed is for a public object the courts 'must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether state or municipal. Whatever lawfully pertains to this and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people may well be held to belong to a public use, and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation.' Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 665. In this state the granting of pensions and gratuities for military service is not a new experiment. By the Act of May 11, 1784, public land was granted to Revolutionary veterans. By chapter 8 of the Laws of 1814, pay in addition to that granted by the United States was given to soldiers of the War of 1812. By chapter 178 of the Laws of 1904 a pension was granted to the last survivor of that war. By section 220 of the Military Law a pension was given to any member of the militia who had been disabled within ten years in the performance of duty. A pension policy has long been adopted by the United States and acts similar to ours have been passed in at least nineteen other states.

"The payment of a pension or a bonus for past services showing the gratitude of the people, showing that the state is mindful of those who have made sacrifices for it, is an incitement to patriotism and an encouragement to defend the country in future conflicts. Even if such a payment is not clearly one made in the general interest, at least there is such ground for the claim that, where the Legislature has accepted that view, the courts may not interfere. That they believe the action unwise or unnecessary is immaterial. As to that question the Legislature [in the absence of constitutional restrictions] is the final arbiter. Jones v. City of Portland, 245 U. S. 217; State ex rel. Atwood v. Johnson, 175 N. W. Rep. 589; State ex rel. Atwood v. Johnson, 176 N. W. Rep. 224; Gustafson v. Rhinow, 144 Minn. 415; State ex rel. Hart v. Clausen, 194 Pac. Rep. 793; Opinions of Justices, 211 Mass. 608. What long custom and usage has sanctioned, what the weight of judicial authority has approved, that we should be slow to declare wrongful. Nor may a distinction be made between such a bonus as our act provides and a pension. The one is a reward for past military services payable at once; the other such a reward payable in installments. * * *

It is claimed that the purpose of these two acts (Stats. 1921, pp. 815, 969) is a public one because in furtherance of the settlement of lands and of the agricultural development of the state. There are decisions which support this view (Hill v. Rae, 52 Mont. 378, 158 Pac. 826, L. R. A. 1917A, 495, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 210; Wheelon v. S. Dak. Land Settlement Board, 43 S. D. 551, 181 N. W. 359, 14 A. L. R. 1145; State v. Clausen, 110 Wash. 525, 188 Pac. 538, 14 A. L. R. 1133; Green v. Frazier, 253 U. S. 233, 40 Sup. Ct. 499, 64 L. Ed. 878; Smith v. Kansas City Title Co., 255 U. S. 180, 41 Sup. Ct. 243, 65 L. Ed. 577; McMahan v. Olcott, 65 Or. 537, 133 Pac. 836; State ex rel. Goodwin v. Nelson County, 1 N. D. 88, 45 N. W. 33, 8 L. R. A. 283, 26 Am. St. Rep. 609), and other earlier decisions taking a more strict view which would lead to the opposite conclusion (Allen v. Inhabitants of Jay, 60 Me. 124, 11 Am. Rep. 185, Kingman v. City of Brockton, 153 Mass. 255, 26 N. E. 998, 11 L. R. A. 123; Lowell v. City of Boston, supra; Curtis' Adm'r v. Whipple and others, 24 Wis. 350, 1 Am. Rep. 187; Deal v. Mississippi County, 107 Mo. 464, 18 S. W. 24, 14 L. R. A. 622; State v. Township of Osawkee, 14 Kan. 418, 19 Am. Rep. 99; Loan Assn. v. Topeka, 21 Wall. 655, 22 L. Ed. 455), but we base our conclusion as to the public character of the expenditure proposed entirely upon the fact that such expenditures are for the benefit of veterans of the World War and are for that reason of a public nature.

[3] The next question presented is the claim that the acts provide for a gift or loan in violation of sections 31 and 32 of article 4 of the Constitution. These sections, so far as material, are as follows:

"Credit of State or Municipalities not to be Loaned.

"Sec. 31. The Legislature shall have no power to give or to lend, or to authorize the giving or lending, of the credit of the state, or of any county, city and county, city, township, or other political corporation or subdivision of the state now existing, or that may be hereafter established, in aid of or to any person, association, or corporation, whether municipal or otherwise, or to pledge the credit thereof, in any manner whatever, for the payment of the liabilities of any individual, association, municipal or other corporation whatever; nor shall it have power to make any gift, or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value to any individual, municipal or other corporation whatever. * * *

"Extra Compensation to Officers Forbidden.

"Sec. 32. The Legislature shall have no power to grant, or authorize any county or municipal authority to grant, any extra compensation or allowance to any public officer, agent, servant, or contractor, after service has been rendered, or a contract has been entered into and performed, in whole or in part, nor to pay, or to authorize the payment of, any claim hereafter created against the state, or any county or municipality of the state, under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law; and all such unauthorized agreements or contracts shall be null and void."

It is clear from these provisions, and from the above-cited decisions of this court, that, if the statutes in question provide for a gift, or for a loan of the credit of the state, they are to that extent a violation of these provisions of our state Constitution, notwithstanding the purpose of the legislation is public and most laudable.

Before, further considering the question thus presented, we will state in general terms the scope and effect of the laws involved in this controversy. The act establishing the Veterans' Welfare Board (Stats. 1921, p. 969), known as the California Veterans' Welfare Act, authorizes the welfare board to purchase and acquire land and water rights, to improve and subdivide such lands and sell the same at an amount which would return the purchase price and expenses incurred in connection therewith, plus 5 per cent. interest thereon. Sales are to be made to "any veteran who is not the holder of agricultural land or possessory rights thereto of the value of fifteen thousand dollars and who, by this purchase would not become the holder of agricultural land or possessory rights thereto exceeding such value, and who is prepared to enter within six months upon actual occupation of the land acquired. * * *" The land is to be paid for in 40 years, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, compounded at periods fixed by the board. The amount due for improvements on the land shall be paid on amortized payments extending over a period not exceeding 20 years. The act also provides for the making of loans "not to exceed three thousand dollars to any one settler for the purchase of necessary live stock and equipment such loans to be secured in any manner that the board may direct or without security other than the personal obligation of the settler."

The general scheme of this statute, then, is to provide for the purchasing and improving of lands and the selling of the same in small parcels to veterans who will become actual settlers, the purchase price to represent the pro rata proportion of the actual cost of such land and improvements, the purchase price to bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum, and to be compounded if not paid.

The statute providing for farm and home aid to veterans (Stats. 1921, p. 815), known as the "Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act," authorizes the Veterans' Board to purchase for resale to veterans of land for agricultural purposes not exceeding to each the value of $7,500, or a home or home site not exceeding the value of $5,000. The purchase is to be made when the board is "satisfied of the desirability of the real estate and of the ability of the applicant, and that such applicant is a veteran, and that such applicant has agreed with the board to actually reside upon such real estate within six months from the date of the purchase by the board." The board is to enter into a contract with the owner for the purchase from the owner upon such terms as may be by them agreed.

"The board shall enter into a contract with the applicant for the sale of said land to said applicant at a price to be fixed by the board, which will make the purchase price and sale price reciprocal, taking into account the difference, if any, in the interest rate to be paid on deferred installments by the board and the applicant respectively, which price shall include the cost of such real estate and all expenses and costs incurred and estimated to be incurred by the board in relation thereto, inclusive of interest, administration, appraisals, examination of title, incidental expenses and such sum as shall be deemed necessary to meet unforeseen contingencies."

The applicant is required to make an initial payment of 10 per cent. in case of a farm and 5 per cent. in case of a home or home site, the balance to be amortized over a period not exceeding 40 years with 5 per cent. interest per annum.

In considering the attack made upon these laws it should be observed that we are only dealing with the question of whether or not there is sufficient validity in these laws to justify the appointment of the Veterans' Welfare Board and the incurring by them of expenses covered by the claims set out in the petition looking towards the carrying out of the laws. Even though some portions of these statutes, or some features of the law, may be unconstitutional, it is only necessary for the purpose of this case for us to determine whether or not there is sufficient validity in the laws to justify the arrangement made for carrying them out. Each law carries with it an appropriation. The law known as the California Veterans' Welfare Act (Stats. 1921, p. 969) makes an appropriation of $1,000,000. The Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act (Stats. 1921, p. 815) makes an appropriation of $2,000,000.

It is evident that a scheme of the California Veterans' Welfare Act, by which the state purchases large tracts of land, improves and subdivides it, and resells it at its total cost to the state, with interest at 5 per cent., is not a gift of either land or its value to the purchaser from the state. The advantage, if any, derived by the purchaser from the state would be altogether due to the wisdom and judgment of the Welfare Board in making its purchases and its ability to secure large areas of land at comparatively low prices, and consequently to sell at a low price, and also to the unusually long time which may be allowed by the board in which the purchaser may make the deferred payments. The plan of operation provided by the act is the very familiar one by which large tracts of land are provided with water for irrigation, improved, subdivided, and sold in small tracts to individual buyers on convenient terms of payment of deferred payments, with a small initial payment. So far as the purchase and sale of the land is concerned, it is not a gift. If it is not a gift, is it a loan of the credit of the state within the meaning of article 4, §§ 31 and 32? The answer is that, so far as the appropriation made is concerned, the state is not lending its credit, but, if the arrangement for the purchase and sale of land at all partakes of the nature of a loan, it is a loan of money and not of credit. Section 31, art. 4, does not prohibit the lending of the money of the state, but only of the loaning of the credit thereof. The distinction between the loaning of the money of the state and the loaning of its credit is clearly pointed out by the Court of Appeals of New York in People v. Westchester County National Bank, supra. In that case the court made the following statements:

"This report, which was adopted with immaterial verbal alterations, became a part of article 7 of the Constitution. No longer under any circumstances might the credit of the state in any manner be given or loaned to or in aid of any individual, association or corporation.

"This article as reported was confined solely to limiting the power of the Legislature as to debts. It did not touch the power to appropriate the property of the state or the money it might raise by taxation for payments or gifts to individuals or corporations so long as such payments or gifts subserved the public good. It was proposed to limit this power also. Mr. Charles O'Connor suggested the addition to the section of the provision 'Nor shall any gift of public moneys or property be made, except as a reward for military services, or by the release of escheats and forfeitures.' This was objected to, however, and as the evil apparently was not serious, the effort was abandoned and the section was allowed to stand as reported. Debates of the Convention, p. 722. In the address by the members of the convention to the people it was said: 'They have incorporated many useful provisions more effectually to secure the people in their rights of person and property against the abuses of delegated power.' Convention Journal, p. 1547.

"Cut off from the right to loan or give the credit of the state, however, by 1867 the Legislature had begun to resort freely to grants of public funds to railroads and to charitable associations. Therefore, in the constitutional convention of that year the attempt was renewed to deprive it of that power. Sanford E. Church, later the distinguished chief judge of this court, reported from the committee of finance a proposed article of the constitution. It contained a section numbered eleven. 'Neither the credit, money or property of the state shall in any manner be given or loaned to or in aid of any individual, association or corporation.' Proceedings of Debates, p. 791. This proposal was debated at length but it was not adopted.

"This constitution having been rejected by the people, a commission was appointed in 1872 to consider amendments. It was again proposed to limit the right of the state with regard to gifts and loans of its property. The committee on sectarian appropriations reported a clause: 'Neither the credit nor the money or property of the state or of any county, city, village or town shall in any manner be given or loaned to or in aid of any association, corporation or other private institution whatever.' Later a substitute for this proposal was accepted—'Neither the credit nor the money of the state shall be given or loaned to or in aid of any association, corporation or other private undertaking.' Still later the word 'other' was deleted. In the report it was said that this proposed amendment 'cuts off all gifts of money and all loaning of the credit of the state to all other associations, corporations, etc., but they are all subject to the same objection and appropriations to them of the money of the state are liable to the same abuses. They must all stand or fall together.' Journal, p. 452. In this form the section now stands in our Constitution. Article 8, § 9.

"We find, therefore, among others, two limitations imposed on the Legislature in addition to the one that was always implied. They both relate to gifts or loans either of the credit or the moneys of the state. 'The credit of the state shall not in any manner be given or loaned to or in aid of any individual.' Article 7, § 1. 'Neither the credit nor the money of the state shall be given or loaned to or in aid of * * * any private undertaking.' Article 8, § 9. They both also represent the triumph of efforts to prevent improvidence, to make useless any pressure from special interests, to safeguard the credit of the state, and the interests of the people as a whole. They are not to be brushed aside. They are to be fairly construed to obtain the object for which they were intended. * * *

"As we have seen, this act provides that $45,000,000 shall be raised by the state upon its bonds and the proceeds applied as a bonus to those who have been in the military service of the United States. We have seen also that the proceeds can be used only for this one object. Is this a gift or a loan of the credit of the state? Clearly it is not a loan. A loan implies repayment. Here there is no such situation. The bonds are issued for full value.

Their proceeds are transferred absolutely with no promise, express or implied, of return.

"If not a loan then does this act contemplate a gift of the state's credit? In answering this question the mere form of the transaction is immaterial. If the gift of the bonds of the state to a railroad corporation would be such a gift—and it undoubtedly would be—then so would be an issue of bonds by the state with the express condition that their proceeds should be given to the same corporation. The evasion of the constitutional prohibition would be palpable and it could not and should not be permitted.

"The important question is, therefore, whether under this act the provisions made for the soldiers and sailors is a gift to them or a gift in their aid. * * *

"Such we believe is the situation here. The state proposes to give its credit to the soldiers and sailors, not to satisfy any obligation that it owes them, but as a gratuity. The act is, therefore, prohibited by section 1 of article 7 of the Constitution. * * *

(Italics ours.)

We are fully in accord with the conclusions expressed by the Court of Appeals of New York in relation to the distinction between a loan of money and one of credit. As pointed out by that court in the gift of the money of the state, raised by current taxation, we are expressing our own gratitude, by giving our own, but when the gratitude is expressed in the issuance of bonds and the gift of the proceeds of the sale thereof, we are expressing our generosity at the expense of our posterity. When the people have so keen a sense of gratitude, or of public purpose that they are willing to give of their substance to express that conviction, there is little danger that excessive or unreasonable burdens will be thus assumed, but when one generation can be generous at the expense of the next, there is danger that the expression may not be so reasonable or so well considered. Hence it is clear that there is a marked distinction between the loan of money and a loan of credit. This distinction is equally clear, if the loan is for a short time as if for a long time, although the reasons for the distinction are not the same. This question is not new in this state, and perhaps it would have been sufficient merely to cite a decision of this court under the Constitution of 1849, which also contained a prohibition against giving or loaning the credit of the state. Article 11, § 10, Const. Cal. 1849. It is as follows:

"Sec. 10. The credit of the state shall not in any manner be given or loaned to or in aid of any individual, association, or corporation; nor shall the state, directly or indirectly, become a stockholder in any association or corporation."

This court held in People v. Pacheco, 27 Cal. 175, that a bond issue of $1,500,000 in aid of the Central Pacific Railroad was not a violation of the section quoted when the act authorizing the issue levied a tax and appropriated the fund from the successive tax levies to pay the bonds. The argument advanced in support of that conclusion is that the law authorizing an expenditure did not create a debt within the meaning of article 8 of the Constitution of 1849 (similar in terms to article 16 of our present Constitution) when accompanied by a provision for a tax levy and an appropriation thereof to pay the same (State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429; Koppikus v. State Capitol Com., 16 Cal. 249); hence it was held that, as there was no debt of the state within the meaning of article 8, Const. 1849, there was no loan or gift of credit within the meaning of article 11, § 10, Const. 1849. In the course of its decision the court made the following observations concerning the matter:

"Besides, as we held in the discussion of the first point, no debt on the part of the state is created, and consequently no credit in any proper sense of the term arises. The act of the state in assuming to make these payments, consists in a single provision made in advance, raising a fund, setting it aside and specifically appropriating it to the payment of the interest semiannually, from year to year, upon the presentation of the coupons at the state treasury—these coupons serving as warrants upon which the money is to be drawn from the treasury. As no debt or liability in the constitutional sense is created, so no credit in the constitutional sense arises, or is loaned or given. A fund is provided in advance for the purpose, and out of it the services to be rendered by the company to the state are to be paid, but the payments are to be made on behalf of the company, in satisfaction of interest due from it to certain designated creditors. The money being provided in the first instance, and being in contemplation of law, always on hand in the treasury, before the installments of interest accrue, the transaction on the part of the state upon the principles before stated, is regarded as a cash transaction. From these views, it follows, that, the act in question is not repugnant to section 10 of article XI of the Constitution.

"Our conclusion is that the act in question is constitutional.

"The judgment, so far as it denies the relief asked for in the complaint, must, therefore, be affirmed. * * *

These cases form a part of the judicial history of the state and an authoritative interpretation of similar provisions in the Constitution of 1879: Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709; People ex rel. Parsons v. Edwards, 93 Cal. 153, 28 Pac. 831; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 Pac. 45. This distinction is pointed out by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in State ex rel. Atwood v. Johnson, 170 Wis. 251, 176 N. W. 224, 228, supra, and it is there held that no gift of credit is made by the soldiers' educational bonus act of that state where the appropriation is accompanied by a tax levy covering 5 years.

It follows that there is a clearly recognized distinction between the loaning of credit and the loaning of money. Indeed the distinction is clearly recognized in article 4, § 31, which prohibits the Legislature from giving or lending of the credit of the state, and also prohibits "the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value to any individual, municipal or other corporation whatever," but does not prohibit the loaning of the money of the state.

We conclude, therefore, that the act known as the Veterans' Welfare Act is not violative of article 4, § 31, of the Constitution so far as it permits the use of money appropriated by the act from funds not otherwise appropriated for the purchase and sale of land. The exigencies of this case require us to go no further, but, as we have pointed out, the loaning of money derived from a bond sale is held by the Court of Appeals of New York to be a loan of the credit of the state, inasmuch as the statutes under consideration contemplate a sale of $10,000,000 in state bonds under the Veterans' Bond Act (Stats. 1921, p. 959) to raise additional moneys to carry out their purposes (Stats. 1921, § 23, p. 976; Stats. 1921, § 8, p. 818). The point is involved in the entire legislative scheme, but is not involved in the case before us, because, if the law is constitutional as to the use of the appropriations already made, the writ should be granted. We therefore do not wish to be understood as passing upon the validity of the Veterans' Bond Act (Stats. 1921, p. 959, supra).

In the Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act (Stats. 1921, p. 815) the law does not specifically state that the Board shall make payment to the owner of the land purchased. The statute, considered without reference to constitutional limitations, would perhaps justify the interpretation that the Board might enter into contracts for the purchase of homes or land to be paid for in installments and then sell upon a similar contract payable upon similar terms as to time and interest, and thus in effect arrange for the payment by the veteran to the owner of the land through the medium of the Veterans' Board. If such an arrangement was made it would no doubt be in its purpose and effect a loaning of the credit of the state, for the only thing invested by the state in the land under such circumstances would be its credit or guaranty; otherwise the arrangement might as well been made by the veteran, as vendee, with the landowner for direct payments to him as such vendor. The only purpose of the intervention of the Veterans' Board would be to assure the vendor that he would be paid. The law, however, provides for the purchase of real estate by the Board and its resale, and we must assume that in carrying out the law it would be done in the manner which conforms to the Constitution, and not by an arrangement whereby the credit of the state is pledged for the payment of the debt of the veteran. The question as to the method of purchase is not involved in this proceeding except in so far as is necessary to hold that the law can be carried out in a constitutional manner.

This statute also provides for loans not to exceed $3,000 to each individual for the purchase of stock and farm improvements, the purpose being to permit a veteran who becomes an actual settler not only to acquire the land upon easy terms of payment, but also to acquire the necessary equipment for the profitable operation of the land in order that thereby he may be able to pay the purchase price of the land, improvements, and stock. The law does, however, authorize loans to the extent of $3,000 without security. If the question were directly involved as to whether or not such a loan might be made without security upon the terms which delayed the repayment to the state for 5 years, and which would permit the veteran to sell the property acquired by the money so advanced to him by the state without restriction, it might well be contended that such a loan to a financially irresponsible person would be in effect a gift, and thus violative of the Constitution. The question, however, is not directly involved, as no such loan has been made or is contemplated, and here again we must assume that, if such an unsecured loan is a gift in violation of the Constitution, the Welfare Board will not make such an unsecured loan, but that it will require adequate security so that the transaction may be in fact as well as in name a loan and not a gift. We refer to this matter for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the validity of this provision of the law is not involved in this proceeding, and that we do not pass upon it for that reason. If the proceedings were not avowedly for the purpose of testing the validity of the statute, we would not feel it necessary to note these limitations upon the question which we are authorized to determine, as such limitation is always implied.

[4] What has been said concerning article 4, § 31, of the Constitution largely determines the alleged invalidity of the scheme of land purchase under section 32 of the same article. This section prohibits the granting of extra compensation or allowance to a public servant after service rendered. This section repudiates claims based upon moral obligations, growing out of service to the state (Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 651, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230, supra; Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 327, 28 Pac. 951, 15 L. R. A. 431, 27 Am. St. Rep. 203, supra; Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, 99 Cal. 21, 33 Pac. 753, 21 L. R. A. 474, 37 Am. St. Rep. 17, supra), and hence decisions in other states holding that payments made where there is a moral obligation are not gifts or loans do not apply in this state (People v. Westchester County National Bank, supra, 231 N. Y. 476, 132 N. E. 241, 15 A. L. R. 1344, citing on this point Munro v. State of New York, 223 N. Y. 208, 215, 119 N. E. 444; Cole v. State of New York, 102 N. Y. 48, 6 N. E. 277; O'Hara v. State of New York, 112 N. Y. 146, 19 N. E. 659, 2 L. R. A. 603, 8 Am. St. Rep. 726; Wheeler v. State of New York, 190 N. Y. 406, 83 N. E. 54, 123 Am. St. Rep. 555; Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. Canal Board, 204 N. Y. 471, 97 N. E. 964, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1228; Spittorf v. State of New York, 108 N. Y. 205, 15 N. E. 75). If, therefore, the statutes in question otherwise provide for gifts or loans in violation of section 31, art. 4, they cannot be excepted from such provisions on the ground that such payments are made in discharge of a moral obligation; on the other hand, if they are not grants or allowances, as we hold, then section 32 does not prohibit them.

[5] Respondent contends that the appropriations made in the two laws under consideration, aggregating $3,500,000 violate section 1 of article 16. This section prohibits the Legislature from creating debts or liabilities aggregating together with all previous debts and liabilities, the sum of $300,000, except in case of war, to repel invasion or suppress insurrection, unless the same shall be authorized by law for some single object or work to be distinctly specified therein, which law shall provide ways and means, exclusive of loans, for the payment of the interest of such debts or liability as it falls due, etc. It is sufficient to say that the legislation in question does not create any debt or liability or purport to. The legislation in question appropriates from public funds available for that purpose the amount specified in each law for the purposes therein indicated. It does not authorize the petitioner to contract any indebtedness in excess of the amount appropriated or actually available for the purposes of executing the law. See State v. McCauley, supra; Koppikus v. State Capitol Com., supra; and People v. Pacheco, supra. In so far as the Home Purchasing Act could be construed to authorize the petitioner to purchase farms and homes in excess of the amount appropriated by the Legislature to pay for such homes or available from the funds set apart for that purpose, it might well be claimed that the making of contracts by which the state, through the Veterans' Welfare Board, agreed to purchase from the owners homes and farms for resale to the veterans, would be violative of this constitutional provision if the board endeavored to execute contracts by which they, as officers of the state, were obligated to pay for such homes and farms an amount larger than the appropriation available for such purpose, relying upon the veteran to make the payment to the board and for the payment of the land from such funds. In other words, if the total indebtedness assumed by the board exceeded the appropriation, it might be well said that, not only was the scheme violative of the provision prohibiting the lending of the credit of the state, but also that by so lending the credit of the state the indebtedness assumed by the state, if it exceeded the amount limited in section 1 of article 16—namely, $300,000—would be also violative of this section of the Constitution. We are not required to anticipate that this will be done; on the contrary, we should assume that the petitioner, in carrying out the laws in question, will construe them in conformity with the Constitution, and that their conduct thereunder will be regulated by the Constitution and such construction of the statutes. There is, therefore, no violation of section 1 of article 16 in the law if properly construed with relation to its constitutional restriction upon legislative power.

The writ is granted as to all items of expenditure under the Home and Farm Purchasing Act (Stats. 1921, p. 815) and the Veterans' Welfare Act (Stats. 1921, p. 969). That is to say, the writ is granted as to the claims set out in Exhibits A and B to the petition.

ARMSTRONG et al. v. PAYNE et al.
(Sac. 3005.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 4, 1922.
As Amended April 27, 1922.)

1. Waters and water courses ☞152(7)—Oral agreement for use of water with former owner admissible to show continuity and character of use.

In an action by riparian owners to quiet title to waters of a creek, where defendants alleged prescriptive rights, evidence of an oral agreement with former owner made in 1887, under which defendants claimed use of the water was continued until 1897 until death of former owner, and thereafter until 1914, when one of plaintiffs purchased the land was admissible to characterize the subsequent use of the water, and as tending to establish that the use by defendants thereafter was under a conceded and uninterrupted claim of right, and for the purpose of establishing defendants' claim as against the riparian claim of the former owner and his successors, and not because it was valid agreement, nor because it was declaration of predecessor of former owner.

2. Waters and water courses ☞137—Single interruption once in 5 years prevents acquisition of title by prescription.

A single interruption once every 5 years under such circumstances as to challenge the right of adverse claimant would prevent acquisition of title by prescription, for there would be no period of continuous user for period of five years.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨137—Interruption of adverse user of water must be by resumption of possession under claim of right with notice to adverse claimant.

To interrupt the running of the statute of limitations as to flowing water, there must be a resumption of the possession thereof under a claim of right brought home to the adverse claimant either by express notice to that effect or by conduct so notorious and unequivocal as to imply such notice.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨136—Continuity of intermittent use of water will establish corresponding prescriptive right.

An adverse claimant may establish a right to use water intermittently and for part of the irrigation season only and if that right is insisted upon and maintained without interruption, a corresponding prescriptive right arises.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨137—Frequent destruction of diverting dam by riparian owner under circumstances giving notice of his claim of right prevents title by prescription.

If riparian owner frequently destroyed diverting dam in creek under claim of right brought home to adverse claimants by express notice, or if destruction thereof resulted in such a resumption of possession of riparian rights and for such time as would give notice of his claim of right, adverse use of claimants would be interrupted, and they could not acquire title by prescription.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨143—Prescription as to flood waters limited to quantity beneficially used.

A claimant to a portion of flood waters only is entitled to such proportion thereof as has been actually diverted and put to beneficial use and used adversely during the period of flood waters continuously and without interruption for a period of 5 years.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; C. A. Raker, Judge.

Action by W. E. Armstrong and others against H. G. Payne and others. From judgment for plaintiffs establishing riparian rights and enjoining defendants from diverting water, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Curtis Hillyer, of San Francisco, and C. S. Baldwin, of Alturas, for appellants.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an action by riparian owners along Fitzhugh creek in Modoc county to quiet their title to all the waters of Fitzhugh creek, and enjoin the defendants from interference therewith. The defendants rely upon an appropriation of 200 inches made in 1886 and one of 50 inches made by defendant Gertrude French in September, 1912, and upon adverse use of the waters of said stream from 1886 and 1912, respectively. The trial court found that there was no prescriptive right in the defendants in and to any portion of the waters of Fitzhugh creek, and adjudged that all the waters of said creek belonged to the plaintiffs as riparian owners. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and attack the findings with relation to adverse use. It appears from the evidence without contradiction that in 1886 H. G. Payne posted a notice of appropriation of 200 inches of water at the point of diversion on Fitzhugh creek above the land of the plaintiffs; that at the same time he also posted a notice of appropriation of 200 inches of water on a stream known as Mill creek, and recorded copies of such notices. The watersheds of Mill creek and of Fitzhugh creek are entirely separate, and the land upon which the defendants diverted the water from said streams is outside the watershed of both streams. In pursuance of the notice of appropriation the defendant H. G. Payne built a ditch and flume about two miles long to carry the waters of Mill creek to a point in Fitzhugh creek about seven miles above their point of diversion, at which defendants also constructed a diverting dam, ditches, and flume leading from Fitzhugh creek to their land, and constructed upon their land certain reservoirs in which the waters diverted from Fitzhugh creek could be stored when not otherwise used. It was conceded in the trial court that the defendants were entitled to take from Fitzhugh creek all the waters they deposited in said creek from Mill creek, less an estimated evaporation of 15 per cent., and the decree established that right by providing that measuring boxes should be placed at the point of diversion from Fitzhugh creek, and at the point where the waters from Mill creek were emptied into Fitzhugh creek, and fixed the right of the defendants at the point of diversion as 85 per cent. of the amount actually emptied into Fitzhugh creek from Mill creek, and no more. Both Fitzhugh and Mill creeks are fed by melting snows. The watershed of Mill creek is at a much higher elevation than the watershed of Fitzhugh creek; consequently the snow melts later in the spring in Mill creek watershed than in Fitzhugh creek watershed. During the early part of the spring the snows melt with such rapidity in the watershed of Fitzhugh creek that the stream overflows its banks. The defendants claim that from and after 1886 they continuously diverted 200 inches of water from Fitzhugh creek at the point of diversion; that this use was continuous during the entire period that such an amount of water was flowing in the stream. They and their successors, some of whom are not parties, consequently claim that the right to take the full 200 inches of water at the point of diversion on Fitzhugh creek has been established by reason of such adverse use. Of the 200 inches so diverted one-fourth belongs to Carlos Payne and 33 inches has been conveyed to others not parties, and the total amount claimed by H. G. Payne is 117 inches continuous flow, and by Gertrude French, 50 inches. The latter right is claimed, under her appropriation made in the year 1912, "during the period of melting snows."

In ordinary seasons the Mill creek water was turned into Fitzhugh creek about June 10th, but sometimes the water was turned in as early as May 15th, and it had been turned in as late as July 15th. H. G. Payne testified that his diversion ditch ran full at all times when water was running in Fitzhugh creek, regardless of whether Mill creek was diverted thereto. The defendants claim that their title to the waters of Fitzhugh creek, during the early spring, before the Mill creek waters were deposited therein, is thus established by adverse use. The only conflict in the evidence is as to the quantity of water actually diverted by the defendants from Fitzhugh creek and from Mill creek and as to alleged interruptions of the adverse use of the waters of Fitzhugh creek by the defendants.

The plaintiffs rely upon the proposition that the use of the defendants was interrupted from time to time, and that because of such interruptions there was no period of five years during which the defendants continuously diverted the water claimed by them. The defendants, on the other hand, claim that the interruption of their use was surreptitious and covert; that such breaches as were made in their diverting dam were at once repaired by defendants, and the water was again diverted into the defendants' ditch, and that, by reason of the surreptitious character of the acts alleged to constitute the interruption, if they occurred as claimed by plaintiffs, such acts were insufficient in law to break the continuity of use necessary to establish defendants' rights by prescription.

The defendants thus claim the right to 117 inches of the waters of Fitzhugh creek up to the time Mill creek waters are deposited therein, and particularly during the usual flood period claim such right, plus the 50 inches appropriated by Gertrude French.

We will first consider an erroneous ruling as to the admissibility of certain evidence which will require a reversal. The defendants offered to prove a verbal agreement between John Doten made in 1887 when he owned the property now owned by the plaintiffs, Clark brothers, whereby some arrangement was made as to the use of the waters of Fitzhugh creek, defendants claiming that the use was continued under said agreement until 1897, when John Doten died, and thereafter until the Clark brothers bought the place in 1914. The offer was objected to by the plaintiffs; the objection was sustained, but subsequently the evidence was admitted and then stricken out. Its general character can be seen from the following excerpt therefrom:

"Q. What was this arrangement, Mr. Payne? A. The arrangement was that I was to run all Fitzhugh creek water and to take all of the water in the fall of the year except sufficient water to water his stock, and that I was to have my appropriation, excepting in the fall of the year I was to let enough water go down the creek for his stock water.

"Q. You were always to permit sufficient water to run down to his place on Fitzhugh creek for stock purposes; is that it? A. That was it exactly.

"Q. Was there any arrangement between you and Mr. Doten in regard to the Mill creek water? A. No, sir; only he told me at that time that he had been to Mill creek and he was satisfied that we were running the full amount of water, and that he had been up to Mill creek and had seen the water running. * * *

"Q. Was there any arrangement with you as to not turning the water from Mill creek until a certain season of the year? A. Yes, sir; part of the agreement was that I was not to turn the Mill creek water in until the first part, or about the tenth of June, and the reason he stated was because it damaged him by making the water too high, and that it cut out the dam at the house, and that if I put the Mill creek water in too early it was dangerous to his ranch. It was settled by us on that basis that I was not to put the water in from Mill creek until between the 1st and 10th of June, and I was to leave sufficient water in the creek to water his stock, and that was all he needed after the 1st day of June, as he had no use for the water except for stock.

"Q. From that time on did you always turn the Fitzhugh creek water and the Mill creek water and handle it in accordance with this arrangement you had with him? A. Yes, sir. John Doten is dead. He died in December, 1897, 11 years after I made my appropriation.

"Q. During those 11 years, Mr. Payne, were you using water continuously from Fitzhugh creek and Mill creek under your appropriation and in accordance with your agreement, that is in the manner that you had agreed on with Mr. John Doten? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. During that time did he ever make any objection or in any way interrupt your use of the water? A. He did not. * * * The agreement was, that I was to continue running the water the way I was from Mill creek, but that I was not to turn the water in before the 1st or 10th of June, and he had no objection to my running the water of Fitzhugh creek, and after July or August in the fall of the year I was to take my full amount of water, but I was to allow sufficient water to go down the creek to water his stock.

"Q. He agreed that you could turn Mill creek water into Fitzhugh creek and then take it out again, and that was all he agreed to, was it not? A. No, sir; it was not.

"Q. What was the agreement, then? A. I was to run the Mill creek water, but I was to take my appropriation from Fitzhugh creek also.

"Q. He agreed that you might take the waste water—take the water of Fitzhugh creek when he did not need it? A. He agreed that I should take my appropriation. * * *

"Q. After the irrigating season was over he did not object to your taking the Fitzhugh creek water if you let enough come down the creek for his stock and irrigating purposes; is that correct? A. He did not object to my taking all my appropriation out of Fitzhugh creek. If my 200 inches would not dry the creek, he had no objection, but he wanted me to allow enough water to come on down for his stock. * * *

"Q. He never agreed with you that you could take 200 inches of water from Fitzhugh creek and deprive him of it, did he? A. That is what he agreed to; that if the water was not there before I turned it in from Mill creek, I was to have my 200 inches of water, just the same.

"Q. But during the irrigating season you were only to take out from Fitzhugh creek only what was turned in from Mill creek; isn't that the case? A. No, sir; I was to have my 200 inches of water, and by reason of my putting that Mill creek water in about the 10th of June he was not damaged in any way.

"Q. He did not object to your taking out 200 inches of water during the irrigating season because you put that much in from Mill creek and he never lost it; is that the case? A. He told me he was willing for me to run that 200 inches, because he had been to Mill creek and knew I was not damaging him.

"Q. Are you willing to say to the court in this case that John Doten agreed with you that you could take out 200 inches of water from Fitzhugh creek any time of the year, regardless of what you put in from Mill creek? A. Yes, sir; and that is a fact.

"Q. Why did you say a few minutes ago that in the fall of the year you were to have this right? A. That was, if the creek was to get down low, it was understood that I was to leave enough water for his stock, because in the irrigating season there was plenty of water."

[1] The evidence should not have been stricken out. The evidence of the agreement was clearly admissible to characterize the subsequent use of the water, and as tending to establish that the use by the defendants thereafter was under a conceded and uninterrupted claim of right, and for the purpose of establishing the defendants' claim as against the riparian claims of John Doten and his successors, the Clark brothers. Bakersfield T. H. Ass'n v. Chester, 55 Cal. 98, opinion on petition for rehearing, p. 102; Oneto v. Restano, 78 Cal. 374, 20 Pac. 743; Northern California Power Co. Cons. v. Flood (Cal. Sup.) 199 Pac. 315; Bree v. Wheeler, 4 Cal. App. 111, 87 Pac. 255. The agreement was not admissible because it is a valid agreement or solely because it is a declaration of a predecessor of the Clark brothers (sections 1849, 1853, Code Civ. Proc.), but because it shows the nature of the claims of the respective parties during the time the statute of limitations was running, and the extent of the defendants' claims.

If the defendants, by reason of such agreement and a continuous adverse use thereunder for five years, had established their right to the use of the waters of Fitzhugh creek, or to any portion thereof, as against the riparian rights of the Doten property, and had failed to acquire such right as against the Armstrong property, the decree should have adjudicated their respective priorities and rights accordingly. The case was apparently tried on the theory that the riparian rights of the plaintiffs were identical, and were both preserved against the claims of the defendants by interruptions of their adverse use by either, while, in fact, the defendants may have secured a prescriptive title to the water of Fitzhugh creek against one lower riparian owner and not against another.

This ruling on the evidence was prejudicial, and necessitates a retrial. In view of a new trial, we will consider the contentions of the parties as to what constitutes an interruption of an adverse use of water. In the case of Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135, 138, a statement is quoted from 1 Wood on Nuisances, p. 438, to the effect that any interruption of the continuity of use by an adverse claimant, "however slight," prevents the acquisition of the right by such use. In that case it does not clearly appear from the opinion what the nature of the interruption was. In that case Crafts claimed several distinct rights in the water flowing in a diverting ditch. Some of his claims were conceded. It was conceded that Crafts had the right to use all the water of the stream from 3 p. m. to 9 p. m. on Tuesday and Friday in each week, but Crafts, in addition, claimed the right to use the flow of one-sixth of the stream from 3 to 9 p. m. of the other 5 days by reason of his ownership of a tract of land known as the "Carpenter" ranch, and also that he was entitled by reason of adverse possession to a reasonable flow of water for irrigating and domestic purposes upon two other places owned by him known as the "See" place and "Criswell" place. With reference to the alleged tolling of the statute of limitations by interruptions, the court merely said:

"It is enough to say that the use of water upon those places—as the case clearly shows—was not peaceable, as that term is applied in connection with the subject we are considering, but was disputed and not infrequently interrupted by plaintiffs, and their grantors."

The case, therefore, is only authority for the proposition that, where the claimed use is frequently interrupted, and the possession is not peaceable, there can be no title by prescription. However, this case is cited in Ball v. Kehl, 95 Cal. 606, 613, 30 Pac. 780, 782, as authority for the proposition that:

"Interruption of adverse user, however slight, prevents acquisition of title by prescription."

But the latter case involved a claim of adverse use where the claimant had used the water "during a part of the period of five years" (95 Cal. 614, 30 Pac. 782), and consequently is not authority upon the question as to how slight an interruption or what sort of an interruption would prevent the prescriptive right accruing. Both cases are cited in Bree v. Wheeler, 129 Cal. 145, 147, 61 Pac. 782, 783, to the same effect, as follows:

"Interruption of adverse user, however slight, prevents acquisition of title by prescription."

The trial court in that case had found as a fact:

"That the use of said water by the defendant has been every year, at least, once interrupted, by turning it out of the head of defendant's ditch by the plaintiff, but the court finds such acts by the plaintiff to have been mere trespasses." (Italics ours.)

In commenting upon this finding, the court stated:

"It may have been interrupted many times during each year, and the finding be true. The court adds that the interruptions were 'mere trespasses.' If the water was the property of plaintiff, he had the right to turn it out of defendant's ditch, and he would not commit a trespass in so doing. A man can do as he pleases with his own property without committing a trespass. The finding does not show how long these interruptions continued, nor whether they were as continuous as the use by defendant. Neither does the finding show that the use by defendant has been open or notorious." (Italics ours.)

Upon the second appeal of this case after a new trial (Bree v. Wheeler, 4 Cal. App. 109, 87 Pac. 255), it was said:

"As the plaintiff interrupted the defendant's use annually, no title by adverse possession could accrue. * * *

However, the nature of the interruption is shown by the opinion of the court. Plaintiff claimed all the water, and the defendant claimed half of it. It was agreed to divide the water equally. Pursuant to this agreement measuring boxes were installed, but the plaintiff became dissatisfied and tore out the measuring boxes, and thereafter the defendant used all the water. It appears from the opinion that the defendant's right to the water was continually protested and was actually interrupted by the destruction of the measuring boxes.

The rule with reference to continuity of use is thus stated in Gould on Waters (3d Ed.) § 335, pp. 636, 637:

"In order to support an easement by prescription, the adverse use must be continuous. * * * An occasional suspension or interruption of the enjoyment will not defeat the right, if it arises from such causes as the dryness of the season; a temporary failure to exercise the right to the extent claimed; or fluctuations in the flow of the stream. So an entry by stealth, or for purposes other than those connected with the right to enter, will not break the continuity of exclusive possession in another. * * *

Section 336: "The diversion of water from a stream by means of a trench is substantially continuous, although exercised only in certain months, or when subject to interruption during a part of each year by the owner of the land through which the trench is dug."

The cases cited in support of this latter statement, however, show that the interruption referred to was with the consent of the adverse users. Bolivar Manuf. Co. v. Neponset Manuf. Co., 16 Pick. (Mass.) 241; Cowell v. Thayer, 5 Metc. 257, 38 Am. Dec. 400; Swan v. Munch, 65 Minn. 500, 67 N. W. 1022, 35 L. R. A. 743, 60 Am. St. Rep. 491.

In 1 Wiel on Water Rights in the Western States (3d Ed.) § 584, p. 630, it is said:

"The terms 'exclusive' and 'uninterrupted' probably represent the same thing in this connection; namely, that to the extent of the right claimed, the claimant must not have shared the use with the true owner, nor suffered any act of dominion by him, such as an interruption. The use must be uninterrupted. Mere verbal objection is not an interruption; it must be some act actually causing a stoppage in the adverse use for a reasonable time, though it has been held that use under continual dispute is not adverse."

In 2 Kinney on Water and Water Rights (2d Ed.) § 1052, the right to acquire title by adverse possession by appropriation for definite periods of time is recognized, and it is stated in that regard:

"But where the interruption in the continuity of the use is caused by the acts of the party against whom the adverse user is running, and not from the claimant's own free will, no right can be acquired by prescription."

In section 1053 the author, in dealing with an interruption, says:

"It may be made by the shutting off of the water at the time the claimant needs it"—citing in support of the text the following California cases: Bree v. Wheeler, supra; Cave v. Crafts, supra; Last Chance, etc., Co. v. Heilbron, 86 Cal. 1, 26 Pac. 523, and also Wasatch Irr. Co. v. Fulton, 23 Utah, 466, 65 Pac. 205.

The cases cited have been already discussed, excepting the last two. In Last Chance, etc., Co. v. Heilbron, supra, there could have been no serious question as to the sufficiency of the interruption, and in the Utah case cited, the only question pertinent to the statement in the text was in regard to the admissibility of evidence of the tearing out of a diverting dam as evidence tending to prove an interruption.

The authorities all seem to agree that the act of the owner, in order to constitute a tolling of the statute, must be open, and either upon a claim of right, or so notorious as to constitute such a claim. If secret or surreptitious, it is unavailing. In 1 Ruling Case Law, § 39, p. 723, it is said:

"The running of the statute of limitations will be tolled by the owner's entry upon the land when accompanied with an explicit declaration of his purpose to repossess himself thereof, or by such open and notorious acts of dominion as make that purpose manifest. * * * In all cases, however, the intent, as expressed, or evidenced by acts of ownership, is that which governs the effect of the entry. The mere act of going upon the land is not enough. The owner must assert his claim to the land, or perform some act that would reinstate him in possession, before he can regain what he has lost. It is evident, therefore, that an entry by stealth, under circumstances going to show that he claimed no right to enter, or an entry for purposes other than those connected with a right to enter, would not break the continuity of the disseisor's possession."

See 2 Farnham on Water and Water Rights, § 539, p. 1750, section 561, p. 1807. In 2 Corpus Juris, p. 96, par. 118, it is said:

"While the essentials of an entry effective to interrupt an adverse possession will vary according to the premises involved, yet it must not be of a casual or secret character, but must be either known, or made under such circumstances as to enable the party in possession, by the use of reasonable diligence, to ascertain the right and claim of the party making the entry, and thus enable him to resort to legal remedies for its protection. There must be an explicit declaration or an act of notorious dominion by which the claimant challenges the right of the occupant. * * * It may be observed in this connection that there is a close analogy between the acts necessary to interrupt an adverse possession and those necessary to constitute open and notorious possession for the purpose of acquiring title by adverse possession."

[2] A single interruption once every five years, under such circumstances as to challenge the right of the adverse claimant, will prevent the acquisition of a title by prescription, for there would then be no period of continuous user for 5 years. It was so held in the case of Trenton Water Power Co. v. Raff, 36 N. J. Law, 335, 338, where the right to maintain a dam by which a portion of the plaintiff's land was flooded was involved, and it was claimed that there had been a maintenance of the dam and a right to flood said land obtained by adverse usage. It was said:

"The proof was, that its maintenance had not been peaceably acquiesced in, and that on one occasion at least, within nineteen years before the trial, it had been torn out by persons who felt aggrieved by its existence. The court should have been asked to leave the question to the jury, whether the old dam had been maintained for the prescriptive period, under such circumstances as would give a right by prescription, with the instruction that if it had been so maintained, the plaintiffs were entitled to damages only for the injury in excess of that which resulted from the old dam."

The acts of the owner must be open and notorious and under a claim of right. Creech

v. Jones, 5 Sneed (37 Tenn.) 631; Maysville & Big Sandy R. Co. v. Holton, 100 Ky. 665, 675, 39 S. W. 27, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1; Nelson v. Johnson, 189 Ky. 815, 226 S. W. 94; Murphy v. Commonwealth, 187 Mass. 361, 371, 73 N. E. 524; Byers v. Danley, 27 Ark. 77, 93; Thomas v. Spencer, 69 Wash. 433, 125 Pac. 361; Brattain v. Conn, 50 Or. 156, 91 Pac. 458. In the last-cited case (Brattain v. Conn, supra) the court held that frequent destruction of a diverting dam, if secret and clandestine, did not interrupt the statute of limitations. In that regard the court stated:

"It clearly appears that for more than 20 years the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest have asserted and exercised the right each year to construct and maintain, whenever necessary, a temporary dam or obstruction in the main channel of the river to divert from 2,000 to 2,500 inches of water into Small creek for irrigation purposes, and without any intimidation from defendants or their predecessors in interest that their right was questioned. It is true that defendant George Conn testifies that he often tore out and removed the dam, but there is no evidence that plaintiffs knew of this fact, or that it was done at a time when they needed the water. It was a clandestine and secret invasion of their rights, and we do not understand that an entry by stealth and without the knowledge of the party in possession is sufficient to break the continuity necessary to constitute an adverse possession or to establish a right by prescription."

The rule in 1 Cyc. pp. 1010, 1011, subdivisions "b" and "c," is cited with approval in Thomas v. Spencer, supra, and applied to a clandestine attempt to toll the statute of limitations by the partial damming of a stream by throwing a few sticks and stones therein.

[3] Without further citation of authorities or critical analysis of those already cited, it is clear that in order to interrupt the running of the statute of limitations, as to flowing water, there must be a resumption of the possession thereof under a claim of right brought home to the adverse claimant either by express notice to that effect or by conduct so notorious and unequivocal as to imply such notice. In other words, the interruption of the possession must rise in dignity and character to that required to initiate an adverse possession. The rule in regard to the latter is stated in Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 508, 517, as follows:

"To constitute adverse possession, the occupation must be open, visible, notorious, and exclusive, and must be retained under a claim of right to hold the land against him who was seized; and the person against whom it is held must have knowledge, or the means of knowledge, of such occupation and claim of right. Such knowledge, or the means by which such knowledge may be attained, must be brought home to the person who was seized or possessed of the land; because the statute proceeds on the ground that he, knowing that a cause of action exists in his favor for the intrusion, yet acquiesces in it, and does not attempt to regain the possession of his land in the mode provided by law. Aug. Lim. §§ 391, 398; 2 Wash. on Real Prop. 490. A clandestine entry or possession will not set the statute in motion, because the owner of the land cannot be said to have acquiesced in the wrongful entry or possession. The owner will not be condemned to lose his land because he has failed to sue for its recovery, when he had no notice that it was held or claimed adversely; but the statute cuts off his remedy only when he has neglected to commence his action beyond the period assigned for it."

See, also, Grigsby v. Clear Lake W. Co., 40 Cal. 396, 406.

[4] The testimony offered in this case is to the effect that Armstrong frequently destroyed the diverting dam in Fitzhugh creek. If the court finds that this was done under a claim of right brought home to the defendants either by express notice to them, or that such destruction resulted in such a resumption of the possession of his riparian rights for such a time as was reasonably calculated to give the defendants, as reasonable men, notice of such claim of right, or of such resumption of possession, then the adverse use of the defendant was interrupted, and if each 5-year period of adverse user was so interrupted—that is, if there was no period of five years of continuous adverse user without such interruption—the defendants would not have prescriptive title as against the riparian owner so interrupting the adverse use.

[5] The defendants only claim the waters of Fitzhugh creek during the early spring and summer before the waters of Mill creek are turned in, and during the season of flood waters. Consequently, in considering the effect of the interruptions which are relied upon by the plaintiffs to break the continuity of use essential to establish title by prescription, it should also be noted that the use does not have to be of a continuous flow in order to establish a prescriptive right. That is to say, the adverse claimant may establish a right to use water intermittently and for part of the irrigating season only. If that right is insisted upon and maintained without interruption, a corresponding prescriptive right arises. This principle is thoroughly established in this state. The latest expression of this court upon that subject is Northern California Power Co., Consolidated, v. Flood (Cal. Sup.) 199 Pac. 315, wherein the court stated as follows:

"A right to the use of water for irrigation of land may be acquired by prescription without showing that the water is actually kept running upon the land all the time. Irrigation, as usually practiced, is required only at intervals during the season. If the claimant takes the water and uses it at the time when it is necessary to do so and does this under claim of right, without molestation by others interested in the stream or ditch, and with their knowledge, actual or implied, it will be sufficient with respect to the continuity of use, although there may be many days or weeks during which he does not use it at all. The evidence leaves the question of the use of the water during the night time uncertain, not showing clearly whether the continuous use spoken of was during the day only or both day and night for the entire irrigating season. The value of water for irrigation is too great in this state to allow a land owner to gain a right thereto for the entire twenty-four hours of each day by using the same for only a half or any other portion of the time less than the whole. If he has used it continuously for a certain period each day long enough to gain a prescriptive right to such use he would have the right only for that period, and he could not lawfully object to the use by others of the flow during the intervening time of each day." (Italics ours.)

In one of our earlier cases (American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 360, 366) it is said:

"The general and established doctrine is that an exclusive and uninterrupted enjoyment of water, in any particular way, for a period corresponding to the time limited by statute within which an action must be commenced for the recovery of the property or of the assumed right held and enjoyed adversely, becomes an adverse enjoyment sufficient to raise a presumption of title as against a right in any other person which might have been, but was not asserted. 3 Kent's Com. 441 to 446; Bealey v. Shaw, 6 East. 214; Shaw v. Crawford, 10 John, 236; John v. Stevens, 3 Vermont, 316; Union Water Co. v. Crary, 25 Cal. 504." (Italics ours.)

In Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 26, 35, 91 Am. Dec. 554, the court said:

"Although the plaintiffs may have had the prior right, yet if they or their grantors allowed the defendant to acquire and hold for five years adverse possession of the water which they had appropriated, or any part thereof, they, to that extent, lost their right by force of the statute. Upon this question, in the Union Water Company v. Crary, 25 Cal. 509, we had occasion to say that 'The right of the first appropriator may be lost, in whole, or in some limited portions, by the adverse possession of another. And when such person has had the continued, uninterrupted, and adverse enjoyment of the watercourse, or of some certain portion of it, during the period limited by the Statute of Limitations for entry upon lands, the law will presume a grant of the right so held and enjoyed by him.'" (Italics ours.)

The decision in the case of Santa Paula Water Works v. Peralta, 113 Cal. 38, 44, 45 Pac. 168, furnishes an illustration of a case in which a right by an adverse user was obtained to use the water for certain days of the week only, during the balance of the week the water being returned to the stream and having been appropriated below. The prescriptive right obtained was commensurate with the use, namely, a certain amount of water for certain days in the week and an additional amount during the whole period as domestic water.

In Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 371, 376, it is said:

"It is usually the case that the amount of water to which the several persons claiming it use are entitled, is measured by inches, according to miner's measurement, or by the capacity of the ditches through which it is conducted from the stream, but there is no reason why the amount may not be measured in some other mode. They hold the amount appropriated by them respectively as they would do had the paramount proprietor granted to each the amount by him appropriated. The right to use the waters, or a certain portion of them, might be granted to one person for certain months, days or parts of days, and to other persons for other specified times. An agriculturist might appropriate the waters of a stream for irrigation during the dry season, and a miner might appropriate them for his purposes during the remainder of the year. And so may several persons appropriate the waters for use during any different periods. There is no difference in principle between appropriations of waters, measured by time, and those measured by volume."

It is clear, then, that right may be gained to use water for certain periods of time as well as for certain amounts measured by volume or by flow, and that the measure of the prescriptive title is the use, under a claim of right adverse to all others, for the period of 5 years. Consequently an interruption during the time that the Mill creek waters were flowing in the Fitzhugh creek was not necessarily an interruption of the adverse right asserted by defendants to the waters of Fitzhugh creek.

As to the flood waters which continued to flow within the banks of Fitzhugh creek, the plaintiffs, as riparian proprietors, had a right to prevent an obstruction to such flow. The defendants, in order to divest this right of plaintiffs to such flood waters, must rely on grant from plaintiffs, or prescription against them, precisely the same as in the case of the ordinary flow of the stream. With respect to the annually recurring flood waters of said creek which do not remain within the banks of the channel which confines the stream in ordinary stages of flow, but which overflow and spread out beyond such banks and over the lands of the plaintiffs, it is conceded that the only benefit which plaintiffs do or can derive from them arises from the fact that it deposits silt which enriches the land. Whether or not the water so escaping from the stream remains a part thereof, subject to the riparian right, or ceases to be subject thereto and becomes the "vagrant water" referred to in Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal Co., 155 Cal. on pages 64, 76, and 77, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391 (see Gray v. Reclamation Dist., 174 Cal. 647, 163 Pac. 1024, as to the effect of this case), is a question which is largely a question of fact, and, as the court below made no findings relating to it, we express no opinion thereon. The findings do not show an intent to include such water in the scope of the decision. The general question is one which is becoming more and more important in this state, and requires careful consideration.

[6] As to defendant Payne's claim to flood waters, it is sufficient to say that he made no separate or special claim thereto as such, and his rights therein depend upon his ability to establish adverse possession for five years of the quantity of water he claims. Gertrude French claims a portion of the flood waters only, and is entitled to such proportion thereof as has been actually diverted by her and put to beneficial use and used adversely during the period of flood waters continuously and without interruption for a period of five years.

It appears from the record that the testimony was very conflicting as to the amount of water used by the defendants and running in their ditches. Some finding of the fact should be made on the next trial.

Judgment reversed.

57 Cal. App. 50

ROSS v. KEATON TIRE & RUBBER CO.
(Civ. 3629.)

1. Landlord and tenant  200(1)—Rental based on value of building costing $31,837 held not to comply with lease providing it should cost "approximately" $21,000.

Under Civ. Code, § 13, providing that words shall be construed "according to the context and the approved usage of the language," where a lease provided for a rental based partly on a percentage of the value of a building to be erected and to cost approximately $21,000, the amount named was not the maximum limit of the cost for estimating rent, but a rental based on a percentage of the cost of a building costing $31,837 was not in accordance with the lease, "approximately" meaning "very nearly, but not absolutely," "about," and is used in the sense of an estimate merely, meaning more or less, but about and near the amount, quantity, or distance specified.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Approximate—Approximately.]

2. Landlord and tenant  200(1)—Finding held not to show that requested changes of plans by a tenant added to cost of a building.

Where a lease provided that a rental was to be based partly on a percentage of the cost of a building to be erected to cost approximately $21,000, a finding that the building, which cost $31,837, was erected according to plans and specifications suggested and approved by defendant and changed from time to time at its special instance and request, and that defendant was fully informed and knew at all times the cost of the building, does not amount to a finding that the changes added to the cost of the building.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚡200(1)—Rule that a written contract should be interpreted against party drawing it held not to apply provision as to amount of rent.

Where a lease prepared by a landlord provided for a rental partly based on a percentage of the cost of a building, which was to be approximately $21,000, the rule that a written contract should be construed against the party preparing it does not apply so as to limit the amount on which the percentage should be based to $21,000, since it was only an estimate, and the lessee contemplated paying a percentage on more than that amount.

4. Landlord and tenant ⚡200(1)—Entry and occupation by lessee held not to waive his right to pay rental based on less than cost of building.

Where a lease provided that rent should be based partly on a percentage of the cost of a building to be erected at a cost of "approximately $21,000," entry and occupation of the premises by a tenant did not waive his right to insist upon a rental based on a sum less than $31,837, the actual cost, since the lease did not limit the amount the landlord might spend on the building; the amount specified being inserted to fix the amount of rent which the tenant would have to pay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Frances K. Ross against the Keaton Tire & Rubber Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, and O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank G. Tyrrell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action in unlawful detainer. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant has appealed.

[1] Plaintiff was the owner of a vacant lot in Los Angeles, and, by a lease prepared by her and executed by the parties on November 29, 1919, she let and demised the same, with a two-story building to be erected thereon, to defendant for a term of 10 years from the completion of the building. The portion of the lease pertinent to the question presented is as follows:

"The party of the first part [plaintiff] does hereby lease to the party of the second part [defendant] * * * her lot, 1337 S. Flower St., Los Angeles, California, with a two-story building to be erected thereon and to cost approximately twenty-one thousand dollars ($21,000.00). In case of building being damaged or destroyed by fire, or other causes, party of the first part is to replace or build, as may be the case, as soon as possible, and party of the second part is to continue the lease for the full term of ten years. * * * Said second party agrees to pay as rent for said premises the sum of 6% net on thirty thousand dollars ($30,000.00), valuation of lot, 8% on cost of buildings, and to pay all taxes. * * * The object of this lease is to absolutely net the owner 6% on lot and 8% on cost of building."

About February 1, 1920, plaintiff commenced the erection of the building, in the design of which she selected an architect, who likewise, as plaintiff's agent, acted as superintendent of construction and the letting of the several contracts therefor, for all of which she expended the sum of $31,837, which the court found was the reasonable cost of the building, which was completed about June 20, 1920, at which time defendant, with plaintiff's consent, took possession thereof and has continued ever since to occupy the same. As payment of the monthly rental, defendant tendered to plaintiff an amount equal to 6 per cent. net on the value of the lot and 8 per cent. net on $21,000, which it claimed was the amount of rent it was required to pay under the terms of the lease. Plaintiff refused to accept this tender and demanded a rental on the building of 8 per cent. based upon the cost thereof as found by the court, plus 6 per cent. on the agreed value of the lot, and upon defendant's refusal to pay the same she on September 15, 1920, served upon defendant a notice to pay the rent within three days or surrender possession of the premises. This action followed defendant's failure to comply with such demand.

The solution of the question presented depends upon an interpretation of the provisions of the lease above quoted, wherein, among other things, it was expressly stipulated that the building which plaintiff was to erect upon the lot, and upon the cost of which defendant was to pay 8 per cent. was "to cost approximately $21,000." Section 13 of the Civil Code provides that words are to be construed "according to the context and the approved usage of the language." The word "approximate" is defined "to come close to, as in quality, degree or quantity; approach closely without coinciding with exactly," or reaching the specified amount or quantity. Bloomington Canning Co. v. Union Can Co., 94 Ill. App. 62. The adverb "approximately" has a different meaning. It is defined as "very nearly, but not absolutely." It is synonymous with and means "about," and is used in the sense of an estimate merely, meaning more or less, but about and near the amount, quantity, or distance specified.

In the absence of other evidence, and having reference to the context and subject-matter of the contract, we think it clearly appears that the term "to cost approximately $21,000" was by the parties employed in the sense thus defined; that is, as an approximate estimate, whether more or less, but about or near the sum specified, and not in the sense, as claimed by appellant, of restricting the cost to a sum not in excess of $21,000, which might be the case if the clause read "to approximate a cost of $21,000," the meaning of which would be to approach closely, but not coinciding with or reaching, the sum specified. On the other hand, and in the absence of evidence affecting the interpretation, the contract cannot be construed to mean that the parties contemplated the construction of a building to cost, as found by the court, more than 50 per cent. in excess of that agreed upon. Certainly plaintiff could not have insisted, over defendant's objection, that a building costing $10,000 would have constituted a compliance with her contract to erect a building to cost approximately $21,000. The case of Vaughan v. Ford, 162 Mich. 37, 127 N. W. 280, involved facts very similar to the instant case. In that case a contention arose over a change made in the plans for the doing of concrete foundation work for a structure, in accordance with which substituted plan the contractor, upon representations of the owner that the cement work called for by such change would be approximately the same as under the original plan, agreed to do the work for the original price. The proof showing that the plan as changed required an excess of 1,049 cubical feet in a total of 170,837 cubical feet, the court held that the work called for by the substituted plan was not approximately the same as that under which the contract was let; the reason assigned therefor being that the difference in the two plans was a matter of mathematical computation, and hence, since the substituted plan was in excess of that called for by the original specifications to the extent of 1,049 cubical feet, the contractor was entitled to compensation therefor. In other words, the difference, though appearing small, was so great that it could not be said to be approximately the same. In deciding the case the court said:

"The word 'approximately' is to be construed with reference to the subject-matter. An estimate of the cost of constructing a building, where uncertain factors enter into the estimate, might well be held to be approximately correct, although the actual cost exceeded the estimated cost by more than the difference in this case."

In the instant case no reason occurs to us why, at the time of the execution of the lease, the cost of the building which plaintiff proposed to erect was not a matter susceptible of an accurate estimate, and the construction thereof let to a competent and responsible contractor for a definite and certain sum. However this may be, and conceding such was not the case and that uncertain factors entered into the estimate, it cannot, we think, be said that $31,837 is approximately $21,000.

[2] The record is brought up in typewritten form, and, though no reference is made thereto in the briefs of the parties, it appears from an examination of the same that soon after the execution of the lease plaintiff began the preparation of plans for the building, which, though under no obligation so to do under the lease, she submitted to defendant, who suggested certain changes therein which it is alleged in the complaint were adopted by plaintiff, the effect of which was to increase the cost of the building to the total sum of $31,837. This allegation was denied by defendant, but, assuming that there might be evidence of acts of defendant which would render it liable for increased cost of the building due to its requests, there is no finding upon such issue, other than the following:

"That said building was erected according to plans and specifications suggested and approved by defendant and changed from time to time at its special instance and request; that defendant was fully informed and knew at all times the cost of said building."

While this finding is responsive to the issue as to whether or not defendant requested changes in the plans, it does not appear therefrom that such changes added one cent to the cost of the building. On the contrary, the effect thereof, as claimed by appellant, might have been to reduce the cost. Neither is there any evidence, so far as we are advised, as to the amount of such increased cost, if any, without which the trial court was not warranted in holding defendant liable therefor.

There appears in the typewritten transcript a number of letters, introduced en masse and marked Exhibit A, to which no reference is made in their briefs by either of the parties. Some of these letters are to and from parties whose connection with the transaction is not made to appear, and, while some of them seem to have reference to the matter in controversy, they are unsigned. It does appear, however, that prior to the commencement of construction differences existed between plaintiff and defendant as to the amount of rent which the latter should pay under said lease and the cost of the building, which were made the subject of correspondence. That defendant was informed by plaintiff on January 29, 1920, that the building, instead of costing $21,000, would cost $25,000, and that upon ascertaining the exact cost she would send defendant a new lease for execution, which she did in fact do. It was not accepted by defendant, who, prior to the letting of the contract, replied to her letter, stating in effect that it stood upon the terms of the lease, but further said:

"Under present conditions it does not seem to be the best time to build, and if you feel that you do not want to carry out the terms of the present lease as signed by you, we believe we would not insist so as to cause you a big loss, and would be inclined to favor you with a release from the present contract."

Now, while clearly of the opinion that appellant is in error in insisting that the lease should be construed as restricting the cost of the building upon which the rental is fixed at 8 per cent. upon an amount not in excess of $21,000, but that such figure was intended as an estimate only, and might be either more or less than said sum, we are likewise of the opinion that the record as presented is insufficient to warrant the conclusion of the court in fixing the sum of $31,837 upon which defendant should be required to pay 8 per cent. Neither is there in the muddled record presented to this court any evidence upon which we can say the parties placed a practical construction upon the terms of the indefinite provision of the lease.

[3] Appellant invokes the rule that a written contract should, in case of doubt, be interpreted against the party who has drawn the contract—in this case the plaintiff. Under our opinion, however, since we hold that it was not the intention of the parties under the terms of the written contract to limit the construction of the building to a cost of $21,000, but that they contemplated the sum so specified merely as an estimate, and that the cost might vary more or less therefrom, such rule is not applicable. It is clear that the building cost more than $21,000; it is likewise, we think, clear that defendant contemplated the possibility of paying the stated percentage on more than said sum. But, while this court upon the record presented is of the opinion that defendant is not chargeable with rent at 8 per cent. upon the cost of the building as found by the court, it is unable, upon the evidence presented and want of sufficient findings, to say just what it should be.

[4] We find no merit in respondent's contention that, regardless of the cost of the building, defendant, by entry and occupation of the same, waived its right to insist upon a rental based upon any less sum than its actual cost. There is nothing in the contract by which plaintiff was limited as to the amount which she might, at her option, expend in the construction of the building. The provision as to cost was inserted for the purpose of fixing the amount of rent which defendant should pay. If it be true that plaintiff expended a greater sum in the erection of the building than that upon which, under a proper interpretation of the contract, defendant was required to pay 8 per cent. as rental, its acceptance of the building did not constitute a waiver of the covenant. It is quite true, as held in Weed

v. Lindsay & Morgan, 88 Ga. 686, 15 S. E. 836, 20 L. R. A. 33, that if plaintiff had erected a building at a cost of $10,000 only, and defendant had accepted the same, it would have constituted a waiver as to the erection of a building costing $21,000, upon which, however, under the terms of the lease, it could only have been required to pay rent upon the actual cost. While no restrictions are imposed upon plaintiff as to the amount which she might expend in the erection of the building, nevertheless the amount of rent which she could exact from defendant as tenant was restricted to a certain percentage upon an amount to be ascertained under a proper interpretation of the lease.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered, if the parties are so advised, wherein, if had, the trial court is directed to construe the clause specifying a building "to cost approximately $21,000" as an agreed estimate of such cost, the variation from which should be determined upon proper and competent evidence received touching the surrounding circumstances of the transaction; practical construction of the lease by the parties, if any; amount of increased cost of the building due to defendant's acts in changing the plans and specifications, if any, and for which, under the circumstances made to appear, it should be required to respond; and such other evidence as the court may deem proper.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 16, 1922.)

1. Searches and seizures ☞7—Fourth and Fifth Amendments to United States Constitution apply only to seizures by federal agencies.

Const. U. S. amends. 4 and 5, relating to searches and seizures, only apply to the federal government and its agencies.

2. Constitutional law ☞12—Federal constitutional amendments apply only to federal government, and do not limit power of states unless clearly indicated.

United States constitutional amendments apply only to the federal government, and constitute no limitation on the power of the states unless a contrary purpose is clearly stated or implied by the terms in which they are expressed.

3. Criminal law ☞395—Articles unlawfully seized properly admitted in evidence.

In a prosecution for burglary in the second degree, the fact that articles claimed to have been taken were seized from the person of accused without warrant in violation of Const. art. 1, § 19, did not render their introduction in evidence error, although the court overruled the motion of accused to have the articles returned to him.

4. Criminal law ⇨1134(9)—Denial of motion to return articles unlawfully seized not reviewable on appeal.

In a prosecution for burglary in the second degree, denial of a motion to return to accused articles unlawfully seized will not be reviewed on appeal from judgment of conviction.

5. Criminal law ⇨1166½(12) — Remarks by court as to manner of questioning prospective juror not prejudicial.

The court's remarks while selecting jury that defendant's interrogation of a prospective juror was unfair held not prejudicial where the juror was excused upon peremptory challenge, and defendant did not exhaust such challenges.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

H. A. Watson was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter C. Davison, of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Upon an information charging him therewith, defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the second degree. He has appealed from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

That the evidence is ample to justify the verdict is not questioned. It appears that by means of a pass-key the house of J. M. Oakey was burglariously entered in his absence in the daytime, and a pair of socks, necktie, and a child's bank containing a small sum of money stolen therefrom. Shortly thereafter defendant was apprehended, and upon a search of his person, had without warrant, a bunch of pass-keys, the stolen necktie and socks, together with a small sum of money, were discovered in his possession.

When the case was called for trial defendant, pursuant to notice theretofore given, moved the court that an order be made requiring the articles so taken from defendant to be returned to him. The motion was denied, and, over defendant's objection, the articles were received in evidence, together with testimony that he had possession of the pass-keys. He insists that the ruling of the court in denying his motion and permitting the introduction of such evidence was in violation of his rights guaranteed by the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and sections 13 and 19 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, in support of which he cites the case of People v. Mayen, 35 Cal. App. Dec. p. 442.

[1, 2] We may dismiss from consideration the provisions of the federal Constitution, for the reason that it is well settled that the Fourth and Fifth Amendments thereof, invoked by defendant, apply to searches and seizures only when made by the federal government and its agencies (Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 34 Sup. Ct. 341, 58 L. Ed. 652, L. R. A. 1915B, 834, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1177; Barron v. City of Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 8 L. Ed. 672; Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 76, 15 L. Ed. 269), and constitutes no limitation on the power of the states. Indeed, the rule announced applies to all the amendments, unless a contrary purpose is clearly stated or implied by the terms in which they are expressed.

[3-4] As to the application of sections 13 and 19 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, it must be conceded that the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in the case of People v. Mayen, supra, lends strong support to appellant's contention. That case, however, after decision by the Court of Appeal, was transferred to the Supreme Court, which, in an elaborate opinion (found in 205 Pac. 435), discussed the question presented by appellant in the instant case at great length, among other things saying that "evidence which is pertinent to the issue is admissible, although it may have been procured in an irregular or even in an illegal manner," and that in a criminal prosecution the action of the trial court in denying a timely application by the defendant for a return of the articles illegally seized from him, and later used as evidence against him, counter to his objection, cannot be reviewed on appeal from the judgment of conviction. Hence, conceding the articles were wrongfully and illegally taken from defendant's possession, and in violation of his constitutional rights, the ruling of the court in refusing to make an order that the same be returned to him, cannot be reviewed on this appeal, which is from the judgment pronounced upon his conviction in a criminal action. The Mayen Case, as decided by the Supreme Court, is an authority not only supporting the ruling of the trial court in receiving the articles in evidence, but also in support of the proposition that, on appeal from the judgment pronounced herein, defendant is not entitled to a review of the alleged erroneous ruling of the court in denying the motion.

[5] While selecting the jury the court, though not restricting the examination, gave expression to the opinion that defendant's interrogation of one of the prospective jurors was misleading and unfair. This action on the part of the court is assigned as prejudicial misconduct. There is no merit in the contention. Not only was the juror excused upon the peremptory challenge of defendant, who did not exhaust his right to such challenges, but, conceding the court should have refrained from criticising the question which it permitted to be asked and answered, it is impossible to perceive how the substantial rights of defendant could in the slightest degree have been prejudiced by reason thereof.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS et al. (Civ. 4114.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 11, 1922.)

1. Pleading $\S$ 406(5)—Probative facts alleged held merely defective allegation of marriage, sufficient in absence of attack.

In a complaint to annul a judgment for divorce which did not directly allege that the plaintiff was the wife of defendant, but which alleged numerous probative facts to that effect, the marriage was defectively pleaded and not entirely omitted, which is sufficient in the absence of an attack thereon.

2. Divorce $\S$ 167—In suit to vacate divorce for fraud, defendant cannot allege plaintiff was legal wife of another.

In a suit by a wife to annul for fraud a decree granting divorce to the husband, a cross-complaint by the husband, alleging that the wife had been formerly married to another and was not legally divorced from him, was not a necessary or proper pleading on behalf of the defendant.

3. Action $\S$ 50(4)—Suit to annul divorce for fraud and to recover damages from husband and subsequent wife does not improperly join two causes of action.

A suit by divorced wife against her husband and the woman he subsequently married to annul the divorce for fraud, and to recover from both defendants the damages occasioned to plaintiff, does not improperly join two causes of action.

4. Divorce $\S$ 167—Action to annul divorce, instead of motion, held proper remedy.

Where the divorced wife did not know of the entry of the judgment of divorce for more than two years after it became final, a suit in equity attacking the decree, instead of a motion, was the proper remedy.

5. Divorce $\S$ 167—Plaintiff held not guilty of laches in suit to vacate divorce.

Where a divorced wife did not learn of the entry of the final decree until more than two years thereafter and brought her suit to annul the decree for fraud within a month after learning of the decree, she was not guilty of laches which barred her right to relief.

6. Divorce $\S$ 79—Allegation in affidavit for publication that wife has "left the state" is not synonymous with statement that she has "departed from the state."

An allegation in an affidavit for publication of divorce summons that the wife has "left the state" is not synonymous with the phrase "departed from the state," used in Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 412.

7. Divorce $\S$ 79—Affidavit destination of wife was unknown held material and false.

Where the affidavit for service of divorce summons alleged that the defendant's wife had "left" the state, instead of using the word "departed," as found in the statute, the further allegation that her destination was unknown, if it could be given effect to make the word "left" equivalent to the word "departed," was material and was false, where the evidence showed the affiant procured a pass for his wife to her destination and to that extent was a fraud upon the court.

8. Divorce $\S$ 79—Concealment of fact that husband was guardian for incompetent wife is fraud on the court.

A husband who had been appointed the guardian of his wife on adjudication of her incompetency owed to her and to the court a special duty and was guilty of a fraud in making affidavit for service of divorce summons upon his wife without revealing to the court the fact that she had been adjudicated an incompetent and that he was her guardian.

9. Divorce $\S$ 197—Attorney's fee cannot be recovered as damages in suit to annul divorce.

In a suit to annul a decree of divorce for fraud, the reasonable fee of plaintiff's attorney cannot be recovered as damages, since an attorney's fee was not an element of damages at common law and has not been made such by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1021, or any other statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Annabel Williams, adjudicated to be an incompetent person, by Lottie Rothman, her next friend, against Frank D. Williams and another, to annul a judgment for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

A. J. Woolsey, of Oakland, and Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Henry B. Lister, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a decree annulling the judgment which awarded the defendant Frank D. Williams a divorce from this plaintiff.

Several years prior to the 17th day of February, 1913, Annabel Williams and Frank D. Williams were married and had been living in Oakland. On the date last mentioned they were occupying a house, 1561 Eighth street. At that time the defendant Katherine Specula was residing with them as a member of their household. A short time previous to that date, Mrs. Williams became afflicted with some sickness, and she seems to have been in a very debilitated state of health. While in that condition of health her husband filed a complaint charging her with being an insane person. A hearing was had, and on the 17th day of February, 1913, she was adjudged an insane person and was committed to the state hospital at Agnews and her husband was appointed guardian of her person and estate. She remained an inmate of the state hospital until December, 1915, when two of her sisters came to California, and while they were here the plaintiff was taken out of the asylum temporarily. A little later the husband consented that the plaintiff might accompany her sisters to Dodge City, Kan., provided that he should remain her guardian; and at the same time he promised to make a monthly remittance to his wife at Dodge City, Kan. As a part of this plan and for the purpose of carrying it out, the defendant Williams obtained for his wife a pass to Dodge City, Kan. The arrangement seems to have been amicably made, and good feeling seems to have prevailed all around. When the wife was about to leave, the husband brought her a box of candy and a pass to Dodge City, Kan., and, speaking to the plaintiff's sisters, said:

"Girls, you take my wife East, and, just as quick as she is able to come back, wire me and I will give you her fare. What is the use of taking her things? Because it will not be very long I am sure until she is back in her home."

Thereupon the wife left for Dodge City. The remittance was made monthly for three months and then it was stopped. On September 13, 1917, the defendant Williams filed in the superior court of San Francisco a verified complaint charging his wife with desertion. At the same time he filed an affidavit and took out an order for the publication of the summons. The action was brought on for a hearing on the 26th day of December, 1917. The husband appeared as a witness in his own behalf, testifying that he was a resident of San Francisco. He produced as a corroborating witness Katherine Specula, who testified that her residence was 1561 Eighth street, Oakland. On that day an interlocutory decree of divorce was entered, and thereafter, on December 28, 1918, at Los Angeles, the defendants Frank D. Williams and Katherine Specula were married and thereafter made their home in the house at 1561 Eighth street, Oakland.

After this plaintiff went to Dodge City, Kan. Her husband did not write to her personally, but did write to some of the members of her family residing in Kansas. The plaintiff did not write to her husband, but a few letters were written to him by members of the plaintiff's family. The exact dates of each of these letters is not clear, but the testimony seems to indicate that a sister-in-law wrote a letter for the plaintiff and sent it to the plaintiff's husband in August, 1918. Whatever may be the date of the letter, the contents consisted of a request for permission that the plaintiff might return to the state of California. The letter was answered by the husband's attorney. The answer declined the permission and stated that "Mr. Williams had other obligations." No other correspondence was exchanged, and the plaintiff, without permission, returned to the state of California on the 19th day of February, 1920. After she arrived here, she learned of the changes that had been made in her affairs, and on March 10, 1920, she commenced this action.

[1] The defendants advert to the rule of law that a bill in equity must allege and show that it would be against conscience to allow the enforcement of the judgment in the divorce case, or that it would work injury or injustice to the plaintiff in some specific manner. They then urge the point that in her complaint the plaintiff does not allege that Annabel Williams and Frank D. Williams were ever married, or that they are husband and wife. It is true that there is no direct and concise allegation on that subject, but many probative facts are set forth in such a manner that we think the plaintiff's pleading is an example of facts defectively pleaded, but not an instance of a failure to state sufficient facts. If the two persons were never married, it was a very simple matter to have made the attack when the evidence was being introduced; but no such attack was made. Attached to the bill of exceptions, the appellant has a list of assignments of error which include 22 attacks on the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings. But in all those attacks there is not a word on the subject of marriage or no marriage.

[2] The defendant Frank D. Williams filed a cross-complaint setting up facts showing that the plaintiff had formerly been the wife of one John Kelly, and that she was not legally divorced from him. That paper might have been properly filed by John Kelly, but it was not a necessary or proper pleading on behalf of the defendant Williams.

In plaintiff's complaint she gave undue importance to certain matters regarding a charge of insanity which was filed against her by Frank D. Williams. The appellants did not move to have such matter stricken out, and now devote considerable portions of their briefs to those matters. They are quite immaterial so far as this action is concerned, except as may hereinafter appear.

[3] The appellants also make the point that there are two causes of action improperly joined in the complaint. They assert that the complaint charges a cause of action against Frank D. Williams to vacate a judgment alleged to have been obtained by fraud and also to recover damages from him, whereas the cause of action against the defendant Specula is to recover damages only. The attack is entirely without merit. San Diego Water Co. v. Flume Co., 108 Cal. 549, 556, 41 Pac. 495, 29 L. R. A. 839.

[4] The interlocutory decree of divorce of which complaint is made was filed December 26, 1917; the final decree was filed December 27, 1918. The plaintiff alleged that she did not know of the entry of the judgment until she returned to the state of California on the 19th day of February, 1920. This action was commenced March 10, 1920. The appellants claim that the plaintiff should have proceeded by motion instead of by action. Under the foregoing facts the respondent did not err in making her attack by filing a suit in equity instead of by motion.

[5] It is further claimed that the plaintiff was guilty of laches. The facts above recited do not sustain the claim. Neither is the claim supported by the fact that in or about the month of August, 1918, when the plaintiff had written for permission to return to the state of California, Williams replied by a letter written by his attorney that Williams "had other obligations."

The affidavit for publication of summons in the divorce case is as follows:

"That defendant left the state of California on the 25th day of November, 1915, for some place without the state of California unknown to affiant; that the last time affiant heard from defendant was by letter from one of her relatives dated March 29, 1916; that the present whereabouts of defendant is now unknown to affiant, but affiant has been informed and verily believes that defendant is now residing somewhere in the state of Kansas; that a summons was duly issued out of this court to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, with directions to said sheriff to serve the same upon defendant, and that said sheriff has returned the same to the clerk of this court with his return thereon indorsed to the effect that the said defendant could not be found in the said city and county of San Francisco."

It will be noted it does not purport to rest on that part of section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure referring to persons (1) who reside out of the state, or (2) cannot after due diligence be found within the state, or (3) conceals himself to avoid the service of summons; but it does purport to rest on that part of the statute that refers to a person who "has departed from the state."

[6] Let us now examine the affidavit to see how it squares with the call of the statute. The language is as follows:

"That defendant left the state of California on the 25th day of November, 1915, for some place without the state of California unknown to affiant; that the last time that affiant heard from defendant was from one of her relatives dated March 29, 1916; that the present whereabouts of defendant is now unknown to affiant, but affiant has been informed and verily believes that defendant is now residing somewhere in the state of Kansas."

It will be noted that the statute uses the word "departed," but the affidavit uses the word "left." The two words are not synonymous. Pezzoni v. Pezzoni, 38 Cal. App. 209, 175 Pac. 801.

[7] If, for the purpose of strengthening the meaning of the word "left" and to give it something of the significance of the word "departed," we give some force and effect to the additional language contained in the affidavit, then the words "for some place without the state of California unknown to affiant" become material. But those words were false. Under the uncontradicted testimony, the defendant knew where the plaintiff was going when she left the state of California because at that time he obtained for her a pass to Dodge City, Kan. That portion of the affidavit "that the present whereabouts of defendant is now unknown to affiant, but affiant has been informed and verily believes that defendant is now residing somewhere in the state of Kansas," is not helpful. The "present whereabouts," etc., is not responsive to any call of the statutory provisions "has departed from the state." The statement on information and belief, "that defendant is now residing somewhere in the state of Kansas," is not, properly speaking, an affidavit. The false representation above referred to invalidated the affidavit, and the affidavit was to that extent a fraud on the trial court. Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 77 Pac. 1007.

[8] As the defendant Williams was the guardian and husband of the plaintiff, the highest duty was owing from him to her. As the defendant Williams was, as guardian, an officer of the court, a special duty was owing by him to the court. When he did not call to the attention of the trial court either in his complaint, or in the affidavit accompanying it, the fact that he was suing his ward, and that his ward was an incompetent person on whom a summons might not legally be served, he was guilty of concealment, another fraudulent act. Silva v. Santos, 138 Cal. 536, 71 Pac. 703; Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. 900, 902. It is clear, therefore, that the evidence sustains the findings.

[9] In her complaint the plaintiff pleaded:

"That, by reason of the wrongful acts of defendants herein in obtaining said fraudulent judgment of divorce, this plaintiff has been delayed and prevented from proceeding with an action against F. B. Williams defendant herein for her maintenance and support and has been compelled to hire an attorney to vacate said judgment of divorce. That the reasonable value of the services of her attorney for such services is the sum of $500."

As supporting the above allegations, on the trial she introduced evidence of the reasonable value of her attorney's fee and no other evidence. The trial court found the above allegation to be true and awarded damages as prayed. It thus appears that the theory of the pleader was that she was entitled to recover the attorney fee as an element of damage. Such was not the rule at common law. 1 Sedgwick on Damages, sec. 229. No statute in California has changed that rule. Code Civ. Proc. § 1021; Grannis v. Superior Court, 143 Cal. 630, 633, 77 Pac. 647. The judgment rendered by the trial court is modified by striking out that portion that awarded judgment against the defendants for damages in the sum of $500. The respondent is awarded her costs on appeal.

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

SESSIONS v. PACIFIC IMPROVEMENT CO.
et al. (Civ. 3815.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. March 10, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 8, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 9, 1922.)

1. Brokers ⚡53—Broker must show himself the efficient cause of sale.

Broker, seeking commission under contract entitling him thereto on sale resulting through "his negotiations or efforts," was required to show that he was the efficient cause of the sale.

2. Brokers ⚡52—Contract entitling broker to commission on sale which originated with him or on which he is employed construed.

Contract entitling broker to a commission on sale "which originated with you or upon which you are employed" entitled broker to commission regardless of whether he merely found the purchaser to whom the sale was made, or himself negotiated the sale, since a broker may originate sale without carrying it to completion.

3. Brokers ⚡52—Broker's contract held not applicable merely to services being performed at time of its execution.

Contract, entitling broker to commission on sale "upon which you are employed," held not limited to a sale resulting from services being rendered at the date of the agreement.

4. Brokers ⚡53—Contract construed so as to secure to broker, who has been procuring cause of sale, the payment of his commissions.

Wherever there is justification for treating the broker as the procuring cause of the sale, the law leans to that construction of the contract and to that interpretation of the facts of the case and the acts of the parties which will best secure to the broker the payment of his commissions.

5. Brokers ⚡53—When broker is predominating effective cause of sale.

A broker, to be the predominating effective cause of a sale, must set in motion a chain of events which, without break in their continuity, cause the buyer and seller to come to terms as the proximate cause of his peculiar activities; the mere fact that he contributes indirectly or incidentally to the sale by imparting information which tends to arouse interest being insufficient.

6. Brokers ⚡53—Entitled to commissions where procuring cause, though negotiations were completed through some one else.

A broker, who is in fact the primary procuring cause, will not be deprived of his commission merely because negotiations were completed through some one else, even perhaps without broker having himself met or communicated personally with the buyer.

7. Appeal and error ⚡999(1)—Determination of question of fact by jury not disturbed on appeal.

Determination of question of fact by the jury will not be disturbed on appeal.

8. Brokers ⚡53—Broker held procuring cause of sale.

Where broker conducted negotiations with shipbuilding corporation for sale of site for shipbuilding yard, and the land was eventually purchased, at the price and on the terms named by broker to the shipbuilding corporation, with money furnished by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, on the advice of the shipbuilding corporation, to enable the shipbuilding corporation to take active management of shipyard and to build ships under orders of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, to facilitate the construction of ships during the World War, the broker was the procuring cause of the sale though the sale was consummated between owner and the Fleet Corporation.

9. Brokers ⚡50—Under ordinary brokerage contract broker must effect sale within limit of time granted.

A broker with a contract in the ordinary form must effect a sale within the limit of time granted, to be entitled to a commission.

10. Brokers ⚡50—Broker, who was procuring cause of sale, entitled to commission, though sale was effected after termination of contract.

Where a brokerage contract provided for termination thereof on 30 days' notice, the mere fact that the sale was completed more than 30 days after owner's notice terminating agreement, but expressing a willingness to pay broker a "commission on all sales * * * which originates with you or for which in the judgment of the directors you are responsible," did not deprive broker, who was the procuring cause of the sale, of the right to commission.

11. Corporations ⚡289—Bound by contract employing broker, signed by de facto general manager without written authority.

Contract employing broker, signed by acting general manager of the corporation, held to bind the corporation notwithstanding absence of written authorization to sign contract, since a de facto general manager may bind a corporation without express written authority.

12. Brokers ⇐63(1)—May recover in assumpsit by showing prevention of performance.

A broker may recover from owner in assumpsit by showing prevention of performance.

13. Assumpsit, action of ⇐6(1)—Broker's contract cannot be set up to defeat implied assumpsit.

In broker's action in assumpsit for damages caused by prevention of performance, the broker's contract cannot be set up to defeat the implied assumpsit.

14. Assumpsit, action of ⇐25—Broker's contract admissible in action in assumpsit based on prevention of performance.

In broker's action in assumpsit for damages caused by prevention of performance, the broker's contract is admissible in evidence to show how the cause arose, and to supply a measure of damages.

15. Brokers ⇐86(1)—Evidence held sufficient for submission of question of prevention of performance to jury.

In broker's action in assumpsit based on prevention of performance, evidence held sufficient for submission of question of prevention of performance to jury.

16. Brokers ⇐82(1)—In broker's action in assumpsit based on prevention of performance, allegation that sum demanded was reasonable value of service was unnecessary.

In broker's action in assumpsit, based on prevention of performance, in which the broker relied on the rate of compensation specified by the contract as the standard of the value of his services, it was not essential to allege that the sum demanded was the reasonable value of the services.

17. Pleading ⇐369(1)—Plaintiff not required to elect between count seeking commission and count in assumpsit based on prevention of performance.

Broker, suing owner for commission in one count and in assumpsit based on prevention of performance in another count, was not required to elect between the two counts, but could submit entire case to jury, permitting jury to decide which count was supported by the evidence.

18. Trial ⇐330(5)—General verdict in action involving two counts will not be disturbed, where evidence supports verdict on either count.

Where complaint contained two counts, and the jury rendered a general verdict and the evidence supports a verdict on either count, the verdict and the judgment entered thereon must stand.

19. Brokers ⇐65(4)—Broker held not to have forfeited right to commission by accepting employment from purchaser.

Civil engineer, who was procuring cause of sale of land to be used for shipbuilding yard to Emergency Fleet Corporation, did not forfeit his right to commission, under contract entitling him thereto on sale of land, by accepting employment with the government's engineers after the Fleet Corporation had obtained an option, where his services consisted in making the land more available for such purpose; there being no conflict between such services and his duty toward the owner.

20. Trial ⇐252(1)—Refusal of instruction not supported by evidence held proper.

Refusal of instruction not supported by the evidence held proper.

21. Appeal and error ⇐1064(4)—Instruction that words may be construed not reversible error for failure to positively declare the meaning.

Instruction that words used in a contract "may be construed as meaning," etc., without positively declaring the meaning, held not reversible error; any defect being formal.

22. Trial ⇐296(2)—Instruction, submitting question as to broker's right to commission, held sufficient in view of other instructions.

In broker's action for commission, instruction, entitling broker to commission if the sale resulted from negotiations conducted by him "in pursuance of" specified letter, held not objectionable for failure to specify what constituted service pursuant to the letter, in view of other instructions charging jury fully as to what performance was required as the basis of recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by George L. Sessions against the Pacific Improvement Company, a corporation, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. C. Chapman, of Oakland, and James F. Peck and Alan C. Van Fleet, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gorrill & Trowbridge and Cushing & Cushing, all of San Francisco, and C. E. Snook and Everett J. Brown, both of Oakland, for respondent.

JOHNSON, Justice pro tem. This is an action for the recovery of $30,000 with interest from September 11, 1918, claimed by plaintiff to be payable to him by reason of the sale of a tract of land comprising 156 acres and forming part of a parcel known as tract 30, situated in the Oakland Harbor, and belonging to the defendants. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the full amount of his claim against both defendants. From the judgment thereupon entered the defendants have appealed.

The land in question was conveyed on September 11, 1918, to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation for the sum of $1,000,000; and plaintiff claims a commission of 3 per cent.

The property stood of record in the name of the defendant Oakland Water Front Company. That defendant, however, held 434/779 of the land in trust for its codefendant Pacific Improvement Company, and this latter corporation owned about two-fifths of the capital stock of the Oakland Water Front Company.

The tract adjoins another parcel carved out of tract 30, which had previously been sold by the defendants to the Union Iron Works, and upon which was located the so-called Alameda plant of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, one of the instrumentalities used by the United States government in providing itself with ships during the war. The purchase made by the Emergency Fleet Corporation was for the purpose of establishing a shipyard to be known as the Liberty Shipyard, for use by the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, in conjunction with its own plant, with a view to speedy augmentation of the supply of ships, then so urgently needed for the transport of troops and stores to the seat of war in Europe.

Acting under a contract which will presently be mentioned, plaintiff had carried on extended negotiations with representatives of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation between June, 1917, and April, 1918; and while these negotiations were undeniable links in the chain of causation, yet it is contended by defendants that plaintiff was not the immediate instrument through whom the sale to the Emergency Fleet Corporation was ultimately effected. It is chiefly upon this ground that plaintiff's claim to compensation is resisted by the defendants.

The defendants owned extensive areas of marsh and tide lands along the Oakland estuary, which they were desirous of marketing; and in furtherance of that design they took plaintiff into their employ in 1915, agreeing to pay him a stated monthly salary and a commission of 2½ per cent. of the proceeds derived from sales of land made with his aid. Plaintiff is a civil engineer by profession; and he came to this service with special knowledge of the property, acquired during a business association of almost a decade with his father, a specialist in such lands, from whom also had been transmitted to plaintiff a storehouse of information and data which enabled him to render, with respect to these lands, a unique service.

The employment of plaintiff on the terms mentioned continued until July 1, 1917; and plaintiff's duties pertained to the work of dredging, reclamation and development of the properties, combined with endeavors to find purchasers. The lands were partly submerged, and considerable reclamation work had to be done in order to prepare them for sale. For the purpose of giving access to ships and providing other facilities, it was necessary to dredge waterways, deepen channels, and impound filling material, and of all this work plaintiff had charge.

During plaintiff's original employment and by his aid the Alameda plant of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation was sold by defendants to the Union Iron Works in March, 1917. From a time antedating plaintiff's engagement the two defendants have had a common office in the Crocker building in San Francisco, and their administrative work has been done by a single staff of clerks. The directorates of the companies, while not identical in membership, have had a majority in common; and throughout the period of plaintiff's service the office management of both companies was in the hands of S. F. B. Morse. Officially he was the general manager of the Pacific Improvement Company and the secretary of the Oakland Water Front Company, and actually, as he himself testified and as the evidence otherwise shows, he was "the man in charge of the business of both companies."

Such was the state of affairs when on June 21, 1917, a new contract of employment was made with plaintiff, evidenced by the following letter written on a letter sheet of the Pacific Improvement Company:

Pacific Improvement Company,
Crocker Building, San Francisco.

June 21, 1917.

Geo. L. Sessions, Esq., 401 Crocker Building, San Francisco, California—Dear Sir: Your present connection with the Pacific Improvement Company, whereby you receive a certain salary, terminates the first of July. After that, you will work on the sale of the Oakland Water Front Company property on a commission basis.

We will pay you a commission of three per cent. (3%) on any sale that results through your negotiations, or efforts, or which originates with you, or upon which you are employed.

Until further notice we will not appoint any other agent or agents. This arrangement is subject to cancellation upon (1) month's notice.

Yours very truly, S. F. B. Morse,
SFBM/GP General Manager.

This new arrangement became effective on July 1, 1917, and under it plaintiff continued to render the same character of service as before. Apparently the only change made in the relation between him and the defendants was that he no longer received a stated salary, and in case of a sale he became entitled to a somewhat larger commission.

The land in question possessed a location which was pronounced "an ideal shipyard" by Mr. Tynan, the chief local representative of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation; and plaintiff bent his energies toward putting the land into condition for ready sale. Under his direction plans and surveys for dredging operations were made and reclamation work was pressed forward. At the same time plaintiff kept the attention of the representatives of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation fastened on the property, and presented detailed information in a form which pictured the peculiar merits of the tract for shipbuilding purposes.

While these negotiations were being conducted, a small sale of a neighboring parcel was made in October, 1917, by plaintiff for defendants, for which plaintiff received the commission stipulated in his contract. And it is not without significance that while the Oakland Water Front Company disputes the authority of Mr. Morse to act for it as manager, yet the check given to plaintiff for the amount of his commission was the check of that company.

With respect to the tract in question, plaintiff between June, 1917, and April, 1918, had frequent meetings with Harrison S. Robinson, attorney for the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, and with J. R. Christy, manager of its Alameda plant. Through them maps, surveys, and other appropriate data prepared under plaintiff's direction were brought to the attention of Joseph J. Tynan, who had general charge of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation's interest about San Francisco Bay. In consequence of plaintiff's activities both Robinson and Christy became impressed with the superior advantages of the property; and their opinions, communicated to Tynan, had a potent influence in leading him to recommend the purchase by the government.

While plaintiff was constantly urging that the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation should purchase the property for itself, such was not the thought in the minds of those who were speaking for that company. In January, 1918, Christy told plaintiff that the Bethlehem Corporation would probably not buy the tract, but that he wanted to find out about the land for the Fleet Corporation.

In February the Bethlehem Corporation and the Oakland Water Front Company arranged to join in a dredging operation to improve the launching facilities in front of their respective lands; and, a certain permit of the city council of Alameda being necessary, there was presented to the council, through the Bethlehem Corporation, a letter from A. F. Pillsbury, the district officer of the United States Shipping Board, asking favorable action on the part of the council in the interest of the government's shipbuilding program. Plaintiff attended the sessions of the council and assisted in getting the permit.

The dredging contract, made by the Bethlehem Corporation and the Oakland Water Front Company with a dredging company under the supervision of plaintiff, was executed March 18th. In so far as the defendants' tract was concerned, the work contracted for tended to enhance the salability of the land for shipping uses. It is not inconsequential, therefore, that on the very day the dredging contract was signed Mr. Robinson, the attorney for the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, called at the office of the defendants, and asked plaintiff for a price on the property in question, saying that he was not inquiring for the Bethlehem Corporation, but for other interests which he himself could not then identify. Plaintiff, in the presence of the assistant secretary of the Oakland Water Front Company, named $1,000,000, and on the following day Morse notified Robinson that the price quoted by plaintiff was approved. This offer was coupled with the condition that the purchaser should assume the expenses for the dredging work already undertaken. Before ratifying the price quoted, Mr. Morse had telephoned to, and received the assent of, Mr. Hammond, a director of both the defendants, who was regarded as having the controlling voice on the question of price, and in his conversation with Hammond, Morse informed him that the sale would be subject to a 3 per cent. commission to plaintiff, Immediately after the conversation with Robinson, Morse instructed plaintiff to make no further quotations to brokers on lands of the Oakland Water Front Company, and a little later Morse informed plaintiff that an offer of $500,000 had been made through Christy to Hammond. This offer plaintiff advised Morse not to accept.

At this juncture there was launched on March 21st the portentous spring drive of the German army through the allied line, the impulse of which, continuing to April 1st, made that Easter season probably the darkest the world has ever seen, and led Gen. Haig to declare that the allies were with their back against a wall. Straightway the United States proclaimed its determination to quicken mightily the transport of troops, and the Emergency Fleet Corporation girded itself for the task of speeding the building of ships. In this posture of affairs the Bethlehem Corporation's agents did not confine themselves to inquiries concerning tract 30, but investigated as well other sites about the bay which might be available for government use. While matters were proceeding in this fashion, plaintiff received on April 3d the following letter:

Pacific Improvement Company,
Crocker Building, San Francisco.

April 3, 1918.

Mr. George L. Sessions, Office. Dear Sir: This will give you notice that the arrangement which I made with you in letter of June 21, 1917, is terminated.

Hereafter, until further notice, you will be paid three per cent. commission on any sales made of the Oakland Water Front Company properties in which this company is interested which originate with you, or for which, in the judgment of the directors, you are responsible. Any offers which come to us direct, or sales which result as a direct offer to us in which the directors feel you have not had an important part, you will not receive a commission, or if you are compensated the amount of the compensation shall rest entirely in the hands of the directors of the company.

Very truly yours,

[Signed] S. F. B. Morse,
S. F. B. M/GP General Manager.

On receipt of this letter plaintiff expressed to Mr. Morse dissatisfaction with its terms, and called to Morse's mind the negotiations already had with the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, saying that he believed a sale through Robinson and Christy would soon come about. By reason of plaintiff's unwillingness to assent to the changes proposed, he "declined to develop new service under that agreement," as he tells us, and about April 16th he moved from the office of the defendants. He did not, however, abandon the negotiations previously initiated. At various times after leaving the office plaintiff called on Robinson, and discussed with him the reclamation work then going on and the subsoil conditions.

Thus matters continued without any new developments until early in May, 1918, when J. W. Powell, vice president and general manager of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, visited San Francisco. Powell had been at the Alameda plant of his company about six months previously, at which time Christy had called his attention to this portion of tract 30; and on this occasion in May Powell's visit was in part with a view to informing himself concerning additional shipyard space, which might be acquired through the Emergency Fleet Corporation for the operations of his company. And he told Christy that the government was considering the construction of an immense shipyard, and that he was going to submit data to the officials of the government. In their conversation Christy stated to Powell that tract 30 was probably the best and most available site around the bay, and its merits were discussed together by Powell, Tynan, and Christy. As Mr. Tynan testified, the matter of the purchase of tract 30 "got very serious when there was a possibility of the Emergency Fleet Corporation putting in a shipyard there." This was because such increase of facilities would mean increased work for the Shipbuilding Corporation.

Realizing that Robinson had a much more intimate knowledge of the details of previous negotiations, Tynan had Robinson join Powell and himself at the Alameda plant. The substance of Robinson's conference at that time is best told in his own words:

"Mr. Powell said, 'I understand you have a site here for a big shipyard,' we then standing at the end of the wharf, fitting up wharf on the Alameda plant. From the end of that you could look over the balance of tract 30. He said, 'The Fleet Corporation is pretty nearly determined that they must put themselves in a position to build as speedily as possible a large fleet to transport—for the carrying of troops; that is the critical thing that is coming—and they want to build extensions to existing yards, in order that the building operations may proceed with the greatest possible rapidity, and it has been suggested by Mr. Tynan and Mr. Christy, and I understand by you'—said Mr. Powell—that this site here," pointing out over the rest of that tract 30, 'is well fitted for the purpose named.' The conversation continued. I cannot remember, of course, all that was said, and then Mr. Powell asked me if I had—we discussed the depths and all of the features, the site, the foundation, the water front, whether he could get 16 slips, building berths, in along the front, or adequacy of the remaining space for fitting up wharves; the matter of getting railroad transportation into the yards; where the lines of steam railway were; the matter of street car transportation for workmen; the matter of getting fuel oil; getting electric power and gas for manufacturing purposes—all of those various features of the site were discussed. And Mr. Powell asked me if I had any written data or formal data of the matter which he could take back with him. I told him that I had in my possession, and had had in my possession, surveys, survey plats, of this tract 30, and a vicinity map, which showed its relation to property and the adjacent waterways, and the adjacent railway facilities, and another map which showed the borings and soundings; that is, depths of water and the depths of hardpan on which a foundation could rest all over that tract; and Mr. Powell asked me if I would get several copies of those maps, and any other formal data to him as soon as possible, in order that he might take it East with him for the information of the officials of the United States Shipping Board, who had asked him to take the subject up when he was out here. Q. And those maps and plats that you had at that time were furnished by whom? A. George Sessions."

That same day Robinson and Powell went to the office of the defendants, and there had a discussion with the assistant secretary of the Oakland Water Front Company, from whom they procured several copies of the maps which Powell wished to take east with him. On May 10th additional maps and data were sent to Powell by Morse.

In the negotiations which plaintiff had had with Robinson and Christy, plaintiff had told them that when it came to fixing a price and arranging terms, it would be best to deal directly with Mr. Hammond; and this information was communicated by them in turn to Mr. Tynan. So immediately after the meeting with Robinson, Powell asked Tynan to see the owners; and Tynan accordingly called upon Hammond at once, who named to him the same price which plaintiff, with the approval of Morse and Hammond, had previously quoted to Robinson. Tynan thereupon reported the price to Powell and recommended the purchase; and on May 11th Powell, as vice president of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, wrote to Hammond, and, after referring to Tynan's call, added that Hammond's "proposition to dispose of this property for the purpose of the construction of a shipyard by the United States government for the sum of $1,000,000" had been forwarded to Washington, and he hoped to be able to get a definite answer within a fortnight. On May 13th Hammond wrote in reply that the Oakland Water Front Company would hold itself in readiness to deed the property to the United States government at the price mentioned.

Mr. Powell, who had become convinced of the desirability of the purchase, hastened back East, and there presented the matter personally to the officials of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. His recommendation resulted in a decision to purchase the site and turn it over to the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, for use as a shipyard at which ships should be built under a contract with the government. This contract bears date June 21, 1918, and recited in formal terms that, the Bethlehem Corporation having facilities sufficient for its ordinary needs, the Fleet Corporation would purchase the shipyard site, and that the Bethlehem Corporation, as superintendent for the Fleet Corporation, was to make the shipyard ready for use, and there engage in the construction of ships as outlined in the agreement, in order to minister to the government's needs in the pressing emergency.

When the decision was reached, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, acting upon a suggestion of Robinson, arranged first to take an option to purchase. On June 21st, the very day of the contract with the government, Powell notified Tynan that the Emergency Fleet Corporation was "handling the purchase," and requested Tynan to help as much as possible. By reason of this request Tynan had Robinson meet Hammond; and after they had discussed together the provisions of the proposed option, the formal document was prepared by Robinson. The option ran for 60 days, and the price named was that originally quoted to Robinson by plaintiff and confirmed to Powell by Hammond. The option bore date of July 1, 1918, and was actually executed by the Oakland Water Front Company on July 2d. Attached to the option was a copy of a map prepared by plaintiff and previously furnished by him to Robinson. On July 31st the Emergency Fleet Corporation elected to exercise the option, and gave written notice accordingly. Under date of August 3d, the Oakland Water Front Company acknowledged receipt of this notice, stating that it understood the notice to be an unqualified acceptance of the option, and that a binding contract was accordingly in effect. This acknowledgment was signed on behalf of the Oakland Water Front Company by "S. F. B. Morse, Manager." On September 11th, the deed, which, like the option, was prepared by the attorney of the Bethlehem Corporation, was executed by the Oakland Water Front Company to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, and the agreed purchase price was paid by the government.

While these occurrences were taking place no information was conveyed to plaintiff by either of defendants. But about June 6th the plaintiff called on Robinson to discuss matters pertaining to the reclamation work and the drainage of the land, and to urge the purchase of the tract. At that time he learned from Robinson that Hammond's written offer was before the Emergency Fleet Corporation. On June 13th plaintiff and Robinson had another discussion concerning the drainage problem. At Robinson's request plaintiff called also on certain engineers who were acting as advisers for the government, and not only discussed the tract with the engineers and Robinson, but accompanied them to the tract itself. The purchaser was allowed to take possession in June, and during the course of the investigations the engineers looked often to plaintiff for historical data and special information not easily obtainable elsewhere. In these matters plaintiff showed a willingness to assist; and apparently his services were found of such value that about the middle of July he was employed by the engineers as an adviser, and particularly to furnish the desired historical information. He continued in such employ for about three months, though meanwhile the purchase price was paid and the deed taken by the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

The complaint contains two counts, each setting forth a claim for $30,000, and interest; the first, a cause of action based on the contract of June 21, 1917; the second, a cause cast in the form of a complaint in indebitatus assumpsit. Defendants assert that the second count and any verdict thereunder are vulnerable because of defects both of pleading and proof. But since the defendants' attack upon the judgment cuts deep into the vitals of the contract, it will be more profitable to consider first the essential merits of plaintiff's claim, disregarding for a time the questions of technique.

Defendants contend that there can rightly be no recovery by plaintiff, on the ground that he was not the procuring cause of sale; and they maintain that the owners made the sale without the least aid from the plaintiff, and through negotiations begun by themselves more than 30 days after the letter of April 3d, with a buyer with whom the plaintiff had never been in touch.

The contract of June 21, 1917, is quite different from the ordinary brokerage agreement. It affords to plaintiff four disjunctive bases for compensation. It contains a promise to pay compensation on any sale (1) which results through plaintiff's negotiations, or

(2) through plaintiff's efforts, or (3) which originates with plaintiff, or (4) upon which plaintiff is employed.

[1, 2] There is no appreciable difference in the meaning for present purposes between the words "negotiations" and "efforts." In either case, in order to bring himself within the conditions of his contract, plaintiff would be required to show that he was the efficient cause of sale. The two other expressions definitive of his contractual right embody, however, contrasting ideas. They are expressive of a distinction corresponding to the important distinction between finding a purchaser and negotiating a sale. Handley v. Shaffer, 177 Ala. 636, 653, 59 South. 286.

To originate a sale is to give to it a genesis, to stand as the parent, the creative force from which the final transaction traces its birth. The word carries no implication requiring the originator to be also the finisher, or to be at once the alpha and the omega. On the other hand, one may, of course, be employed upon a sale which he has not originated, and in that event he is in the ordinary position of a broker and subject to the common rule. One who merely originates a sale may be compared to the one who starts a hare which another is left to run down, while one only employed on a sale is like the man who runs down the hare which some one else has started.

Under a contract prescribing compensation to the broker alike whether he originates or is employed on a sale, his rights then will be the same whether he is the fertile mind that begins, or is the effective instrument that ends, a continuous series of negotiations leading to a happy consummation.

[3, 4] Referring to the terms under interpretation, counsel for defendants ask that the words be scrutinized to determine their precise meaning; and it is urged that the phrase "upon which you are employed" cannot be extended to include a sale brought about by future use or employment of plaintiff's services, but must be limited to a sale resulting from services in course of rendition at the date of the agreement. We do not think, however, that the contract should be so meticulously construed. The present is frequently used for the future tense, not only colloquially, but also in statutes and contracts. Here it is quite apparent that the agreement was not a studied production. It was rather a communication passing between two men who had been working together in the same office toward the same end, and who, believing that they understood each other, dealt in open-handed fashion, with little thought of niceties in the use of moods and tenses. There is no reason, therefore, for subjecting the phraseology to a committing analysis, or for sifting it through the mesh of legal dialectics. In fact, wherever there is justification for treating the broker as the procuring cause of sale, his services are regarded as highly meritorious, and the law leans to that construction of the contract and to that interpretation of the facts of the case and the acts of the parties which will best secure to the broker the payment of his commissions. Stewart v. Mather, 32 Wis. 344, 350; Duncan v. Borden, 13 Colo. App. 480, 482, 59 Pac. 60.

But taking the contract as it is written, defendants assail the judgment on the ground that plaintiff neither originated, nor was employed upon, nor negotiated, nor exerted his efforts in, the sale to the Emergency Fleet Corporation; and they insist that the negotiations with that corporation were undertaken and completed by the defendants themselves through Mr. Hammond, after plaintiff's efforts with the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation had come to naught, and after the contractual relations between plaintiff and defendants had been completely severed.

The jury were instructed as to the meaning of the expressions used by the parties, and received also in appropriate form a definition of the term "procuring cause of sale." But despite the import of the phrase "which originates with you," the court concluded its instructions by declaring to the jury that they were not to render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff unless they should find that the influence, means, or efforts put forth by plaintiff between July 1, 1917, and April 3, 1918, were "the procuring and efficient cause that resulted in the sale to the United States Shipping Board, Emergency Fleet Corporation."

In view of the interpretation which has been given to the word "originate," and which does not differ in sense from the meaning ascribed by the trial judge, we think the court's instruction was really more favorable to the defendants than they were entitled to. But since under that instruction a verdict was given in plaintiff's favor, it devolves upon us to consider whether, upon the law as applied to the evidence already detailed, plaintiff can fairly be deemed the efficient cause of the sale to the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

In Roth v. Thomson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 215, 180 Pac. 656, 659, the court, quoting from Park v. Culver, 169 Mo. App. 11, 154 S. W. 806, gives the following definition of the expression "procuring cause":

"In order for the broker to recover, the evidence must show that his efforts were the procuring cause and not merely one in a chain of causes. The expression 'procuring and inducing cause,' as used in the books, refers to the cause originating from a series of events that without break in their continuity results in the prime object of the employment of the agent."

Where several agencies have been active in bringing about a sale, it may happen that each has contributed something without which the result would not have occurred. One may have found a buyer who would otherwise have been overlooked, and yet that buyer may actually make his bargain through a different instrumentality. In such case, the crucial question is, Which was the predominating efficient cause? A broker's contract presupposes that he shall be the causa causans, the foundation of the negotiations, but he need not be the sole cause or causa sine qua non. Handley v. Shaffer, 177 Ala. 636, 652, 59 South. 286.

[5] To constitute himself the causa causans, the predominating effective cause, it is not enough that the broker contributes indirectly or incidentally to the sale by imparting information which tends to arouse interest. He must set in motion a chain of events, which, without break in their continuity, cause the buyer and seller to come to terms as the proximate result of his peculiar activities.

In Hafner v. Herron, 165 Ill. 242, 246, 46 N. E. 211, 212, the court says:

"Nor is it always necessary, that the purchaser should be actually introduced to the owner by the broker, provided it appears affirmatively that the purchaser was induced to apply to the owner through the instrumentality of the broker, or through means employed by the broker. It is sufficient if the sale is effected through the efforts of the broker, or through information derived from him."

To like effect are: Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 124; Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 319; Handley v. Shaffer, 177 Ala. 636, 59 South. 286; Shannon v. Potts, 117 Ill. App. 80; Masters v. Hunt (Tex. Civ. App.) 197 S. W. 219; Haun v. Rosenmayer (Cal. App.) 189 Pac. 117; Justy v. Erro, 16 Cal. App. 519, 117 Pac. 575.

[6] So when the broker is in fact the primary procuring cause, the law will not deprive him of his commission because the negotiations were completed through some one else, and even perhaps without the broker having himself met, or communicated personally with, the buyer. As it is sometimes put in homely phrase in such cases, "He who shakes the tree is the one to gather the fruit."

[7] Whether or not the sale is primarily the result of the broker's efforts is a question of fact. The jury here, under the instructions given, may be assumed to have resolved the evidence in plaintiff's favor in this regard; and in the light of decisions rendered in analogous cases, we would not be justified in overriding the determination of the triers of the fact.

A case quite closely in point is found in Carnes v. Finigan, 198 Mass. 128, 84 N. E. 324. There the defendant employed the plaintiff to find a buyer for his liquor business. The plaintiff, knowing that a certain brewery often advanced money to buy saloons for persons who would engage to deal in the company's brew, gave to the brewery's vice president, Casey, the name of defendant's saloon and also of two others. Casey, in turn, brought the saloon to the notice of one of the brewery's patrons named Silva, who with the brewery's money made his purchase of the business directly from the defendant, and without any communication with the broker. Casey acted in the matter, not as the agent of the broker, but for the benefit of his own brewery. After pointing the distinction between such a case and a case where the purchaser's dealings with an owner were indirectly brought about through information given by a broker to another and by him casually imparted to the buyer, the court said:

"But in the case at bar, although Casey did not intend to act as the agent for the plaintiff, the plaintiff intended to use Casey as an instrument in getting a purchaser for the defendant's saloon, and he was successful in getting a purchaser by those means. Casey did what the plaintiff hoped and expected he would do when he furnished him with the name of the defendant's liquor business for sale, namely, he brought it to the attention of a man to whom he was willing to advance the money necessary to buy the business in order to get another purchaser of his (Casey's) company's ale. In our opinion this was sufficiently direct to make out the fact that the plaintiff's services were the cause of the sale."

Another case worthy of study is Burchell v. Gowrie & Blockhouse Collieries, L. R. (1910) A. C. 614. The defendant, a British corporation and the owner of a coal mine in Nova Scotia, desiring to sell its property, employed for that purpose the plaintiff Burchell, who was a mining engineer and manager of the colliery. Burchell presented the matter to a successful promoter named Pearson, who was the leading spirit in a company owning a neighboring mine. Burchell had Pearson inspect the defendant's property, and showed him the opportunities presented for more advantageous development of Pearson's own mine through prosecuting certain workings already under way in defendant's property. Pearson, convinced of the superiority of this method of approach, took an option which, after certain renewals, was allowed to lapse on account of financial stringency. Negotiations continued, however, and later another engineer, Richardson, was sent from England to inspect defendant's mine, and report for the information of the stockholders. While engaged in this work, Richardson met Macdonald, a director in Pearson's company, who had already been brought into privacy with the negotiations between Burchell and Pearson, and met also McCurdy, a son-in-law of Pearson. Richardson and these two others returned to England in the same ship; and there, without the knowledge of Burchell, the defendant entered into an agreement of sale with Macdonald and McCurdy, and the property was ultimately consolidated with that of Pearson's company. When Burchell demanded his agreed commission, the defendant claimed that he was not the procuring cause of sale, and that the transaction was the direct result of efforts of Macdonald. The court, however, regarded Pearson as the dominating personality in the negotiations which culminated in the sale, and treated Macdonald and McCurdy as Pearson's agents, or coadventurers. Hence, the sale having been induced by the knowledge, exertions and skill of Burchell, and he having first introduced the company to the purchaser, the court awarded him his commission, saying at page 625:

"Pearson, acting with his associates in the interests of the North Atlantic Colliery, was the purchaser introduced. Pearson with his coadventurers acting in the same interests was the actual purchaser; in fact nothing was in reality altered but the consideration to be paid. Stock was to be given in a larger proportion than Burchell was authorized to accept. In all other respects the sale made and the sale authorized to be made by Burchell were in effect the same."

[8] So in the case at bar plaintiff intended to use the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation either as a purchaser itself or as an instrument in getting a purchaser; and affairs so shaped themselves that the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation and the Emergency Fleet Corporation came into close privity with each other in the transaction. They were coadventurers in the purchase, the Fleet Corporation furnishing the money to buy the property, and the Shipbuilding Corporation agreeing to take the active management, and to build ships under orders in the Fleet Corporation's yard. The transaction as ultimately carried out was at the same price and on the same terms as those named by the plaintiff in March to the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation. It turned out, it is true, that the contract of purchase was made, and the purchase price was paid, by the Fleet Corporation instead of by its coadventurer, the Shipbuilding Corporation. But in the consummation of the sale the Shipbuilding Corporation acted as agent for the Fleet Corporation, and the transaction assumed the same form as if the Shipbuilding Corporation had been the legally constituted agent of the Fleet Corporation from the beginning. In his negotiations with the officers of the Shipbuilding Corporation plaintiff had performed the most effective and perhaps the hardest and most expensive part of the whole undertaking. The defendants knowingly took advantage of his labors, and concluded a contract of sale with a purchaser with whom they had really been put into touch by plaintiff. And that sale was made on terms which, under defendants' directions, had already been named by plaintiff to the intermediary. The sale was, beyond a doubt, the direct result of the original impulse proceeding from the plaintiff. It was brought about without the interpolation of any independent agency, and was closed in continuation of the negotiations initiated, and almost to the last moment conducted, by plaintiff alone. The worth of the plaintiff's service is not to be depreciated by attributing the sale to defendants' common director, Mr. Hammond, or by expunging all the intelligent effort, whereby the plaintiff had so well laid out the pathway that Mr. Powell had but to follow the finger post pointing to Mr. Hammond's door, and then, after a short conversation, depart with Mr. Hammond's written offer in his pocket to lay before his company's coadventurer for final action.

The views expressed receive support also from five cases cited in the plaintiff's brief which possess resemblances to the case at bar. These are Lincoln v. McClatchie, 36 Conn. 136; Lloyd v. Mathews, 51 N. Y. 124; Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 319; Hosmer v. Fuller, 168 Mass. 274, 47 N. E. 94; Brooks v. Leathers, 112 Mich. 463, 70 N. W. 1099.

[9, 10] But it is contended by defendants that the fact that no agreement of sale was made before the letter of April 3d, or at most within 30 days thereafter, precludes the allowance of any compensation to plaintiff. A broker with a contract in the ordinary form must unquestionably effect a sale within the limit of time granted. Plaintiff's contract was subject to cancellation on one month's notice. The letter of April 3d, read as a whole, does not purport to abolish the original contract entirely. The letter expresses willingness to pay a commission of 3 per cent. "on any sales made of the Oakland Water Front Company property in which this company is interested, which originates with you, or for which, in the judgment of the directors, you are responsible." Here was a clear recognition of a continuing obligation to pay the commission on any sales originating with the plaintiff. Hence nothing in this letter attempts to abrogate plaintiff's unquestioned right to compensation on sales originating with him. The sale effected did originate assuredly with plaintiff; therefore the mere fact that under the circumstances in evidence that sale was closed after the letter of April 3d cannot militate against recovery of the compensation promised for such service.

Nor does plaintiff's withdrawal from defendants' office impair plaintiff's rights. He was not required by his contract to be in attendance at any particular place, but was working on commission with a right to control his own actions and be master of his own time.

It is true plaintiff "declined to develop new service" under the terms of the April letter, but neither the contents of the letter nor plaintiff's conduct at the time furnish just reason for plucking from him the fruits of his efforts already exerted. His effective work had been done, and the terms had already been named to the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation. The situation was therefore the same in substance as if plaintiff had brought the Fleet Corporation itself as a buyer to the defendants' office before the receipt of the letter of April 3d, and had then left the parties to close the bargain themselves.

Under such state of facts, the postponement of the actual closing of the bargain until after the cessation of agency would not, of itself, be sufficient to alter the broker's character as the procuring cause of the sale, or to deprive him of his reward. The Bethlehem Corporation was but the messenger for the Fleet Corporation, and the Fleet Corporation on its appearance adopted the acts of its messenger. This was equivalent to a previous request to perform such acts.

In Lincoln v. McClatchie, 36 Conn. 136, a purchaser, Burdick, had obtained information about a residence from a friend, Goodwin, living in the vicinity, who, knowing Burdick's desire to be a neighbor, had procured for him particulars from plaintiff, the broker in whose hands defendant had placed the property for sale. Burdick purchased directly from the owner without himself ever having communicated with the broker. The court said (36 Conn. 142):

"Had Burdick in the first instance requested Goodwin to do what was done by him in this transaction, the case would have stood precisely as if Burdick had procured the information himself from the plaintiff, on the principle qui facit per alium facit per se, and the defendant in that case would clearly have been liable. Is the case materially different? Goodwin acted for Burdick in procuring the information. He did not casually obtain it, but went to the office of the plaintiff to ascertain what intelligence he had to disclose. Burdick acted upon the information when communicated to him by Goodwin, knowing from what source it had been obtained. He adopted the acts of Goodwin, which was equivalent to a previous request to perform the acts. The plaintiff was pursuing the business of a broker in giving the information, and Goodwin received it for Burdick in the capacity of a messenger and conveyed it to him."

In the present case the court in its instructions told the jury that they could not give plaintiff a verdict unless they found that the procuring and efficient cause of sale was plaintiff's efforts exerted after July 1, 1917, and before April 3, 1918. During the time intervening between the latter date and the visit of Powell in May there had been no real break in the negotiations, and hence on Powell's arrival there was no independent revival of negotiations. Powell merely took the thread from Robinson's fingers.

We feel convinced that the evidence justified a finding that plaintiff's efforts exerted before April 3d were the procuring cause of sale notwithstanding that the first positive disclosure of the Fleet Corporation's interest was reserved until Powell's visit. Yet, even if the verdict were not to be rested on that ground, it cannot candidly be gainsaid that the sale originated with plaintiff before April 3d. And a sale so originating with him establishes his rights as fully as one negotiated and closed by his sole efforts during the period of his admitted agency.

[11] Nevertheless, however meritorious plaintiff's accomplishment, defendants advance the objection that the statute of frauds opposes an insuperable barrier because there was no written authorization to Morse to sign the letter of June 21, 1917. The jury, under adequate instructions, has impliedly found Morse to have been acting as general manager of both corporations, and there is ample support for that finding in the evidence. The signature of Morse as general manager, unattended by the subscription of any corporate name, made evidence admissible to show his relation to the parties and to assist in the application of the context of the letter to the subject-matter in litigation. Union Oil Co. v. Purissima Oil Co., 181 Cal. 479, 185 Pac. 381. Additional authorities are collated by Justice Sloane in Swartz v. Burr, 43 Cal. App. 442, 185 Pac. 411.

In Brown v. Crown G. M. Co., 150 Cal. 376, 386, 89 Pac. 86, 91, the court said:

"It is conceded * * * that in order to bind a corporation by his acts it is not necessary that any resolution should be passed appointing a general manager. It will be sufficient for it to be shown that he was manager de facto."

And in Hoffman v. Guy M. Rush Co., 27 Cal. App. 167, 149 Pac. 177, it was held that the president in his capacity of actual manager of defendant's real estate business had authority to employ a broker and bind the corporation to pay for the services rendered. In like manner in Norton v. Genesee Association, 57 App. Div. 520, 68 N. Y. Supp. 32, the rule is laid down that the general manager of a corporation engaged in the business of buying and selling land is vested with general authority to employ a broker in furtherance of such business.

So in Cal. & Ariz. L. Co. v. Cuddeback, 27 Cal. App. 450, 150 Pac. 379, it was decided that plaintiff's president, who was also the acting general manager, had power in this latter capacity to enter into a contract in the company's behalf for the purchase of a tract of land.

Again, in Betts v. So. Cal. Fruit Exch., 144 Cal. 402, 77 Pac. 993, where the secretary discharged in addition the functions of a general manager, a contract for the sale of fruit was held binding on the defendant, though signed only by the secretary as such, and though he himself acted without written authority from the corporation. See, also, Newhall v. Jos. Levy Bag Co., 19 Cal. App. 9, 124 Pac. 875.

Likewise, in Woods Lumber Co. v. Moore,

183 Cal. 497, 191 Pac. 905, 11 A. L. R. 549, a contract of guaranty, signed by the secretary by verbal direction of the president and business manager of the corporation, was held binding.

In Arnold v. La Belle Oil Co. (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 815, which was an action involving a broker's claim for commissions, it was held on the authority of McCartney v. Clover V. L. Co., 232 Fed. 697, 146 C. C. A. 623, 1 A. L. R. 1127, construing section 2309 of our Civil Code, that executive officers are not merely agents, but are the true bodily representatives of the corporation, and hence may bind it without having express written authority.

That either a de jure or de facto general manager is such an executive officer is established beyond cavil by the cases already cited. For present purposes, however, the most apt citation is, perhaps, Pacific Impt. Co. v. Jones, 164 Cal. 260, 128 Pac. 404, where one of the defendants here was suing as plaintiff to recover rent for the Arcadia Hotel at Santa Monica under a lease purporting on its face to be that of the Pacific Improvement Company, but signed individually by A. D. Shepard (who was shown in the evidence here to have been Morse's predecessor as general manager). The objection was raised by the defendant Jones that Shepard as an individual was a stranger to the lease, and, further, was not shown to have had written authority from the Pacific Improvement Company. The company suing had judgment for the rent, and on appeal the Supreme Court said (164 Cal. 263, 128 Pac. 406):

"The circumstances in evidence thus conclusively show that Shepard in attaching his signature to the paper did so for and on behalf of the corporation whose general manager he was, and that defendant was fully cognizant that he so acted. The document was shown to be that of the corporation."

It is idle to pursue the discussion. Morse, as formally constituted general manager of the Pacific Improvement Company and as de facto manager of the Oakland Water Front Company, had full power to engage plaintiff in writing.

We come now to a consideration of the second count of the complaint cast in the form of indebitatus assumpsit.

It is contended that there is no sufficient statement of a cause of action in the second count, in that the averment is merely of an indebtedness of $30,000 for plaintiff's services performed at defendants' request, without any statement that the amount represents either the reasonable value or the sum agreed.

The count is predicated on the theory that the defendants prevented complete performance of the contract of June 21, 1917.

[12-14] A state of facts showing prevention of performance justifies an action in assumpsit; and, while the broker's contract cannot be set up to defeat the implied assumpsit, it is admissible in evidence to show how the cause arose, and to supply a measure of damages. Breen v. Roy, 8 Cal. App. 475, 97 Pac. 170; Boyd v. Bargagliotti, 12 Cal. App. 228, 107 Pac. 150; Reynolds v. Jourdan, 6 Cal. 108; 5 C. J. 1388, § 20.

[15] The evidence here justified the plaintiff as a precautionary measure in going to the jury on a count based on the theory of prevention of performance. The price had been named to Robinson by plaintiff and confirmed by Morse in March, 1918. Soon thereafter Christy made a counter offer to Hammond, against the acceptance of which plaintiff advised. Then came the ugly days of the war between March 21st and April 1st, succeeded by the announcement of the government's change of policy and its intention to speed the transport of troops. And on the heels of these occurrences, and when the extension of existing shipyards was seen to be immediately impending, supervened the defendants' letter of April 3d, which, instead of giving plaintiff the prescribed notice of one month, declared that the arrangement in the letter of June 21, 1917, "is terminated." Then followed in May Powell's hurried visit, with the dealings thereat kept secret from plaintiff, and plaintiff's efficient preparatory work, made almost instantaneously to redound to the benefit of defendants.

[16] It was not essential to aver that the sum demanded was the reasonable value of the service. Abadie v. Carrillo, 32 Cal. 172; Wilkins v. Stidger, 22 Cal. 231, 83 Am. Dec. 64; Jan Wai v. Smith-Riddell Co. (Cal. App.) 202 Pac. 952.

It follows that the general demurrer was properly overruled; and there was no special demurrer to the second count.

Nor was plaintiff required to offer any evidence concerning the amount of damages other than the contract itself, on which he was entitled to rely as a standard of value. Defendants had the opportunity to introduce countervailing evidence, but there was no attempt to proffer any. The rules applicable in such cases are declared in Blumenthal v. Goodall, 89 Cal. 251, 26 Pac. 906; Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 1, 96 Pac. 884; Realty B. & F. Co. v. Pt. Richmond C. & L. Co., 171 Cal. 238, 152 Pac. 433. See, also, Burchell v. Gowrie, etc., Collieries, L. R. (1910) A. C. 614, 626.

[17] The plaintiff was under no compulsion to elect between his two counts. He was entitled to submit his entire case to the jury for determination upon the facts, and it was the province of the jury to decide which count was supported by the evidence. Tanforan v. Tanforan, 173 Cal. 270, 274, 159 Pac. 709; Estrella V. Co. v. Butler, 125 Cal. 232, 234, 57 Pac. 980; Van Lue v. Wahrlich, etc., Co., 12 Cal. App. 749, 108 Pac. 717.

[18] The jury rendered a general verdict; and, if the evidence adduced on the whole case supports a verdict on either count, the verdict and the judgment entered thereon must stand. Merrill v. Kohlberg, 29 Cal. App. 382, 384, 155 Pac. 824; Schudel v. Helbing, 26 Cal. App. 410, 412, 147 Pac. 89; Est. Hellier, 169 Cal. 77, 83, 145 Pac. 1008; Verdelli v. Grays Harbor Co., 115 Cal. 517, 525, 47 Pac. 364, 778; Crosett v. Whelan, 44 Cal. 200, 203.

[19] It is finally urged, however, by counsel for defendants that all possible right to his commission was forfeited by plaintiff when he took employment with the government's engineers. Their theory is that this service involved duties possibly adverse to the interest of defendants as sellers, in that information of subsurface conditions imparted by plaintiff might have disclosed disadvantageous as well as advantageous attributes of the property.

The contention is without merit. At Robinson's request plaintiff met the engineers on certain occasions in June; and with them and Robinson he spent several hours in examining the tract and explaining the character and extent of the reclamation work. It was after this that the Fleet Corporation took the formal option dated July 1, 1918; and it was not until about the middle of July that plaintiff accepted employment from the engineers to aid in the reclamation, and, as "ancient historian," to advise in engineering problems. There was in this no double-dealing on plaintiff's part; and his employment involved no service in conflict with a due regard to the interest of the defendants. The employment continued about three months, and the sale was closed by the Fleet Corporation before plaintiff's employment ceased. Though the option ran for 60 days from July 1st, the Fleet Corporation declared its election on July 31st.

It would thus appear that plaintiff's assistance furthered rather than dissuaded action; and there is nothing in the evidence to indicate the slightest breach of plaintiff's duty. On the contrary, he seems at all times to have been zealous in advancing the true interests of defendants. And in justice to defendants it should be said that there is nothing on their part suggestive of even a remote desire to conceal anything affecting the suitability of the property for the intended use.

If there were known disadvantages of which the government had not been apprised, then fairness and good faith counseled full disclosure. At no time can a broker with a due sense of the ethics of his calling justify himself in deliberately withholding from a purchaser material facts known to the broker and not known or visible to the purchaser; nor would he rightly serve his principal in so doing. There is no breach of trust toward his employer in revealing the truth; and the law will not penalize commendable candor by forfeiting the broker's commission. The broker is employed to deal honestly. Evidence of "honesty, truthfulness, and good reputation" is a prerequisite to the issuance of a real estate license, and dishonest dealing furnishes a ground for revocation of a license. Willful concealment or suppression of material facts is sheer dishonesty; and every broker owes it to the seller as well as to the buyer, and none the less to himself, to oppose and shun everything smacking of fraud, sharp practice, or bad faith.

It is fitting to add that in the record before us there is nothing whatever impugning the good faith of any one in the negotiations with either the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation or the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

It remains but to speak of defendants' exceptions to certain instructions given and to the refusal to give others proposed. The discussion already had renders a brief reference sufficient.

Defendants complain of the refusal to give a set of proposed instructions which were framed on the theory that no acts done by the plaintiff after April 3d, or at most more than 30 days thereafter, could be considered by the jury, and that defendants were not liable for anything done by plaintiff if it had not reached the knowledge of, or commenced its influence on, the Fleet Corporation within 30 days after April 3d at the latest; and that plaintiff could base no claim on any negotiations had with the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation which led that company, without request from plaintiff, to impart information to the Fleet Corporation with the result that the latter became the purchaser.

The instructions which the court did give were to the effect that the jurors should confine their attention to the acts and negotiations of plaintiff prior to April 3d, and, if those acts were found to be the procuring cause of the sale, then plaintiff was entitled to recover, though the sale was actually effected under the circumstances shown in the evidence more than 30 days after April 3d, and was made to the Fleet Corporation without direct contact between it and plaintiff. For reasons already stated, we hold that the instructions requested were properly refused, and that in those given on the subject there was no prejudice to defendants.

[20] Other instructions requested purported to define the terms used in the contract, and were designed to declare to the jury that a sale could not be held to have originated with plaintiff, or to have been made through his negotiations or efforts because, after he had brought the matter to the attention of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, its officers then, without request from him, imparted the information to the Fleet Corporation and influenced it to buy. The evidence was not of a character to give a foundation for such instructions, and the refusal was therefore justified.

[21] In the same connection complaint is made that in defining the meaning of the words used in the contract, the court used the phrase "may be construed as meaning," without positively declaring the meaning. That is a stricture directed at form rather than substance, and needs no further comment.

[22] So also criticism is directed to language stating that a verdict might be given in plaintiff's favor, if the sale resulted from negotiations conducted by him "in pursuance of said letter of June 21, 1917," without specifying in that particular instruction what would constitute service pursuant to the letter. But the court elsewhere set forth quite fully what in the way of performance was demanded of plaintiff as a basis of recovery.

In respect to the second count, the defendants complain because the instruction given on the subject of prevention of performance left it to the jury to determine whether the letter of April 3d was executed in bad faith, in order to prevent plaintiff from bringing about a sale then in course of completion, and so to deprive plaintiff of his commission. It is insisted that there was no evidence justifying an instruction on the subject. Our views regarding this matter have already been expressed; and we believe that the occasion did furnish good reason for the court's action.

It is also urged that it was error to refuse to instruct that the plaintiff could not recover without proof by him of full performance, and that the contract itself was not evidence of value. This instruction also was properly refused.

Error is further charged in the refusal of the court to give an instruction that plaintiff could not recover, if his employment by the government's engineers placed him under duty to disclose the true conditions of the land, unfavorable as well as favorable. There is no breach of trust in disclosing true conditions, and the evidence afforded no justification for the instruction requested.

On the subject of the legal sufficiency of the contract, it would have been error to adopt the instruction proposed by defendants to the effect that the contract was obnoxious to the statute of frauds.

The instructions read as a whole gave an exposition of the law which subjected defendants to no prejudice, and placed the case before the jury in a manner which left to the defendants no just ground of complaint.

Viewing the case in its entirety, we conclude that plaintiff was both legally and morally entitled to the compensation awarded him. It was through him as the moving cause that the interest which induced the purchase was awakened and sustained without break in continuity until the final consummation. He it was who shook the tree, and it would be a miscarriage of justice if he were to be deprived of the fruit of his labor.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

ASSOCIATED THEATERS, Inc., et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 3712.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 16, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 15, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 15, 1922.)

1. Master and servant §417(1) — Original award held "final order" within Compensation Act.

Where compensation for injuries to an employee was awarded against the employer by the Industrial Accident Commission, which made a supplemental award to a physician in accordance with a petition filed by the employee, the original award was the "final order" within Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 65, subd. a, alleging 20 days for the filing of an application for a rehearing to sustain a writ of review, and the employee's application filed on the twentieth day after he had knowledge of the order was in time.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Order.]

2. Master and servant §417(3½)—Employee held "party aggrieved" within Compensation Act.

Where compensation for injuries to an employee was awarded against his employer by an order relieving the insurer from liability, the employee was a "party aggrieved" within Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 64, subd. a, and entitled to apply for a rehearing and to a writ of review on denial of the rehearing, though his employer was not entitled to the writ because of failure to make timely application for rehearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Aggrieved Party.]

3. Insurance §435—Master and servant §361—Compensation insurance held to cover injury to moving picture theater employee repairing garage; "employee."

Where one employed as a carpenter and handy man in a moving picture theater of a corporation was injured while widening the door of a garage at the private residence of the controlling stockholder who kept his automobile, chiefly used in the business, at the garage, the injury was received while doing work as an employee within Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, and the terms of a policy of insurance covering work incident to the operation of theater.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employee.]

Proceeding by A. H. Houston against the Associated Theaters, Incorporated, employer, and the Western Indemnity Company, insurance carrier, before the Industrial Accident Commission, for an award. From an award against the employer and relieving the insurance carrier from liability, the employer and A. H. Houston bring certiorari. Order annulled.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, and Fletcher Bowron, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioner, A. H. Houston, filed an application to the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation on account of injuries received by him while employed by the Associated Theaters, Inc. Both the employer and the insurance carrier, Western Indemnity Company, were made respondents to that application. After a hearing by the Commission, compensation was awarded in favor of the applicant and against the employer, and it was ordered that the Western Indemnity Company be relieved from liability upon the claim. The Commission found that the applicant, while employed "as a janitor and handy man" in the motion picture theater of the employer, "sustained injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment as follows: While repairing a door of a garage, under orders of the employer." The Commission further found:

"At said time the employer was insured against liability for compensating its injured employees with defendant Western Indemnity Company, but the policy of insurance covered injuries only for operations in connection with and upon the premises of a motion picture theater, and the work being performed by applicant at the time of the injury was not connected with such operations but was repair work upon the private premises of the controlling stockholder of the employing corporation, and was not covered by said policy; said Western Indemnity Company is therefore not liable by reason of said injury."

Respondent Western Indemnity Company claims that the proceeding should be dismissed because the petitioners did not, nor did either of them, apply to the Commission for a rehearing within 20 days after service of the order of award. Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831) § 65,

The return fails to show the date of service of notice of the award, except as herein stated, upon any of the parties to the proceeding. The findings and award were filed May 13, 1921. On June 23d the Commission made a supplemental award of $58.25, payable to one Dr. MacFarlane, in accordance with a petition filed by Houston on May 24th. On June 13th the Associated Theaters, Inc., filed an application for rehearing, referring to the award of May 13th. In that application it was admitted that notice of the award was received by the Associated Theaters, Inc., on the 16th day of May. On July 13th the Associated Theaters, Inc., filed a second application for rehearing.

[1, 2] The application of Houston for rehearing was filed on June 13th. There being no evidence of service of notice of award upon Houston, the record does not show that he had knowledge thereof prior to May 24th, when he filed his petition for supplemental award. As June 13th was the twentieth day after May 24th, his application for rehearing was filed within the time limited by law. It is our opinion that the findings and award filed May 13th were the final order of the Commission within the meaning of section 65, subd. a, of the governing statute. We are also of the opinion that Houston was a party aggrieved within the meaning of section 64, subd. a, of the same statute, which authorizes a party aggrieved by any final order, decision, or award, to apply for a rehearing. If, as he contends, the liability was that of the insurance carrier, he was entitled to have that liability correctly determined. Our conclusion is that the writ of review properly issued herein on the petition of Houston, notwithstanding the fact that the Associated Theaters, Inc., was not entitled to maintain this proceeding. On July 13, 1921, the Commission by order extended for 30 days from and after that date its time for acting upon the petitions for rehearing filed June 13th. On August 11th it was ordered that said petitions be denied. The petition for writ of review was filed on September 10th, and therefore was within the 30 days' time allowed by law for that purpose.

[3] Petitioner contends that the finding of the Commission that the policy of insurance covered injuries only for "operations in connection with and upon the premises of a motion picture theater" is without support in the evidence. An examination of the policy convinces us that if the employment of the applicant at the time of the accident was connected with and in the course of the business of the employer, and was not casual, then the liability existed and was covered by the policy, notwithstanding the fact that the work was being done on premises other than the premises of the motion picture theater of the employer.

Paragraph 6 of the policy reads as follows:

"This agreement shall apply to such injuries so sustained by reason of the business operations described in said declarations which, for the purpose of this insurance, shall include all operations necessary, incident or appurtenant thereto, or connected therewith, whether such operations are conducted at the work places defined and described in said declarations or elsewhere in connection with, or in relation to, such work places."

Item 3 of the declarations referred to in the policy, after describing the location of the place of business of the employer contains the following:

"All business operations, including the operative management and superintendence thereof, conducted at or from the locations and premises defined above as declared in each instance by a disclosure of estimated remuneration of employees under such of the following divisions as are undertaken by this employer, viz.: (1) All industrial operations upon the premises; (2) all office forces; (3) all repairs or alterations to premises; (4) specially rated operations on the premises; and (5) operations not on the premises."

Item 5 of the declarations states:

"This employer is conducting no other business operations at this or any other other location not herein disclosed—except as herein stated. No exceptions."

Under the head "Classification of Operations," the declarations contain the following: "No. 9152—Motion Picture Theater—rate to apply to all employees of the theater." Counsel inform us that the figures "9152" refer to a number designating a classification in the manual of rates established by the insurance commissioner of the state of California; No. 9152 being the classification relating to the occupation of conducting a motion picture theater.

It remains only to determine whether the employee, at the time of receiving his injury, was acting as an employee of the Associated Theaters, Inc., within the meaning of section 8 of the Compensation Act. The evidence, without conflict, establishes the following facts: The Associated Theaters, Inc., is a corporation, which, at the time in question, was operating a motion picture theater at 612 South Broadway, in the city of Los Angeles. All of its stock was owned by Dr. H. B. Breckwedel. In order to comply in form with the law relating to corporations, he caused one share of stock to be placed in the name of his wife and the other in the name of his attorney. He then held those two shares indorsed to himself; "so I hold all the stock." Dr. Breckwedel owned an automobile, and also owned a garage located at his private residence. He used this automobile more extensively in the business of the theater than for his personal convenience. He kept the automobile in his garage, and did not go through the form of claiming rent therefor from the corporation. Houston was employed by the Associated Theaters, Inc., as a janitor and also as a carpenter and general handy man about the theater premises. The door of the garage at Dr. Breckwedel's residence was so narrow that there was some difficulty in getting the automobile in and out. In order to relieve that difficulty, Dr. Breckwedel sent Houston to the garage with instructions to make some changes in the garage door. While making those changes, the accident occurred, and Houston suffered the injuries for which he seeks to obtain compensation.

The work, which was being done by Houston at the garage, being carpenter work, was of the same kind as a part of the work for which he was employed at the theater. The change which he was ordered to make in the door of the garage had direct relation to the automobile which, as we have seen, was used in the theater business. Under these circumstances, we think that the work was in fact connected with the business of the theater. The ownership of the garage is not a material factor in the case. The decisions in La Grande Laundry Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 777, 161 Pac. 988, and Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 43 Cal. App. 487, 185 Pac. 306, which are particularly relied upon by counsel for Western Indemnity Company, are not in conflict with the views above stated. In the La Grande Laundry Co. Case, the accident which caused the death of the employee occurred while he was employed on the premises of one of the stockholders of the corporation in doing repair work on those premises which in their use had no relation whatever to the business of the corporation. Moreover, the owner of those premises was one of many stockholders and not, as in the present instance, the sole owner of the corporation. In Western Indemnity Company v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, the work which was being done by the employee at the time of the accident was work being done at the direction of the employer for the personal convenience of one of his friends and had no relation whatever to the business of the employer.

The order is annulled.

In re STEVENS' ESTATE.STEVENS et al. v. HENDRICKS et al.

(Civ. 4119.)

Continuance ⇨ 12—Refusal of continuance for sickness of parties held error.

Where two contestants of a will were out of the jurisdiction and could not be present because of sickness, which was unknown to their counsel until six days before trial, on which three days later he started proceedings for a continuance, refusal to grant a continuance was error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John D. Stevens, deceased. Action by Leta Stevens and others against Joseph B. Hendricks and others to contest the will. From judgment dismissing the action, contestants appeal. Reversed.

Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, and Benj. C. Jones, of Lakeport, for appellants.

Herbert V. Keeling and C. M. Crawford, both of Lakeport, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal after denial of a motion for continuance of the trial of the contest of the will of John D. Stevens, after probate. The motion for a continuance was made on the ground that two of the three contestants were ill at their homes in the state of New York, and that their mother, a material witness, was also residing in the same state. The request for a continuance was made for the purpose of enabling contestants' counsel to take the depositions of these three witnesses. The contest was filed on February 10, 1921, the proponents answered on February 25, 1921, and on March 11, 1921, the cause was set for trial on the 18th of April, 1921. On April 15th the contestants filed their notice of motion for a continuance. The motion was heard on April 18th at a time when proponents' witnesses and a jury were in attendance for the trial of the contest. The trial court denied the motion, and, on appellants' refusal to proceed, dismissed the contest.

The affidavits filed on behalf of the contestants were not controverted, and it cannot be successfully urged at this time that the contestants moved in bad faith or that the grounds given for the motion were not sufficient to have justified the trial court in granting the continuance prayed for. Appellants' counsel stated in his affidavit that he had not had an opportunity to interview his clients who lived in New York and that they had requested him to procure a continuance to enable them and their mother to be present at the trial. It was shown without contradiction that Edna Stevens Barrett and Marquita Stevens Treat, two of the contestants, were ill in the state of New York, and that knowledge of said illness had not come to their counsel until April 12th. Within three days thereafter their counsel started the proceedings to request a continuance, and it cannot be said from all that appears in the record that there was a lack of due diligence.

The case is controlled by such authorities as Jaffe v. Lilienthal, 101 Cal. 175, 35 Pac. 636; Morehouse v. Morehouse, 136 Cal. 332, 68 Pac. 976; Betts Spring Co. v. Jardine M. Co., 23 Cal. App. 705, 139 Pac. 657; and Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Taylor (Cal. App.) 198 Pac. 651.

PEOPLE v. BRADY. (Cr. 983.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 9, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 6, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 8, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ⇨ 1170(1)—Exclusion of evidence to impeach witness prejudicial when testimony sharply conflicting.

Where there was a sharp conflict between defendant's testimony and that of the two principal witnesses for the prosecution, the erroneous exclusion of evidence tending to discredit one of such witnesses by showing that part of her testimony was willfully false was prejudicial.

2. Criminal law ⇨ 671—Defendant not required to propound questions out of hearing of jury.

The jury is a co-ordinate part of the court, and every trial for felony must take place in its presence, and there is no law authorizing the judge to require a defendant to propound questions out of the hearing of the jury.

3. Criminal law ⇨ 1170(1)—Witnesses ⇨ 379(2)—Question whether witness had not said defendant was innocent held proper, and its exclusion prejudicial.

Where it was not claimed that defendant directly committed the crime charged, but only that he was a party to a conspiracy to commit it, a question asked one of the witnesses for the prosecution, without whose testimony no case would have been established, whether she had not said that she hoped defendant would be acquitted because he was innocent, was proper, and its exclusion was prejudicial, especially where, to the knowledge of the judge, she had made other contradictory statements, of which defendant's counsel was ignorant, but which would probably have been brought out, if the cross-examination had not been curtailed.

4. Witnesses $\S$ 388(10)—Time, place, persons present, and contradictory statements must be called to witness' attention before she can be impeached.

Before a witness may be impeached on account of contradictory statements, her attention must be called to the time, place, and persons in the presence of whom the statement is claimed to have been made, and the statement itself must be related to her, so that she may be given full opportunity to admit or deny making it.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 389—Error to exclude question as to contradictory statement because witness did not remember occasion when it was claimed to have been made.

It was error to exclude a question asked a witness for the prosecution as to whether she had not said that defendant was innocent merely because she answered a question calling her attention to the occasion when such statement was claimed to have been made by stating that she did not remember.

6. Witnesses $\S$ 379(3) — Cross-examination as to contradictory statement held not to call for opinion.

Where defendant was not charged with directly committing the crime, but only with being a party to a conspiracy to commit it, a question asked one of the principal witnesses for the prosecution on cross-examination whether she had not said that she hoped defendant would be acquitted because he was innocent did not call for an opinion but for a fact.

7. Witnesses $\S$ 387 — Duty of judge as to cross-examination of witness he knows to have made contradictory statements stated.

Where a defendant is charged with a serious offense not because it is claimed he directly committed it, but because of his association with the actual offenders, and the trial judge learns from a source he believes to be reliable that the chief witness for the prosecution has admitted that she lied in material parts of her testimony on the trial of one of the other offenders, it is his duty, upon recalling her for cross-examination, to either go into the cross-examination thoroughly or allow defendant to take it up where he left off, so that the true situation may be placed before the jury.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 633(1)—Defendant, condemned by public sentiment, should be given every opportunity to prove his innocence.

Defendant's constitutional right to a fair and impartial trial is no different where public sentiment has been aroused by the crime and there is an apparent inclination to condemn all persons connected with the affair before they have been tried than in other cases, and the court should exercise the utmost care to see that he is accorded the full measure of his constitutional rights and given every opportunity recognized by the law to prove his innocence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Thomas Brady was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and he appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Reversed.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Stanislaus A. Riley, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. The defendant, Thomas Brady, was convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape upon the person of one Jean Stanley. He has appealed from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

On the night of November 25, 1920, the prosecutrix, Jean Stanley, and a companion, Jessie Montgomery were persuaded to enter a house at No. 1256½ Howard street, San Francisco, where they were subjected to most brutal treatment and vile indignity. As a result of those outrages, four men were separately tried and convicted, and their convictions have recently been sustained on appeal. People v. Murphy (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 484; People v. Kruvosky (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 831; People v. MacDonald (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 491; People v. Carey (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 835.

It was held on those appeals that the evidence established a conspiracy, on the part of those involved, to engage in acts of sexual intercourse with these young women either with or without their consent, and that, therefore, each conspirator was deemed guilty of every such crime committed in the furtherance of the conspiracy by any of the conspirators. The opinions rendered in the Murphy, MacDonald, and Kruvosky Cases, supra, set forth quite fully the circumstances attending the commission of the various crimes, and for that reason it will not be necessary to again review the evidence here. It is revealed by the record in this case that all of the brutal treatment inflicted upon these young women and the immoral practices to which they were subjected were actually committed by Murphy, Kruvosky, and MacDonald, and by a man named Boyd. Murphy and Kruvosky were prize fighters. Carey was convicted upon evidence showing that he was a party to the conspiracy, and that it was he who was primarily responsible for the presence of the young women in the house that night, and because, further, it was proved by the testimony of the Montgomery girl that after she had been rendered helpless by the other men Carey committed an act of sexual intercourse with her.

Brady was prosecuted upon a different theory. There is no claim made by the prosecution that he made an assault, of any kind upon the prosecutrix. His conviction was sought and obtained upon the theory that he was a party to the conspiracy to ravish these young women, and that he did, in fact, aid, abet, and encourage the other conspirators in the numerous assaults made by them upon the prosecutrix. Brady was first charged with and tried for an alleged rape upon the Montgomery girl. The jury acquitted him. He was then charged with an assault with intent to commit rape upon the Stanley girl, and the jury disagreed. Upon a second trial he was convicted.

Several points are urged by the defendant on this appeal, but we shall address ourselves only to the vital one, which in our opinion demands a reversal of the judgment upon the ground that the trial court committed error in a manner prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant, as the result of which he was prevented from having a fair trial. The point of reversal relates to the refusal of the trial court to allow the defendant the right to pursue a course of cross-examination of the prosecutrix, whereby it was sought to impeach her testimony by showing that she had previously made statements inconsistent with and contradictory to the testimony she was then giving, and by withholding from the jury, and from the defendant, certain knowledge possessed by the trial judge to the effect that the prosecutrix had made statements to an officer of the court flatly contradicting the testimony she was then giving, which, if true, would tend strongly to discredit her as a witness in the case.

The essential features upon which the conviction of Brady was obtained were that he was a party to the whispered conversation in the Stroller's Café, which conversation was afterwards held on appeal in the other cases to be the foundation of the conspiracy; that he assisted that night in forcing the Montgomery girl to drink liquor; that he encouraged the young women victims to enter the Howard street house, and afterwards actually aided in separating them so that they might be separately attacked; that he refused to assist them when they were being cruelly beaten by Murphy and Kruvosky, and that instead of going to their assistance he stood there and "only laughed" at them.

All of these facts were established by the testimony of the two young women. The Stanley girl testified, however, that Brady made no indecent proposal to her that night, and there is no evidence to the effect that while efforts were being made by the other men to violate her that Brady knew anything about it. She further testified that after she had been struck by Kruvosky and Murphy while in the kitchen, in the presence of Brady, she was taken to another room by Carey and MacDonald, and that she did not afterwards see Brady that night. It was subsequent to that time that all of the unsuccessful attacks were made to violate her by Murphy, Boyd, Kruvosky, and MacDonald, and which now constitute the crime of an assault with intent to commit rape for which Brady was convicted.

Brady denied that he was a party to the whispered conversation in the Stroller's Café or to any conspiracy of any kind, and claims that: He was much annoyed at the intrusion in the Stroller's Café of Kruvosky, Murphy, and Boyd, all of whom were more or less intoxicated, and that he did everything possible to get out of the place without causing a disturbance with them; that the subsequent actions of these three men in jumping into the automobile of Carey as it was being driven away from the Stroller's Café was against his will. That when the stop was made in front of the Howard street house he did not know of the purpose of it, unless it was as stated by Carey to drop off the three men. That he had never been in the Howard street house before, and that he consented to go in then with the rest of his party merely in response to an invitation to take a drink. That after they had entered the house he saw that the Montgomery girl was apparently becoming very friendly with Kruvosky, and was proceeding voluntarily to get under the influence of liquor; that he tried to prevent her from doing both. That she finally followed Kruvosky out of the front room into the kitchen, and he went in after her to induce her to leave the place, but that when she entered the kitchen she started to sing and dance for the several strange men present, including Kruvosky, Murphy, and Boyd, and that while she was singing and dancing some one of the men shouted to her to take off her clothes. That he then saw there was going to be trouble, and he went back to the front room where Carey and the Stanley girl had remained; that he said to them:

"I am going to get out of here; I have asked that girl to go out in the machine, and she is out there dancing for Kruvosky and that bunch, and there is going to be trouble. I am going to leave."

To which Carey replied: "If you will wait just a minute we will all go." That just then there was a scream emanating from the Montgomery girl in the kitchen, and Jean Stanley ran to the assistance of her companion, followed by Carey. That he (Brady) thereupon told Carey that he was going to get out, and that he went to the front door, and Carey said, "Just a minute, and I will be with you." That he waited at the front door for a few minutes, and Carey then joined him, and they both left the house, got into the machine, and drove away. Brady also denied that he saw either of the girls struck that night, or that he at any time laughed at them.

The evidence shows without conflict that, when Jean Stanley ran to the kitchen for the purpose of assisting the Montgomery girl and was struck by Kruvosky and by Murphy and then taken into an adjoining room by Carey, the latter left shortly afterwards and was not again seen by the Stanley girl that night. The only testimony tending to prove that either Brady or Carey remained upon the premises after the Stanley girl was taken into the adjoining room was that given by the Montgomery girl, who testified that later, when she found herself lying nude on the mattress in the front room, Brady was there with the others, and at that time had sexual intercourse with her. But bearing upon that testimony it should be stated that Brady was tried for rape on that charge and was acquitted. The Montgomery girl also testified that Carey looked in and said, "The cops are coming." There was also the testimony of Jean Stanley to the effect that when she made her escape from the house that night there was a machine standing in front of the house that looked like Carey's machine.

[1] From the evidence above narrated it will be seen that so far as Brady is concerned the record shows a sharp conflict between his testimony and that given by the two young women. The jury doubtless accepted the stories of the young women, and rendered its verdict accordingly. That being so, it is plain that if the trial court erroneously excluded any evidence which may have tended to discredit either of the young women as witnesses it was prejudicial to the rights of this defendant, because it would follow as a natural sequence that if testimony of the young women was shown to be willfully false on any material point the jury would then have had the right to reject the entire testimony of such witnesses and its verdict may have been different.

This brings us to the ruling of the trial court curtailing the cross-examination of the prosecutrix, Jean Stanley, but in order to fully understand and discuss the point it will be necessary to advert first to a phase of the case which developed on the hearing of the motion for a new trial. The first trial of Brady on this charge, which, as before stated, resulted in a disagreement of the jury, ended on January 29, 1921. His next trial on this charge commenced on January 31, 1921, and on February 5, 1921, the jury brought in a verdict of guilty. During all of the trials of this and the other defendants the young women in question were by the order of the trial judge placed in the custody of Mrs. Kate O'Connor, a member of the San Francisco police department. On the hearing of the motion for a new trial Kate O'Connor testified that on the night of December 24, 1920 (that was prior to any of the Brady trials), she had a conversation with Jean Stanley, in which it was said:

"I said, 'Jean, what's bothering you?' She said, 'Mrs. O'Connor, I haven't slept for two nights.' She said, 'I am worried to death.' I said, 'Well, what's wrong?' and she didn't answer me directly. I kept on asking her, and she said to me, 'Well, I lied in the Kruvosky Case; so did Jessie.' She said, 'I lied to save Jessie's character.' She said, 'Jessie went willingly into the bathroom with Kruvosky; she also drank that evening.' * * * She said that evening when they were in the Stroller's Café that Jessie had sat on the chair with Kruvosky, and that she had kissed him and made love to him; that she had nothing more to do with Mr. Brady; that when they were over to the house at Howard street she had drank and got under the influence of liquor; that she had her dresses, * * * that she was dancing, and had her dresses lifted above her knees; that she was sitting on the mattress making love to Kruvosky before she went out into the kitchen; that Kruvosky went out into the kitchen, and that she followed him. * * * She said that she had heard the scream, and she went out into the kitchen; that at that time Jessie was going into the bathroom with Kruvosky; that she tried to stop her going in, and Kruvosky told her Jessie was old enough to know what she was doing, or old enough to know what she was about; that she still tried to stop her; that Kruvosky punched her in the nose when she tried; and that was really the last that she had seen of Jessie that evening and that time."

Mrs. O'Connor also testified at said hearing that she immediately notified Capt. Matheson, her superior officer, and the trial judge of what the Stanley girl had said, and that Capt. Matheson had notified the district attorney's office, who immediately sent a representative to interview the Stanley girl, but that no one so far as she knew had ever notified any one connected with the defendant's side of the case. During the hearing of said motion the trial judge on several occasions stated that Mrs. O'Connor had informed him of these contradictory statements, and that he "knew all about it." He further stated: "I have a lot of respect for Mrs. O'Connor. Anything she says I believe." In fact, it is shown by the record that he had that much confidence in the veracity of Mrs. O'Connor that when she was called upon to testify at the hearing of said motion he announced that she need not be sworn, but that he would accept as the truth anything that she might say. However, at her own request, Mrs. O'Connor's testimony was taken under oath.

Now, reverting back to the last trial of Brady, and after Jean Stanley had been fully examined and cross-examined as a witness for the prosecution in its case in chief, but before the prosecution had rested its case, the trial judge, doubtless having in mind the information imparted to him by Mrs. O'Connor, asked that Miss Stanley be recalled as a witness, and he then questioned the witness as follows:

"The Court: Q. Miss Stanley, in the testimony that you have given is there anything that you can think of that would be of benefit to this defendant that you have kept back? A. No, sir. Q. Is there anything that you have kept back that would be of benefit to the people? A. No, sir. Q. Have you told the whole truth about the matter, Miss Stanley? A. Why shouldn't I? Q. But have you? A. Why, certainly. Q. Is there anything that you can think of now that you have been mistaken about? A. No, sir. Q. Nothing that you want to correct? A. Not a thing. Q. Has any one told you to make any statements in this case that was untrue? A. No, sir.

"The Court: That is all. Thank you."

Bearing in mind the expression of confidence by the trial judge in the truthfulness of Mrs. O'Connor, it must have occurred to him at the time the witness was giving this testimony that she was not telling the truth. Nevertheless he took no further steps to ascertain the truth or to lay before the jury the knowledge he then possessed in reference to the contradictory statements. On the contrary, as soon as the court had finished with its questioning and the defendant took up the examination of the witness for the purpose of further developing the matter of contradictory statements and for the purpose of laying a foundation for impeachment, the trial judge excluded, on the objection of the prosecution, the very line of examination which seemed certain to develop these contradictory statements. In this respect the record shows that the defendant asked the witness if she remembered a certain conversation held at a point on Kearny street, between the Hall of Justice and the Sutter Hotel, on the night of January 6, 1921, the same night on which the jury in the first Brady trial (wherein he was charged with rape upon the Montgomery girl and acquitted) had retired, and before it had brought in its verdict, at which conversation were present herself, Miss Montgomery, Mrs. O'Connor, and a newspaper reporter, to which the witness replied that she did not remember. Thereupon the following proceedings took place:

"Mr. Herron: Just to refresh your recollection, was not this conversation in substance—

"The Court: Have you laid the foundation?

"Mr. Herron: Yes; the persons present, the time, and the place.

"Mr. Riley: And got the answer, that she doesn't remember the conversation.

"Mr. Herron: Well, I can go a little further.

"The Court: You cannot.

"Mr. Herron: And refresh her recollection.

"The Court: You cannot.

"Mr. Herron: I will reframe the question.

"The Court: You submit to me in writing the question you want to ask.

"Mr. Herron: May we let the witness step down, and may I ask—

"The Court: Yes, you may interview the witness off the stand, but you submit that question to me in writing. Step down, Miss Stanley. (The witness is thereupon excused.) * * * (Counsel thereupon drafts question.)

"Mr. Herron: Do you want to see the question, Mr. Riley, before I pass it up to his honor? (Handing draft to counsel, who thereupon reads the same.) And I might also say, your honor, that this question will be asked in the highest good faith, and I believe I am prepared to prove that the statement was made. (Handing draft referred to to the court.)

"The Court: Let the record show a piece of paper, handed to the court and which was submitted to the district attorney, is handed to the reporter, and he is directed to make it a part of the record.

"Mr. Riley: And we object—

"The Court: That question will not be propounded in the presence of the jury—the objection, Mr. Riley?

"Mr. Riley: On the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, not proper cross-examination, not proper recross-examination, and in any event would call for the opinion and conclusion of the witness, and in no wise bidding upon the people.

"The Court: Sustained. (Thereupon handing draft referred to to the reporter. The question referred to and ordered made a part of the record is in words as follows: 'Did you not say at that time and place that you hoped that Brady would be acquitted because he was innocent?')"

[2-6] The trial of every person charged with felony must take place in the presence of the jury. The jury is a co-ordinate part of the court. The purpose of the examination of the witness is to elicit the facts and the jury are the exclusive judges of those facts. There is no law requiring a defendant to propound his questions out of the hearing of the jury; but, passing over this unwarranted direction of the court and taking up the matter of the propriety of the excluded question itself, it is clear to us that the question was a proper one, and should have been put to and answered by the witness. It is too well established to admit of argument that before a witness may be impeached on account of having made contradictory statements, the attention of the witness, in all fairness to the witness, must not only be called to the time and place, and the persons, in the presence of whom the contradictory statement is claimed to have been made, but the statement itself must be related to the witness so that full opportunity may be given the witness to admit or deny making such statement. Here the court allowed the defendant to call the attention of the witness to the time, place, and persons present, and then, merely because the witness stated that she did not remember the occasion, refused to allow the defendant to pursue the matter further by calling the attention of the witness to the statement itself. It was impossible for the witness to either admit or deny making the statement unless the statement itself was first related to her. The question did not call for an opinion, as ruled by the court. It called for a fact, that is the fact of whether or not the witness had made such a statement. The defendant was on trial for a crime which no one claimed he committed directly, but whose conviction as above stated was sought upon the ground that he was a party to a conspiracy, in the furtherance of which an attack was made by others upon the prosecutrix. The impeachment question ruled out by the court was asked for the purpose of proving that the prosecutrix had declared to others that the defendant was innocent. If she had admitted making the statement certainly the jury would then have been entitled to know what she meant by it. That is, whether she meant by it that she had falsified her testimony when she stated that the defendant was a party to the whispered conversation, which formed the basis of the conspiracy, or whether she failed to tell the truth when she stated the defendant refused to respond to the call for assistance from herself and companion, or whether it was untrue, as testified to by her, that the defendant stood in the doorway, laughing at them during their unfortunate predicament, while in the kitchen of the Howard street house. The truth of all of these elements was vital in determining the guilt of the defendant in view of the theory upon which he was tried.

On the other hand, if the witness had denied making the statement, the defendant would then have been in a position to contradict her by placing on the stand the other parties to the conversation, including Mrs. O'Connor, and the jury would then have been called upon to say which of them was telling the truth. It is only a fair inference to indulge in that, if Mrs. O'Connor had been called to contradict the prosecutrix, the whole mass of contradictory statements, which Mrs. O'Connor claims were made to her on the night of December 24, 1920, and of which the trial judge had full knowledge at the time of the examination of the witness, would have been brought to the surface. By denying the defendant the right to cross-examine the prosecutrix on this important matter the defendant was deprived of the very key to the whole situation, which in all fairness should have been laid before the jury in order that the jury, as the sole judge of the credibility of the witnesses and other evidence in the case, might determine whether or not the prosecutrix had testified falsely as to material facts. If she had, it was the duty of the jury to treat all of her testimony with distrust and to reject it unless they believed that in other respects she had told the truth. Without the testimony of Jean Stanley, no case in law so far as the record discloses would have been established against the defendant. Her evidence was the very foundation upon which the whole structure of the prosecution rested, and under those circumstances it is our opinion that the trial court should have allowed the defendant a reasonable cross-examination in order to ascertain whether or not she was telling the truth.

[7] Moreover, the effect of the limitations placed upon the cross-examination of the prosecutrix appears to be all the more prejudicial to the rights of this defendant in view of the knowledge of the contradictory statements imparted to the trial judge by Mrs. O'Connor. We are not to be understood as stating it as the law that, when a trial judge hears public rumors or reads statements in public journals or learns through the medium of anonymous letters or the like that a witness in a criminal case has testified falsely, he should take any cognizance of it. But, where, as in this case, a defendant is charged with a dastardly offense not because it is claimed he directly committed it, but because of his association with those who did commit it, and the trial judge learns from a source he firmly believes to be reliable, in this case from a sworn officer of the law and of the court, in whose keeping the court had intrusted the protection of these girl victims, and in whose veracity the court had unlimited faith, that the chief witness for the prosecution has admitted that she lied in material parts of her testimony, it was his duty, in our opinion, in the interest of justice and of fair dealing with the defendant, to have gone into the cross-examination of the witness thoroughly, since he recalled the witness at all, or else have allowed the defendant to take up the cross-examination of the witness where he had left off, so that the true situation as he knew it to be might be placed before the jury. In no other way could the jury fairly and fully judge of the guilt of the defendant, and in no other way could the defendant be given a fair trial.

[8] In conclusion, it may be stated that this was the fifth defendant and the seventh trial, on charges growing out of this moral outrage, to be brought before the trial judge who presided here. The evidence of the brutality and indignity visited upon these girls by Murphy, Kruvosky, MacDonald, and Boyd were such as to shock the sensibilities of the judge and of the community. Under such strained circumstances it is only consistent with human feelings that there should be a sincere desire to promptly and adequately impose the law's penalties upon those who have been the law's violators, but, even under those circumstances, the constitutional right of the accused to a fair and impartial trial is no different than in any other case, and where, as seems to be the situation here, public sentiment has been righteously aroused and there is an apparent inclination to condemn all persons connected with the affair before they have been tried, the courts should exercise the utmost care in seeing to it that the accused is accorded the full measure of his constitutional rights, and that every opportunity recognized by the law is given him to prove his innocence.

In view of what has been said it is our opinion that the judgment and the order appealed from should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

BLODGETT v. RHEINSCHILD et al.
(Civ. 3525.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. March 6, 1922.)

1. Usury §52—Commission payable to lender held device to evade statute.

Where money was loaned directly by the lender to the borrower, without any intermediary, a charge for a commission for making the loan in addition to the maximum rate of interest allowed by the usury law was a device to evade the law.

2. Usury §146—Lender cannot recover any interest even after maturity of debt.

Under the usury law approved at the general election of November 5, 1918 (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), § 2, providing that a contract to pay more than the interest therein permitted is void as to any agreement to pay interest, and that no action at law to recover interest in any sum shall be maintained, an agreement to pay interest at a usurious rate prevents the recovery of interest after the maturity of the debt as well as before its maturity.

3. Chattel mortgages §6—Bill of sale with lease back held a "mortgage."

A bill of sale by the owner of an automobile with a lease back from the buyer, which required the payment of a sum loaned to the seller with interest in installments and gave the seller the option to repurchase the automobile for $1 after making the payments, was but a mortgage of the automobile under Civ. Code, § 2924, since the documents were given to secure the repayment of the loan, and the possession remained in the owner of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mortgage.]

4. Chattel mortgages §162—Mortgagee's possession after maturity does not cut off redemption.

A chattel mortgage is but an incident of the indebtedness impressing the property with a lien only, and the legal title remains in the mortgagor under Civ. Code, § 2927, and taking of possession of property on the mortgagor's default does not enlarge the mortgagee's interest, nor cut off the mortgagor's right of redemption, but only enhances the security by giving possession for the purpose of sale.

5. Chattel mortgages §26—Agreement in advance to waive equity of redemption is void; "once a mortgage, always a mortgage."

The established doctrine that once a mortgage, always a mortgage, means that no agreement in advance to waive the equity of redemption is valid, and that a transaction once impressed with the character of a chattel mortgage establishes the right to redeem until the equity of redemption is foreclosed or barred or duly released under Civ. Code, § 2889.

6. Chattel mortgages §26—Cannot be made to operate as conveyance on default.

The parties cannot make a conveyance of a chattel absolute in form a security for the payment of money by a given day with the further agreement that if payment is not made, the instrument shall be treated as an absolute sale, so that a provision in a so-called lease, which was in effect a chattel mortgage, that the title should vest absolutely in the lessor on the lessee's default was invalid.

7. Chattel mortgages §74—Clause authorizing seizure held indivisible from that cutting off redemption.

In a so-called lease, which was in effect a chattel mortgage, and which gave the mortgagee the right to possession and absolute title on the mortgagor's default in making any payment, the provision giving absolute title was inseparable from that giving right to possession, and both were invalidated by the invalidity of the former.

8. Chattel mortgages §136—"Wrongful conversion" by mortgagee after seizure extinguishes the lien.

Where the mortgagee, after seizing the chattel under his mortgage, converted it to his own use by making a private conditional sale thereof to another, such a conversion was inconsistent with the continued existence of the mortgage lien, and effected an extinguishment thereof, under Civ. Code, § 2910, as to extinction of lien by wrongful conversion by lienholder.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conversion.]

9. Replevin §83—Use value of automobile may be recovered.

Where the property replevied and delivered to plaintiff has a value on account of the use to which it may be put, as distinguished from its value for sale or consumption, as in the case of an automobile, the successful defendant may recover the value of the use of the property during the time it was unlawfully withheld from him under the writ.

10. Replevin §83—Use value may be recovered, notwithstanding alternative judgment for value.

Where the replevied automobile was delivered to plaintiff under the writ, and defendant succeeded at the trial, it was proper to allow defendant the value of the use of the automobile during the time it was withheld from him, even though the judgment allowed him the market value of the automobile in the alternative if plaintiff could not deliver the chattel itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by J. L. Blodgett against George W. Rheinschild and others to recover possession of an automobile. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Robert McCarty, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Davis & Thorne, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from the judgment in an action brought by him to recover possession of an automobile. The case comes to us on the judgment roll only. The action, commenced on May 6, 1919, was originally brought in the name of J. L. Blodgett; subsequently, as shown by a supplemental complaint, the J. L. Blodgett Company, a corporation, succeeded to all of the rights of the original plaintiff; but, this notwithstanding, it will conduce to brevity if we discuss the case as though there had been no such change of interest.

The complaint alleges that on February 18, 1919, plaintiff was and ever since has been the owner of and entitled to the possession of the automobile, that it is of the value of $500, and that defendants unlawfully withhold it. The defendant George W. Rheinschild answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and in a cross-complaint alleges facts showing that on February 18, 1919, he executed to plaintiff a bill of sale of the automobile to secure a sum of money loaned to him by plaintiff at a usurious rate of interest; that the full amount of the loan did not become due until August 18, 1919, which was more than three months after plaintiff brought this action; and that immediately after commencing the action plaintiff obtained possession of the car from the sheriff, by whom it had been seized pursuant to proceedings had under sections 509 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure; wherefore the answering defendant, the respondent here, prayed that, upon his repaying the loan that had been made to him by plaintiff, he recover possession of the car, or its value, with damages for its detention.

The findings of the court disclose a situation substantially as follows: The answering defendant, George W. Rheinschild—the party alluded to when, hereafter, we refer simply to the defendant—had purchased the automobile prior to February 18, 1919, from a third party whose name is not disclosed by the record. On the date last mentioned defendant owed his vendor, on account of the purchase price of the automobile, a balance of $276.50. On February 18, 1919, plaintiff loaned to defendant the sum of $400, a part of which was used by defendant in paying the latter's vendor the balance due on the purchase price of the car. As security for the $400 thus loaned by plaintiff to defendant, the latter executed to plaintiff a bill of sale of the automobile. Contemporaneously with the execution of the bill of sale, and as a part of the same transaction, plaintiff and defendant executed an instrument in writing, in form a lease, which, after reciting that the defendant, as lessee, has hired and received from the plaintiff, as lessor, the automobile in question for the term of six months, provides that the "lessee" (defendant) shall pay the "lessor" (plaintiff), as rental for the hire of said automobile during said term of six months, the sum of $434.70, payable in six monthly installments of $72.45 each, commencing on March 18, 1919, and ending on August 18, 1919, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month after the termination of the "lease" until the whole amount of the "rent" shall be paid. The document contains the following provisions respecting plaintiff's right to take possession:

"If the lessee defaults in any of the above payments, when due, or breaches any provision of this lease, * * * the lessor may, at his option, without previous demand or notice, * * * retake possession of said automobile * * * with or without process of law; and all payments theretofore paid hereunder shall thereupon be forfeited to the lessor, and this lease shall thereupon terminate, and all rights of lessee in this contract and said automobile shall thereupon cease and are hereby waived; * * * or the lessor may declare the whole of the sums then remaining unpaid to be immediately due and payable, and sue therefor."

The document further provides that if the "lessee" shall make all payments when due, then he shall have the right to purchase the automobile by paying the "lessor" one dollar, and thereupon the latter shall execute to the "lessee" a good and sufficient bill of sale.

There were no writings of any kind other than the so-called "lease" and the bill of sale to plaintiff. Defendant had acquired possession of the automobile from his vendor prior to the time when he secured the loan from plaintiff. This possession he retained, undisturbed, until May 7, 1919, when, as we have stated, the automobile was taken from him by the sheriff and delivered to plaintiff pursuant to proceedings had under sections 509 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure.

From the foregoing it is obvious that if plaintiff ever had any right to the possession of the automobile it was only because he had a mortgage lien on the car, created by defendant's execution of the bill of sale and the so-called "lease."

The $400 that plaintiff loaned to defendant was applied and paid out as follows: $276.50 was paid to the former owner of the automobile, defendant's vendor, to satisfy the unpaid balance of the purchase price then owing to him by defendant; $16.50 was retained by plaintiff to pay for insuring the car during the life of the so-called "lease"; and the balance, $107, was paid to defendant.

The $434.70 mentioned in the "lease"—the total amount that defendant agreed to repay to plaintiff in six monthly installments of $72.45 each—is made up of the following: The $400 that was actually loaned to defendant, and which was paid to him or applied to his use as aforesaid; the sum of $14.70 which represents "interest" charged defendant for loaning him the sum of $400 for the term of six months; and the sum of $20, exacted by plaintiff "as a commission for making the loan." The interest charge of $14.70, bearing in mind that one-sixth of the principal was repaid to plaintiff every month, and making due allowance therefor, exceeds by 70 cents interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum on the loan of $400 for six months.

[1] The $400 actually loaned to defendant was the property of plaintiff; the latter himself negotiated the loan directly with defendant—that is, there was no agent or intermediary in the transaction. There was, therefore, no occasion for the payment of a "commission" by either the borrower or the lender. Designating the $20 as a "commission" did not make it such. This word "commission" was but a euphemism, employed in an attempt to justify the exaction of a greater sum for the loan than at the rate of $12 upon one $100 for one year—the maximum amount that a lender is entitled to ask or receive since the present usury law was adopted at the general election held November 5, 1918. The device of a "commission" has therefore the characteristics of a shift to circumvent and avoid the usury law. "As a general rule, any benefit or advantage exacted by the lender from the borrower, whatever be its name or form, which, added to the interest taken or reserved, would yield to the lender a greater profit upon his loan than is allowed by law is deemed usury." 39 Cyc. 971.

The automobile having been seized by the sheriff and delivered to plaintiff on May 7, 1919, defendant, to secure its return, gave the necessary redelivery bond, and the car was immediately returned to him, remaining in his possession until October 2, 1919, when it again was seized by the sheriff under a default judgment entered against defendant on September 25, 1919. That judgment was subsequently set aside, but only on condition that the automobile should remain in plaintiff's possession as security for the loan. It continued in plaintiff's possession until March 12, 1920, when the latter delivered it to a third party under a conditional sale contract.

Defendant has made no payment on account of the money loaned to him by plaintiff. While the automobile was in plaintiff's possession, subsequent to its seizure by the sheriff, plaintiff caused needed repairs to be made, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $138.12. The court found the value of the car to be $550, and its usable value, during the time that defendant was deprived of its possession, to be $210, or at the rate of $20 per month for 10½ months.

As conclusions of law the lower court found that the charge of $20 as a "commission" for making the loan of $400 to defendant was contrary to law, and that by reason thereof plaintiff never acquired any right to the possession of the automobile; that therefore the car was unlawfully seized by plaintiff, and that defendant is entitled to a judgment for the sum of $210, damages for the detention of the automobile after its seizure in this action, less the sum of $138.12, the amount expended by plaintiff for necessary repairs while the car was in his possession; also that defendant is entitled to the return of the automobile upon the payment to plaintiff of the sum of $400, or, if delivery cannot be made, that defendant have judgment for the value of the car, $550, less said sum of $400. Judgment was entered accordingly.

Appellant claims that if the contract was usurious, and if for that reason, the provision for installment payments by respondent, the borrower, was void, nevertheless, upon the maturity of the full amount of the debt on August 18, 1919, which was after appellant had commenced this action, he became entitled to take possession of the automobile. And because the property, which, as we have said, had been taken from respondent by the sheriff and delivered to appellant, was in the latter's possession when the judgment was rendered, it is claimed by appellant that, even if he did not have the right to possession at the time when he brought the action, nevertheless, if he subsequently acquired such right, that is, if he acquired the right to possession upon the maturity of the whole amount of the debt, the court should not unconditionally redeliver the property to respondent, but should adjudge that the latter is entitled to redelivery only upon condition that he pay appellant the amount actually due the latter at the date of the judgment. Appellant concedes that the trial court attempted to pursue this course, but contends that the amount adjudged to be due him from the respondent is less than it should be. Without deciding the question, we shall assume, for the purposes of this decision, that, even though appellant may not have had the right to possession when he commenced the action, respondent, nevertheless, will be entitled to redelivery only upon payment of the precise amount due by him to appellant if the latter, at any time before judgment, had become entitled to take possession.

Both parties have argued the case upon the assumption that the only usury act that can have any possible application is the initiative measure that was approved at the general election held November 5, 1918 (Stats. 1919, p. lxxxiii), section 2 whereof provides:

"No person * * * shall directly or indirectly take or receive * * * any greater sum * * * for the loan * * * of money * * * than at the rate of twelve dollars upon one hundred dollars for one year. * * * Any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with the provisions of this section shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein contained to pay interest, and no action at law to recover interest in any sum shall be maintained and the debt cannot be declared due until the full period of time it was contracted for has elapsed."

[2] The first point made by appellant is that even if the charge of a "commission" of $20 in addition to the sum of $14.70 charged as interest, be tantamount to the taking and receiving by the lender, the plaintiff in this action, of a sum in excess of 12 per cent. per annum on the amount loaned, contrary to the above-quoted provision of the initiative act, nevertheless appellant, to quote the language of his brief, is "entitled to legal interest (one per cent. per month) allowed by law and provided for in the agreement between plaintiff and defendant," and that such interest should have been added to the amount which the judgment required respondent to pay to appellant as a condition precedent to a redelivery of the automobile. This contention, if upheld, would not only do violence to the express letter of the law, but would frustrate its manifest intent and purpose. Section 2 of the act expressly declares: (1) That any contract of any nature in conflict with its provisions shall be "null and void" as to "any agreement * * * to pay interest"; (2) that in such case "no action at law to recover interest in any sum shall be maintained"; and (3) that the debt cannot be declared due "until the full period of time it was contracted for has elapsed"—which, in this case, was not until the expiration of August 18, 1919, or more than three months after plaintiff brought this action. We think it is clearly the intent of this initiative measure that there shall be no recovery of any interest whatever, and that the loss of all interest, whether accruing before or after the maturity of the debt, is one of the penalties contemplated by the act. When the initiative measure declares that if the contract be usurious "no action at law to recover interest in any sum shall be maintained," it ought to be understood to mean exactly what it says, namely, that if any person shall contract for a usurious rate of interest he shall not recover interest "in any sum." If only interest before the maturity of the debt were intended to be banned, such intent could have been accomplished by that provision of the act which declares that the usurious contract shall be null and void "as to any agreement * * * therein to pay interest." For if the act contained only that provision, then the usurious contract would have to be read as though it had made no mention of any interest whatever, in which case there might be ground for the claim that the debt should draw interest at the legal rate after its maturity. It obviously was for the purpose of preventing any such benefit to accrue to one who lends money at a usurious rate that the provision which nullifies the agreement as to interest is followed by the other provision which declares that such lender shall not recover "interest in any sum."

[3] It next is contended that the judgment is erroneous in so far as it allows defendant damages in the sum of $210 for the detention of the automobile by plaintiff for the 10½ months that it was in the latter's possession during the pendency of the action. The greater part of this period of 10½ months accrued after the maturity of the whole amount of defendant's indebtedness. It is argued, therefore, that, at least as early as the full maturity of the debt, plaintiff was entitled to possession under the terms of the written agreement, and that therefore defendant is not entitled to damages for any part of the period during which plaintiff was thus rightfully in possession of the property. The vice of this argument lies in the assumption that, under the terms of the written contract—the "lease," so called—plaintiff became entitled to possession upon defendant's default in the payment of his debt at maturity. We think that the provision in the "lease" purporting to give to plaintiff the right to take possession of the property upon any default by defendant in the payment of his debt does violence to the doctrine that "what is once a mortgage is always a mortgage," and that therefore it is wholly nugatory. The transaction evidenced by the "lease" and by defendant's bill of sale to plaintiff was but a mortgage. The two documents were executed for the purpose of securing a debt. They were given to secure the repayment of the loan that plaintiff made to defendant. The possession remained in defendant, the owner of the property. As between the parties, therefore, the transaction was a mortgage. Civ. Code, § 2924.

[4] In this state the mortgage is but an incident of the indebtedness, the property is impressed with only a lien for the benefit of the mortgagee, the legal title remains in the mortgagor, and the mortgagee is not entitled to possession unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage (Civ. Code, § 2927); and if, upon the mortgagor's default in the payment of his debt, the mortgagee does take possession under an express stipulation therefor in the mortgage, his interest in the property is not enlarged or affected thereby, nor is the mortgagor's right of redemption cut off. Harper v. Gordon, 128 Cal. 492, 61 Pac. 84. If a mortgagee take possession under the terms of his mortgage, he does so only for the purpose of increasing his security—his security being enhanced by the fact that if he has possession the property will naturally bring a higher price at a foreclosure sale, or at a public sale made as in the case of a "pledge," since the validity of the sale, whether the property be sold as a pledge or under a decree of foreclosure, depends upon the presence of the property at the place of sale. Ely v. Williams, 6 Cal. App. 455, 92 Pac. 393. So much for the purpose for which a mortgagee may take possession of the mortgaged property.

[5] Turning now to a consideration of certain contracts which the law forbids a mortgagee to make with his mortgagor: It is an established doctrine that "what is once a mortgage is always a mortgage," which means that no agreement in advance to waive the equity of redemption is valid, and that when once it is established that a transaction is impressed with the character of a mortgage the right to redeem will continue until the debt is paid or until the equity of redemption is foreclosed or barred, or duly and sufficiently released. Civ. Code, § 2889; Bradbury v. Davenport, 114 Cal. 593, 46 Pac. 1062, 55 Am. St. Rep. 92.

[6] For the same reason it is not competent for the parties to make a conveyance of property, absolute in form, a security for the payment of money by a given day, with the further agreement that if payment is not made the instrument shall be treated as an absolute sale. If the instrument is a mortgage when delivered, it will so continue until the right of redemption is cut off in some of the modes recognized by law. Bearss v. Ford, 108 Ill. 16, 26; 27 Cyc. 975.

[7] The provision in the "lease" under which plaintiff claims the right to take possession if defendant defaults in any payment is more than a mere contract for the transfer of possession to the mortgagee as further security for his loan to the mortgagor. It is, in effect, a contract whereby the parties undertook to provide that if payment be not made when due the mortgagor's right of redemption shall be cut off and the title vest absolutely and unconditionally in the mortgagee. Under the doctrine "once a mortgage always a mortgage," such an agreement is wholly void. This particular provision of the "lease" is not severable; it is indivisible. The clause which purports to give to plaintiff, the mortgagee, the right to take possession is indissolubly connected with the clauses which purport to cut off defendant's right of redemption. The provision is therefore void in toto, and does not give to plaintiff any right whatever to possess the mortgaged property. From this it follows that plaintiff's possession, acquired after the sheriff had seized the property and delivered it to him, was without right, and that therefore he is liable to damages for its detention.

[8] Moreover, according to the findings of the trial court plaintiff converted the property to his own use during the pendency of the action, thus extinguishing his lien and any right to possession. It is expressly found by the lower court that on March 20, 1920, and while the automobile was in plaintiff's possession, he delivered it to a third party under a conditional sale contract, and that such third party is now in possession under that contract. This disposition of the automobile under a private sale thereof was an unlawful assumption of dominion over the property in defiance of defendant's rights, made at a time when, if plaintiff had any right whatever to possession, it was for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of increasing his security. Such unlawful assumption of dominion amounted to a wrongful conversion of the property, inconsistent with the continued existence of plaintiff's mortgage lien, and effected an extinguishment thereof. Civ. Code, § 2910; Everett v. Buchanan, 27 Dak. 249, 6 N. W. 439, 8 N. W. 31; Loughborough v. McNevin, 74 Cal. 255, 14 Pac. 369, 15 Pac. 773, 5 Am. St. Rep. 435. See, also, Hudson v. Swan, 83 N. Y. 552. From this it follows that if any right to possession accrued to plaintiff after the commencement of the action such right was extinguished with the extinguishment of the lien, since it could exist only for the purpose of enhancing the security afforded by the lien.

[9] Where, as here, the property has a value on account of the use to which it may be put, as distinguished from its value for sale or consumption, the successful defendant may recover the value of the use of the property during the time it was unlawfully withheld from him under the writ. Ann. Cas. 1914A, p. 379, note to Thomas v. First Nat. Bank.

[10] The judgment is in the alternative; that is, it adjudges that, upon the payment to plaintiff of the sum of $400 owing to him by defendant, the latter shall recover the automobile, or its value if delivery cannot be had. Because of this alternative form of the judgment it is contended that it was error to award to defendant the usable value of the automobile during the time of its detention by plaintiff. There is no merit in this contention. It is expressly provided by section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure that—

"If the property [involved in a replevin action] has been delivered to the plaintiff, and the defendant claim the return thereof, judgment for the defendant may be for a return of the property or the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had, and damages for taking and withholding the same."

Where the property has a value on account of the use to which it may be put in excess of the legal rate of interest upon its value for sale or consumption, the defendant may recover such usable value notwithstanding the fact that he may be unable to secure a return of the property from the plaintiff, but may have to take in lieu thereof the value of the property. See Nahhas v. Browning, 181 Cal. 55, 183 Pac. 442, 6 A. L. R. 476, and Schrandt v. Young, 62 Neb. 254, 86 N. W. 1085.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ELLIS. (Cr. 2379.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 5, 1922.)

- 1. Criminal law ⚡1159(2), 1160—Weight of testimony for jury, and where verdict is approved, conviction will not be disturbed.

Where there is evidence supporting conviction, the weight to be accorded it was a question for the jury, and, on appeal, it cannot be disturbed upon the ground that it is not sustained by evidence, and the application of this rule is strengthened where the trial court has refused a new trial.

- 2. Homicide ⚡253(1), 354—Evidence held to support verdict of first degree murder and sentence of death.

In a homicide prosecution, evidence held to support a verdict of first degree murder and sentence of death.

- 3. Criminal law ⚡370—Evidence throwing light upon facts in issue admissible, though showing other offenses.

In a homicide prosecution, where deceased had been in defendant's home during the evening and left, and about 4:30 o'clock in the morning came to the back door, and defendant went out the front door and around the house to the rear, where the killing took place, evidence that defendant had sold liquor to deceased during the evening was admissible as tending to establish knowledge of deceased that liquor could be purchased at defendant's home, and in determining whether defendant was justified in believing that the person knocking at the rear intended to assail his home, or was desirous of purchasing liquor, even though showing another offense.

- 4. Criminal law ⚡351(9)—Defendant's escape from jail admissible as circumstance of guilt.

Where defendant was arrested on March 17th and on April 9th escaped from jail, admission of evidence as to his escape was not reversible error, there being no difference between flight before and after arrest.

- 5. Criminal law ⚡470, 478(1), 479, 494—Opinion of firearms and medical experts, as to point of entrance of bullet, admissible, and weight of testimony was for jury.

In a homicide prosecution, testimony of medical experts and firearms experts, that the bullet went into the back and came out through the abdomen of deceased, was admissible over objection that this was a question for the jury, its value and weight being for the jury, and such witnesses were competent.

- 6. Criminal law ⚡494—Change of expert's opinion as to point of entrance of bullet affected weight only.

In a homicide prosecution, where an expert witness testified, in preliminary examination, that, in his opinion, the bullet entered the abdomen of deceased, but upon trial stated he believed the bullet entered the back, stating his reasons for such change, the fact that the expert had changed his mind was not a ground for excluding his testimony, as it merely affected its weight.

- 7. Criminal law ⚡485(1)—Direct testimony of facts by experts rather than by answer to hypothetical question not objectionable.

Where it was urged that the experts should have been asked a formal hypothetical question rather than permitted to base their opinion on examination of the body and clothing of deceased, there can be no substantial exception, where the testimony was based upon actual examination.

- 8. Homicide ⚡348—Verdict carrying death penalty not result of passion and prejudice.

Where the record disclosed a fair trial, the mere fact that defendant was a colored man charged with killing a white man falls short of establishing prejudice and passion, warranting setting aside a verdict of guilty of first degree murder, carrying a death penalty.

- 9. Homicide ⚡332(2)—Jury determines punishment in first degree murder and, if justified by evidence, not reviewable.

Under Pen. Code, § 190, making first degree murder punishable by death or imprisonment for life, at the jury's discretion, and where, in review, the appellate court is satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to justify a verdict of murder in the first degree, its inquiry upon that point is ended.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Alfred Ellis was convicted of first degree murder, and sentenced to death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, and Don G. Bowker, Dist. Atty., of Ventura, for the People.

SHURTLEFF, J. Defendant and appellant was accused, in an information filed by the district attorney of Ventura county, with the crime of murder, and, upon the trial, the jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree, attaching the death penalty. Prior to judgment, defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and thereupon sentence of death was pronounced. Defendant appeals from this judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] One of the contentions of defendant is that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. The facts are as follows: Carlton E. Stannard (a white man) with two companions left a restaurant, where they had met by chance, in the city of Oxnard, Ventura county, this state, at about 1:30 o'clock on the morning of March 16, 1921, and walked in a southerly direction down Saviers road and thence in a westerly direction down Seventh street in said city. As they were proceeding on Seventh street, they heard music coming from the home of defendant, located on the corner of Seventh and B streets; Stannard, who is frequently herein-after referred to as the "deceased," went to the back door of his house and inquired of the defendant, who is a colored man, if he, deceased, and his companions could come in, and, receiving an affirmative answer, they entered the house. The defendant was giving a dance for the entertainment of certain members of a theatrical company, composed of colored people, which was then playing in Oxnard. The deceased and others present were served with intoxicating liquor by the defendant, for which he was paid. The companions of deceased left in a short time, but deceased remained. At the conclusion of the dance, at an early hour in the morning, all of the guests, including the deceased, excepting a colored musician named Carr, belonging to said theatrical company, left the defendant's home. The defendant's wife was present at the dance, but became intoxicated to an extent which incapacitated her, and, during the happening of the events immediately connected with and leading up to the shooting which resulted in the death of Stannard, was lying stupefied and asleep upon the bed in the house.

At about a quarter to 4 o'clock in the morning, and apparently after the departure of deceased, the defendant accompanied Carr to a rooming house across the street from defendant's dwelling, where he secured Carr a lodging for the night. Having thus provided for Carr, the defendant left this rooming house, presumably returning to his home, and Carr retired. The proprietress of this lodging house testified that, at about 4:30 or 25 minutes to 5 o'clock in the morning (March 16, 1921) she heard a shot "and it sounded awful close and muffled like." Helen Lee, another witness, present at the dance, stated that she left the defendant's home about 4 o'clock of the same morning for her house, which was in the rear of the home of defendant; that, shortly after reaching her house, she heard some one knocking at the back door of the defendant's house, and heard the defendant come out in the yard and say: "Why in the hell don't you go home, everybody has gone"; that about five minutes after that she heard something more like a door slamming and got up and looked out the door of her home and, not seeing anything, returned to her bed; that after she got back in bed she heard some one groan; that, at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon of the 16th of March, she noticed a bullet lodged in the back door of the defendant's home; that, after seeing the bullet, she went to her home for supper, and, after finishing it, returned to the defendant's house and found that, during her absence, the bullet had been removed and the door covered with "white stuff." She described the sound she heard as something like a boom, "it didn't sound so much like a gun, it sounded like it was muffled," and she further testified that she heard the screen door at the back of defendant's house shut after she heard this muffled noise.

At half past 6 o'clock or thereabouts, on the morning of said 16th of March, the body of deceased was found in an alley some 100 feet distant from the back door of the defendant's home. An examination showed that deceased had been shot straight through the body. The peace officers investigating the case found a Colt's .45 revolver, fully loaded, between the mattresses of defendant's bed. It further appeared that the deceased, who was about 34 or 35 years of age, had at one time served in the U. S. army, the date of such service not being given.

On being questioned, the defendant at first denied any knowledge of the affair, but subsequently stated the deceased had been accidentally shot by Carr with his (defendant's) gun; that he had given his gun to Carr with the request that he (Carr) look after "matters" for him during his temporary absence from the house, and that deceased had been killed accidentally while he (defendant) was away. He also stated that he had reloaded the revolver after Carr had shot the deceased with it. Finally, however, defendant admitted that he shot deceased with his (defendant's) gun, but asserted it was an accident. His story, told upon the witness stand is substantially as follows: That, after he returned from the lodging house after leaving Carr, he went to bed, and was just getting off to sleep when some one knocked, and he asked, "Who is there?" no one answered, but knocked again; that he then got out of bed, put on his slippers and, without dressing, took his revolver, a single action gun, cocked it, and went out the front door of the house, and thence around the house to the rear and "called out" to know who was there; and that deceased answered, "It is Stub," it appearing that deceased was also known by that name; that he said to deceased, "What the hell are you doing here? everybody has gone to bed;" that deceased said that he wanted another drink; that he told deceased he had no more liquor; that deceased insisted, and that they talked back and forth; that deceased was standing on the top step of the steps leading to the back door, with his back against the door and between the door and screen door and holding the screen door open; that he (defendant) stood on the ground with his revolver in his right hand hanging by his side; that deceased insisted on being given liquor and asked him what he had in his hand; that he (defendant) raised the gun to show deceased that it was a gun and not a bottle, and that deceased kicked the gun and it was discharged; that he (defendant) ran around the house and into the front door and deceased also ran. That he went through the house from the front door to the back door, stopping only a moment to look at his wife, who was lying intoxicated on the bed, and that when he got to the back door, deceased had entirely disappeared. That he did not know that deceased was killed, or that he had hit him, until he heard it after the body was found.

All of the evidence produced at the trial upon the point, except that of defendant, and which testimony, aside from that of defendant, was that of experts, was to the effect that the bullet, which passed through the body of deceased, entered at the back and came out the abdomen, which is a very important circumstance, and in which, as we will subsequently point out, the defendant was vitally concerned. It should be stated, however, that one of the witnesses so testifying at the trial, declared, at the preliminary hearing, that, in his opinion, the bullet had entered the abdomen and came out the back of the deceased. Defendant attaches considerable importance to this change of opinion, which we will presently consider.

Counsel for defendant, in the discussion of his contention that the verdict is not supported by the evidence and, in any event, that the facts do not justify the imposition of the death penalty, forcefully urges that the shooting occurred at the defendant's own home, where the defendant had a right to be and where the deceased had no right to be at so early an hour in the morning, hammering on the side of the defendant's house and upon the rear door thereof; that the most natural thing in the world for the defendant to do was to take his pistol and go out the front door, just as he did do, and then go cautiously around to the back of the house for the purpose of discovering who was disturbing the peace and quiet of his home at that "unseemly hour of the morning," and why it was being done; that the defendant and the deceased had not quarreled, and, so far as the record discloses, there had been no difference or ill feeling between them; and that there was present "no reason * * * why Ellis (defendant) would want to shoot Stannard (deceased)"; that they were, as claimed, on friendly terms, is indicated by the fact that defendant loaned the deceased money with which to get his breakfast. To these considerations might be added that the statement that the defendant's account of the shooting and the incidents occurring in connection therewith is corroborated by other witnesses in the following important particulars, the knocking at the back door of defendant's house, the defendant going out of his house by the front door, the words addressed by defendant to the deceased when he first saw him at the kitchen door; the slamming of the screen door, between which and the entrance or inner door, as we have seen, the defendant states the deceased was standing. But, aside from these facts and circumstances, there was evidence tending to support the verdict, and this court has uniformly held that, where that is so, we cannot disturb the verdict upon the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence, and the application of this rule is strengthened in a case where, as here, the trial court has refused a new trial. It is settled beyond controversy that the weight to be accorded the evidence is a question for the jury. People v. Wilson, 66 Cal. 370, 5 Pac. 624; People v. McCurdy, 68 Cal. 576, 10 Pac. 207; People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 Pac. 691, 56 Am. Rep. 126; People v. Curry, 103 Cal. 548, 37 Pac. 503; People v. Musumeci (Cal. App.) 197 Pac. 129. In People v. McCurdy, supra, a case wherein the extreme penalty of the law was imposed upon the defendant, who had been convicted of murder in the first degree, this court said:

"The situation of the parties, the surrounding circumstances, the incentives to the crime, and all of the probabilities, were questions peculiarly within the province of the jury to determine. There being evidence sufficient to support the verdict, we are not at liberty, under the well-established rules of this court, to interfere with such verdict upon the ground that it is contrary to the evidence."

[3] Defendant's next contention is that the trial court—

"committed reversible error in permitting the prosecution, over the objection of the defendant, to introduce testimony tending to prove defendant guilty of a crime other than that with which he was charged."

It was proven that alcoholic drinks were served by the defendant during the evening and that the deceased had partaken thereof, and that he paid the defendant for the same, and it is the admission of this testimony, particularly as to payment, that defendant claims was error. The question arose in this wise: A witness for the people was asked by the district attorney if the defendant took pay for the liquor which he furnished deceased, and the witness answered that he did. No objection was then made to the question. Some little time after the attorney for the defendant stated that the question was asked and answered so quickly that he did not have an opportunity to object, and asked the permission of the court to make an objection at that time and to move to strike out the answer—

"on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and had nothing to do with the issues of the case."

The motion to strike out was granted, and the jury instructed to disregard the testimony of the witness "to the effect that the defendant took pay for the liquor which was furnished by him." After further discussion, the court announced it would change its ruling, and permit the testimony to stand "at the present time," subject to the right of the defendant to renew his motion to strike at the close of the prosecution's case, the court further stating:

"The jury will understand that it (said testimony touching payment for the liquor) is not admitted for the purpose, and it is not to be considered by the jury for the purpose of tending to show a separate offense, the defendant is charged here with murder and not being charged with any other offense."

The motion to strike out was not renewed by defendant, but we regard this as of little consequence, for in our opinion the motion as made and denied sufficiently raises the question. We can discover no reversible error in this ruling. It is the law that, where the proffered evidence directly throws light upon the facts of the issue being tried, it is admissible, although it proves another offense as well. People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 Pac. 1093; People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 44 Pac. 186; People v. Rogers, 71 Cal. 565, 12 Pac. 679; People v. Miller, 121 Cal. 343, 53 Pac. 816; People v. Smith, 9 Cal. App. 644, 99 Pac. 1111. In People v. Suesser, supra, 142 Cal. 363, 75 Pac. 1096, this court said:

"It is of course true that evidence * * * as to other offenses, is not admissible against a defendant unless there is a sufficient connection between the facts sought to be proved and the particular act under investigation. Where the proffered evidence is relevant to the issue being tried, the mere fact that it shows * * * the commission of other offenses by the defendant, is no legal objection to its admission. This is recognized by all the authorities."

In People v. Smith, supra, 9 Cal. App. 647, 99 Pac. 1112, it is declared:

"Where the proffered evidence directly throws light upon the facts of the issue being tried, it is admissible, although it proves another offense as well."

In People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 230, 46 Pac. 153, 157, this court gave expression to the following:

"If the evidence of another crime is necessary or pertinent to the proof of the one charged, the law will not thwart justice by excluding that evidence, simply because it involves the commission of another crime. People v. Tucker, 104 Cal. 440. The general tests of the admissibility of evidence in a criminal case are: 1. Is it a part of the res gestæ? 2. If not, does it tend logically, naturally, and by reasonable inference, to establish any fact material for the people, or to overcome any material matter sought to be proved by the defense? If it does, then it is admissible, whether it embraces the commission of another crime or does not, whether the other crime be similar in kind or not, whether it be part of a single design or not."

Applying these principles to the present case, we have the following: Evidence had been introduced showing that defendant was serving liquor during the evening, and hence, proof that the deceased paid for the liquor served him and did not receive it as a gratuity would tend to establish knowledge on the part of deceased that liquor could be purchased at the defendant's home, which would be a circumstance in finally determining whether the defendant was justified in believing that the person knocking on the side of his house and on the rear door thereof, intended to assail his home and commit a felony, and was not desirous of purchasing more liquor, as well as to explain Stannard's presence there. In fact, as the defendant subsequently testified the deceased said before the shooting, he wanted more liquor, "another drink," and the evidence furnishes no other reason for the presence of the deceased at defendant's kitchen door on the morning of the day of the shooting. In our opinion, the circumstances appearing in the record show a relevant connection between the selling of the liquor, the cause of the deceased's return to the house, and the shooting. Furthermore, the jury was entitled to know all that transpired between the deceased and the defendant, from the time that the former entered the house of the latter until and including the shooting.

Defendant in his brief cites a large number of cases, most of which are from this court, which he affirms support his contention that the evidence objected to was inadmissible. We have carefully examined these authorities, and, in our opinion, none of them is in conflict with the rule above announced, or applicable to the facts of the instant case. They do, however, uphold and apply to the facts with which they respectively dealt, that other rule, equally well grounded in the law, that evidence of another and distinct criminal charge, in no way connected with the one before the court, is not admissible. Such was the ruling in People v. Vidal, 121 Cal. 221, 53 Pac. 558; People v. Hartman, 62 Cal. 562; People v. Glass, 158 Cal. 650, 112 Pac. 281; People v. Arlington, 123 Cal. 356, 55 Pac. 1003—which cases are illustrative of all the authorities upon the point to which defendant refers us. Moreover, in the case at bar, the court expressly told the jury that the evidence in question was not admitted for the purpose of showing a separate offense. Counsel for defendant, in his very able brief, declares that the "defendant did not claim that he shot the deceased because he demanded entrance to his home, or because he was attempting to effect an entrance. The only defense he made was that the shooting was wholly accidental"—but even so, it is clear that defendant went around to the rear of his home to ascertain who was knocking at his door. He testifies:

"Some one knocked, and I says who is there, no one answered and they knocked again, I got up and picked up a pair of house shoes and picked a pistol up and went out around the front door and I went around the corner, I says who in hell is out there, * * * and he called, he said it was Stubby [deceased]"

—in connection with which testimony the jury was entitled to consider all that had transpired that night between the deceased and defendant when determining the truth of said claim that the shooting was accidental, which their verdict indicates they did not believe. Furthermore, while the defendant did not testify that he received pay for the drinks he served the deceased on that fatal night, he did, upon his direct examination, state that when, after reaching the back of his house, he inquired, "Who in hell is out there?" the deceased replied, "I want something to drink." The following is the defendant's statement of what occurred:

"I says I haven't got nothing, he says let me have a drink, and I says everybody has gone, I says go home and go to bed, he says give me another drink, he was standing between the screen and the door, I pulled the screen back and I says I haven't anything to drink, he says give me just one more, I says if I had it you would be welcome."

Upon cross-examination the defendant testified:

"He [deceased] says I want something to drink. I says I haven't got any more."

From the defendant's own statement it clearly appears he was serving intoxicating liquors, and so intimately connected is that circumstance with the appearance of the deceased at defendant's rear door, that we think it was competent to prove whether such serving to the deceased was an act of hospitality or for compensation. If for compensation, the defendant might reasonably expect that those whom he had thus served would assume it could be purchased at any time and might return for that purpose. Anything so connected with the alleged killing, in point of time and character, as to explain how and why it was committed, was admissible, and for that reason the prosecution was entitled to introduce evidence tending to show that it was because the deceased was demanding more liquor, intimately connected with which demand was the fact that the defendant had a few hours previously furnished him (deceased) liquor, for which he had paid defendant, and which in itself tended to justify deceased's request, that the defendant shot the deceased.

[4] Defendant further affirms that the trial court committed reversible error in permitting the prosecution, over his objection, to introduce testimony showing that he escaped from the county jail after he had been confined therein for a considerable time, the purpose of the testimony being to prove flight, and in giving the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that, if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was arrested for the crime charged in the information, and that, after being informed of the cause of his arrest, escaped or attempted to escape from the person having him under arrest, it is a circumstance that the jury may consider in determining his guilt or innocence."

Defendant made no attempt to escape at the time of the shooting, but remained in Oxnard until his arrest on the evening of March 17, 1921, but, after such arrest and on April 9, 1921, he made his escape from the county jail of Ventura county. The testimony concerning such escape is rather meager. The record discloses the following: The undersheriff of Ventura county, a witness on behalf of the prosecution, was asked by the district attorney if the defendant escaped from the county jail, which question was objected to on the ground that it was leading, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; the court, in ruling, said: "It is leading, * * * however the objection will be overruled." The answer, which defendant moved to strike out, and which motion was denied, was, in substance, that the defendant escaped on April 9, 1921, and that he was recaptured on April 14, 1921, at San Bernardino.

Defendant correctly concedes that the "proof of flight is generally admissible upon the theory that it has a tendency to show consciousness of guilt," but contends that the proof must be confined to "flight immediately or soon after the commission of the crime and before the defendant has been apprehended and taken into custody, or at least before he has been confined for some time in jail," but refers us to no authority sustaining this position. The contention cannot be upheld. In People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 88, 74 Pac. 547, the following was quoted from the opinion of Judge Cooley, in People v. Arnold, 43 Mich. 303, 5 N. W. 385, 38 Am. St. Rep. 182:

"It was never doubted that the conduct of a suspected party, when charged with a crime may be put in evidence against him when it is such as an innocent man would not be likely to resort to. * * * It may be shown that the accused fled to escape arrest, or broke jail or attempted to do so, or offered a bribe for his liberty to his keeper."

In People v. Crowley, 13 Cal. App. 322, 325, 109 Pac. 493, 495, it is said:

"That an attempt to escape is a circumstance proper to be shown and considered by the jury is put beyond controversy by the authorities."

There can be no well-grounded difference, so far as the act evidences consciousness of guilt, between flight before and after arrest. People v. Welsh, 63 Cal. 167; People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 127, 549; People v. Flannelly, 128 Cal. 83, 87, 60 Pac. 670.

We do not think the instruction, touching the evidentiary effect of the escape of defendant after his arrest, is open to the criticism which defendant directs against it. The jury was correctly told that it was "a circumstance" which it might consider "in determining his [defendant's] guilt or innocence," and it was in no wise misleading or uncertain or ambiguous, and substantially conformed to the law, as above stated.

[5] Defendant strenuously insists that the trial court erred in permitting two witnesses for the people, Shilling and Kemper, claimed to be experts in the use of firearms, over his (defendant's) objection, to respectively give their opinion as to the point of entrance and exit of the bullet which killed deceased, and in permitting Drs. Homer, Swift, and Lewis, also witnesses produced by the prosecution, to give their opinions touching the same matter. It is contended by defendant that the entrance and exit of the bullet was not a question for expert testimony, but one of fact, to be solely determined by the jury upon the evidence adduced. We are unable to give our approval to this contention. It is obvious that it is a pivotal point in the case, in that it directly bears upon the question whether the shooting admitted by the defendant was, as he claims, an accident or done with "malice aforethought." If deceased was shot in the back, it would tend to disprove and contradict the defendant's account of what occurred between him and the deceased at the time of the shooting, and, upon the other hand, if the bullet entered the abdomen, it would strongly support the claim of the defendant that the shooting was accidental.

We have given the authorities cited by defendant as sustaining this contention a careful examination, and none of them, in our opinion, is analogous to the one at bar, or controlling here. The rule of evidence that they announce and correctly apply to the facts they severally presented is not applicable to the facts of the instant case. Moreover, the point advanced is definitely determined adversely to defendant, in People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 566, 56 Pac. 424, 430, where it is said:

"It is claimed that the superior court erred in allowing Dr. Iglick to give his opinion as an expert, upon the question of exit and entrance of the bullet. The doctor had been a practicing physician and surgeon for 15 years, but had never had but one case of gunshot wound, and in that case there was only a wound of entrance; but he had taken a regular course of lectures on medical jurisprudence, had studied the standard authorities on the subject of gunshot wounds, had read the reports of our army surgeons on the subject, and had himself conducted the autopsy in this case, so that he was not only able to express a general opinion in answer to a hypothetical question, but was able to state the particular grounds upon which his opinion in this case was founded. There was, we think, a sufficient foundation laid to warrant the court in admitting his testimony. Its value was a question for the jury." (The italics are ours.)

The qualifications, as experts, of each of the witnesses produced were sufficiently established. Dr. Homer, who made the post mortem examination, had been a practicing physician for about 9 years, had had considerable experience with wounds, and, during the World War, was a member of the expeditionary forces in Scotland. He examined the body of the deceased, and, in stating the result of such examination, said:

"I went over the body externally first, and found nothing of any wound excepting a puncture wound, which I took to be a gunshot wound in the abdomen and an inch and a half below the lower border of ribs, an inch to the left of the mid line through the abdomen. Another hole in the back, slightly to the right of the vertebra between the first and second lumbar vertebrae. * * * I would judge that it [course of the bullet] was almost straight through [the body]."

After giving a detailed description of the wound, and the condition of the clothing worn by the deceased at the time of the shooting, so far as its condition might indicate the point of entry and exit of the bullet, he stated that, in his opinion, it entered the back. Dr. Smith, another expert, said he had been a practicing physician for 11 years and served in his professional capacity in our army in France, and, while in that service, saw from 60 to 120 gunshot wounds a day. He also examined the body of the deceased and, in his opinion, "undoubtedly the bullet went in the back and came out through the abdomen," giving his reason for such opinion. Dr. Lewis, a physician and surgeon of 14 years' experience, and who was a major in the medical corps of the American Army in France, testified that he had made a careful examination of the clothing of deceased, which had been received in evidence, and gave as his opinion, which was based entirely upon such examination of the clothing, that "the point of entrance of the bullet was in the back, and the exit in the front." Dr. Lewis stated further, that when in the service he drew his conclusions as to the point of entrance of a bullet "more often from the clothing" the wounded man wore than from the condition of the wound.

C. J. Shilling, called by the prosecution, testified that, for 12 years, he had been special representative of the Remington Arms Company, and prior to that time his profession was that of an "expert shot"—"an exhibition shot"—and that he had handled all lines of small firearms, revolvers, shotguns, rifles, and pistols, including a .45 Colt's revolver, and had occasion to observe the effect of firearms on clothing, and had been an expert witness in a murder case in San Francisco, in connection with which he saw experimental work performed with a pistol. He had seen experimental work with a pistol, rifle, and shotgun at "close range," as close as within 6 inches, practically at the muzzle; that the pistol used in such experimental work was a .38 Smith and Wesson Special and 150 grain lead ball; that he did not know what kind of a bullet the deceased was shot with. After further testimony tending to qualify the witness as an expert, he stated: "To my mind there is no doubt but what the bullet entered at the back, the smaller hole, and came out at the front of the coat, or the larger hole," giving his reason for his opinion, which need not be repeated here. William T. Kemper, "a cleaner and dyer," also an expert witness for the prosecution, testified that his father taught him to shoot when he was 6 years of age, and from the time he was about 12 years old to the present he did shooting for amusement and exhibition purposes; that he had 3 years' experience in the regular army, where he had occasion to shoot almost every day in the week; that he left the army in 1904; that he had cleaned a number of suits since he had been in business, which had been penetrated by bullets, and had "made experiments" on canvas and paper and shooting at cloth "to see how far the charge of powder can be consumed"; that he then had two guns in his possession similar to the one placed in evidence by the prosecution and with which it is claimed the defendant shot deceased; that he had shot with them, using lead bullets; that, in the experiments, which he testified he had made, where pistols were used "they were fired from 20 to 75 yards," and his opinion was that the bullet entered the coat of deceased from the back.

As we have said, in our opinion all of this evidence was admissible, its value and weight being a matter for the jury. The experts in the use of firearms, and the doctor who examined the clothing only, were as competent to give their opinion as to the point of entrance and exit of the bullet, which passed through the body of deceased, based upon their experience and observations, the character and extent of which has already been herein stated, as Drs. Homer and Smith, whose opinions as experts were admissible, under the authority of People v. Phelan, supra. People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 624, 629, 49 Pac. 833, is also in point. There the surgeon who attended the deceased prior to his death testified that he had examined the gunshot wound which caused his death, and had examined gunshot wounds in the past, and taken bullets therefrom, and knew the size of the bullets making these various wounds. Under objection, he then testified that, in his opinion, the wound upon deceased was inflicted by a .41 or .44 caliber bullet, and this court held there was "no substantial objection to this evidence." It is obvious that the witness in the Wong Chuey

Case testified primarily not as a surgeon but because he was an expert in determining from an examination of a gunshot wound the size of the bullet with which it was made, just as the firearms experts and doctors in this case, from an inspection of the holes in the wearing apparel of deceased produced by the fatal bullet, were able to and did give an opinion touching the point of entry and exit of such bullet.

[6] Defendant, as already noted, complains that Dr. Homer testified, at the preliminary examination, that, in his opinion, the bullet entered the abdomen of deceased, but, upon the trial, changed such opinion and stated that he believed the bullet entered the back of the deceased, stating his reasons for such change. The fact that the doctor had, between the date of the preliminary examination and his testifying at the trial, changed his mind as above stated, was not a ground for excluding his testimony, and defendant does not so contend; at most, it merely affected the weight of his evidence, which it was the province of the jury to determine.

[7] It is further urged that the experts should have been asked a formal hypothetical question rather than permitted, as they were, to base their opinion upon what they gathered from an examination, where that was done, of the body and clothing of deceased, or from an inspection of the clothing, without an examination of the remains. We can see no substantial objection to the method pursued, inasmuch as such expert testimony was of necessity based either upon an actual examination of the body of the deceased or of the clothing he wore at the time of the shooting, or both. From some viewpoints, under the circumstances appearing here, the method followed as a means of placing the court and jury in the possession of the facts, which is the object of all trials, was more effectual than the response to a hypothetical question would have been. Defendant correctly affirms that all the expert testimony touching the point at which the ball from defendant's weapon entered the body of deceased, which alone rested upon an examination of his wearing apparel, was based upon an inspection of such apparel, made for the first time at the trial, and that the time which had elapsed between that date and the shooting had wrought a material change in the condition of such clothing, especially the parts pierced by the bullet. This was also a matter involving the weight of the evidence, which was for the jury to consider and decide. In this connection it should be said, the person who removed the clothes from the body of deceased testified that, at the time of the trial, they were in the same general condition, except as to dryness, as they were when he removed them, and there is no testimony to the contrary.

People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 555, 102 Pac. 517, is not in conflict with the preceding views, and is not an authority disapproving the method of presenting the expert testimony, under the circumstances appearing in the instant case. In the Le Doux Case, the prosecution addressed to the physicians, called as expert witnesses, the preliminary question whether they had heard the testimony of certain other witnesses at the trial. Upon giving an affirmative answer, they were then asked the following question:

"Now, doctor, assuming each and all of the facts and circumstances testified to by these gentlemen I have named as true, what in your opinion was the cause of the death of A. N. McVicar, the deceased person mentioned in this case?"

And this court held that the trial court erred in overruling an objection to such question. It is obvious that this method of presenting expert testimony was essentially different from the one adopted here. In the present case, the facts upon which the opinions were based were in some instances testified to by the witness expressing the opinion, and, in any event, were simple and many of them not a matter of memory or description but actually in plain sight of the jury—as open to their inspection as they were to the expert. In the Le Doux Case the court said (155 Cal. 555, 102 Pac. 525):

"In thus pointing out what we conceive to be the best method for obtaining the expert opinion of a witness, we would not be understood as saying that every departure from that method involves error, necessitating the reversal of a case. Cases may arise where the facts upon which the opinion is sought are simple, salient, and few. If it be made to appear that the expert has heard the testimony by which those facts have been presented, it would not necessarily be held ground for reversal that he was asked to express his opinion upon those facts, without a restatement of them."

[8] Defendant presses upon our consideration his claim that the verdict—

"carrying with it, as it did, the death penalty, must have been the result of mental excitement, passion, and prejudice, * * * materially aided by a deep-seated, subconscious prejudice against a negro defendant."

We are unable to find anything in the record supporting such contention; to the contrary, every indication is that the defendant had a fair trial. The mere fact that the defendant is a colored man, charged with having killed a white man, falls far short of establishing prejudice and passion of a character warranting setting aside the verdict upon those grounds. Moreover, the jury was, at defendant's request, instructed "that the law knows no creed or condition, no color, no nationality, every defendant, whatever his race, color, or condition, * * * stands equal before the law and should be tried with perfect impartiality," and there is present here no circumstance indicating that the jury disregarded this admonition of the court.

[9] Defendant earnestly protests that the facts and circumstances of this case, as revealed by the record, disclose and show that the penalty imposed is severe. Every person guilty of murder in the first degree is punishable, either by death, or imprisonment for life, at the discretion of the jury trying the same. Pen. Code, § 190. The question which punishment shall be inflicted, is not to be decided by the jury until after it has become satisfied that the defendant is guilty of murder in the first degree. If the evidence supports that conclusion, it will support either punishment by death or imprisonment for life. The appellate courts cannot review the decision of the jury in the matter, nor consider whether or not the lighter punishment should have been inflicted. If the reviewing court is satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to justify a verdict of murder of the first degree, its inquiry on that point is ended.

The gravity of the case has moved us to give painstaking consideration to the points advanced by the defendant. The instructions of the court to the jury were full and clear and in all respects, so far as we can discover, fair to defendant.

Failing to find any reversible error in the record, and there being sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, must be, and each of them is, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SANCHEZ. (Cr. 597.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 20, 1922.)

Criminal law ⇨ 1182—In absence of brief or oral argument, conviction will be affirmed where no fundamental rights have been violated.

Where appellant filed no brief and made no application for leave to file one, and his attorneys of record made no appearance for hearing and argument, though notified thereof, and none of defendant's fundamental rights appear to have been violated, the conviction will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Ramon L. Sanchez was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Lawlor, of San Francisco, and J. R. Connelly, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The indictment charged the defendant with the crime of "criminal syndicalism" as defined by an act of the Legislature of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 281). The indictment is in the general language of the statute.

The defendant was convicted by a jury, and the case was brought to this court by him on an appeal from the judgment.

[1] No brief was filed by the defendant in support of the appeal. The case was regularly placed upon the calendar of the March, 1922, term of this court for hearing and argument, and the attorneys of record for the defendant duly notified thereof. When the case was in the regular order called for argument, no appearance was made on behalf of the accused. The Attorney General thereupon submitted the case upon the record, and no oral argument was therefore made in his behalf. No brief has since been filed by the defendant, nor has any application been made in his behalf for leave to file one.

[2] No showing having been made in support of the appeal, it is not incumbent upon this court to search the record for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not errors warranting a reversal occurred in the trial of the case. We have, nevertheless, as is our usual custom in such cases, examined the record with some care, and have failed to find any substantial errors or such errors as may justly be held to have operated prejudicially against the rights of the accused. Indeed, the fact of the failure of counsel of record for the defendant to make any attempt to support the appeal involves a tacit concession that any errors upon which in the first instance they might have based any hope for a reversal were without prejudice to the rights of the defendant.

[3] At any rate, under the state of the record as it is submitted, an examination of the record not having disclosed the violation of any of the fundamental rights of the accused, there is no other alternative left to this court but to affirm the judgment; and it is so ordered.

WILKINSON v. FISHERMAN'S & CANNER'S SUPPLY CO. et al. (Civ. 3698.)

1. Sales $\S$ 477(5)—Exact date of tender held immaterial, in view of extension of time for payment.

Under a conditional sale contract, where the time for final payment was extended to either of two successive days, it was immaterial on which of such days tender was made, the provision that time was of the essence of the contract having been waived.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1) — Appellate court will not weigh conflicting evidence.

If there is substantial evidence to support the essential facts contained in a finding, the appellate court will not weigh such evidence against evidence to the contrary.

3. Sales $\S$ 479(7)—Evidence held sufficient to support findings that assignor knew of payment before assigning contract.

In an action in claim and delivery of an auto truck conditionally sold to defendants, evidence held to justify findings that defendants offered to pay the balance when due, and deposited it on the same day to the credit of the seller, who accepted and retained it, and thereafter, with notice of the deposit, assigned the contract to plaintiff's assignor.

4. Tender $\S$ 12(1)—Offer to pay principal and interest held sufficient without tender of attorney's fees.

Under a conditional sale contract, providing for $100 attorney's fees if suit were brought to recover the property or the unpaid balance of the purchase price, where suit had not been begun when demand was made for such fees, the buyer's offer to pay the principal and interest was sufficient.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 173(2)—Illegality of tender not available on appeal, in absence of objection on such ground at time of offer.

Objection to a tender on the ground that gold coin was not offered or exhibited cannot be taken on appeal, where not made at the time of the offer (Civ. Code, § 1500).

6. Sales $\S$ 476—Deposit of sufficient amount with notice to creditor and subsequent assignee held sufficient.

Under a conditional sale contract, where the buyer, with notice from the seller that he still owned the contract, made a sufficient offer of payment, which was refused, his deposit to seller's credit of such amount with enough to pay the seller's legal claims, accompanied by notice thereof to the seller and his subsequent assignee extinguished the obligation (Civ. Code, § 1500), where seller used part of the money.

7. Tender $\S$ 7—Tender to seller's assignee held sufficient whether he acted as attorney for seller or as owner of contract.

Where a legal tender of the balance due under a conditional contract of sale was made to the seller's assignee on the date due, it was immaterial whether the latter acted only as attorney for the seller, or was himself the owner of the contract.

8. Sales $\S$ 475—Assignee acquires rights of assignor only.

An assignee of a conditional sale contract, payment of the balance due under which had been tendered to his assignor, acquired no rights thereunder against the buyer, his rights being such only as his assignor possessed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by R. S. Wilkinson against Fisherman's & Canner's Supply Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. C. Schaefer, of San Pedro, for appellant.

Edward H. Bautzer, of San Pedro, and Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The action is one in claim and delivery of a Buick auto truck. The pleadings joined issue upon ownership and the right of possession. It appears without conflict that one J. A. Phillips, doing business under the name of San Pedro Garage sold the truck to defendants under a conditional contract of sale. This contract provided for the final payment to become due on demand, which was made on the 17th day of April, 1920. The defendants then entered into an agreement with Phillips, whereby they paid him part of this final payment, and the time for payment of the balance was extended to the 17th or 18th of May, 1920. The court found that on the 18th of May defendants were ready, willing, and able to pay, and then offered the amount remaining due to Phillips, and later, on the same day, deposited the said sum to the credit of Phillips in the First National Bank of San Pedro; that Phillips retained this deposit; that subsequent to the deposit having been made and notice thereof to Phillips the contract of sale was assigned by Phillips to Schaefer for collection, and then assigned by Schaefer to Wilkinson. The court further found the value of the use of the truck to be $350 and the value of the truck itself to be $750, and that the defendant was entitled to receive the return of the truck or its value, and rendered judgment accordingly.

[1] Appellant's brief fails to point out except in the most indefinite manner the issues involved or to indicate grounds relied upon for a reversal. It does appear, however, that the claim is made that from the evidence presented the trial court should not have found that the defendant made a legal tender of the balance due under the contract. It is unnecessary to give space to a consideration as to whether or not the tender should have been made on the 17th or the 18th of May.

On April 17th Phillips extended the time for payment of the balance then due and thus waived the provision that time was of the essence of the contract. Muncy v. Brain, 158 Cal. 300, 110 Pac. 945. The single question, therefore, to be decided is: Did the evidence justify the finding of the court that—

"On said 18th day of May, 1920, the said defendant, Fisherman's & Canner's Supply Company, offered to pay to said J. A. Phillips the balance of the purchase price of said automobile, and did on said 18th day of May, 1920, deposit the balance of the purchase price of said automobile as provided for in said contract in the First National Bank of San Pedro to the credit of the said J. A. Phillips doing business under the name of said San Pedro Garage, and that said money so deposited by said defendant was accepted and retained by the said J. A. Phillips doing business under said name, and that after the offer by said defendant to pay the balance of said purchase price and after the deposit of said money in the bank to the credit of the said J. A. Phillips doing business under said name, and after he had received notice of said deposit, the said J. A. Phillips attempted to assign said contract to S. C. Schaefer, who thereafter purported and attempted to assign the same to plaintiff, but that at the time of said attempted assignment by the said Phillips all payments provided for in said contract had been fully paid."

[2-4] If there is substantial evidence to support the essential facts contained in the above finding, we will not concern ourselves with weighing it as against other evidence to the contrary. It was amply established that on May 18, 1920, the defendant offered to both Phillips and Schaefer, who was then acting as Phillips' attorney, a check for the principal and interest and the additional sum of $25. There was testimony that both refused and demanded $100 in addition to principal and interest. No money was exhibited at the time the offers were made, but in refusing the check Schaefer said the truck was his, and defendant would have to buy it. The refusal to take the check as payment was not placed upon the ground that it was not legal tender. Immediately following this conversation, and on the 18th of May, 1920, the defendant deposited $191.28 to the credit of J. A. Phillips in the First National Bank of San Pedro, and informed him that the money had been placed there to his credit. Phillips assigned his interest in the contract to Schaefer. The court's finding that this assignment took place after the deposit of the money in the bank and notice thereof to Phillips is sustained by the testimony of Phillips that the contract was assigned on the same day the deposit in the bank was made of Schaefer's check and the testimony of an official of the bank and its records introduced in evidence which showed that this deposit may have been made as late as the 20th of May, 1920, two days after the offer of payment and the deposit of the check and notice of its deposit to Phillips. At least it cannot be said that the trial court did not have the right to make such an inference from this witness' testimony which established that Schaefer had an account in the First National Bank of San Pedro; that his check was drawn on this bank; that it did not go through the clearing house; that it would be stamped paid on the date that it was deposited; that it was stamped paid on the 20th of May. And Phillips testified that he deposited it on the date which he received it. One provision of the contract of sale was:

"In case suit is brought to recover either the property or any unpaid balance due on this agreement, the second party promises to pay the additional sum of $100.00 as and for attorney's fees."

[5] Suit not having been begun at the time plaintiff's predecessor in interest demanded the $100 attorney's fees thus stipulated to be paid should suit be brought, the offer of defendant to pay principal and interest and $25 was more than sufficient as to the amount. It was made in time. Objection cannot now be taken to it because gold coin was not offered or exhibited, as the failure to object on that ground was waived by the fact that such objection was not made at the time of the offer of payment. Civ. Code, § 1500; In re Estate of Pearson, 102 Cal. 569, 36 Pac. 934; Green v. Barney, 4 Cal. Unrep. 665, 36 Pac. 1026.

[6-8] The testimony was conflicting as to when defendant received notice of the assignment to Schaefer, but, as we have shown, it amply supports the court's finding that it was subsequent to the deposit in the bank to Phillips' credit. Having made a sufficient offer of payment and having affirmative notice from Phillips as late as the evening of the 18th that he still owned the contract, defendant's deposit in the First National Bank of San Pedro of an amount large enough to pay plaintiff's legal claims, accompanied by notice to Phillips and Schaefer of the fact of the deposit, extinguished the obligation. Civ. Code, § 1500. Appellant cites Owen v. Herzihoff, 2 Cal. App. 622, 84 Pac. 274, as holding to the contrary of this last proposition. But in that case there was no evidence that the payee was given notice that the deposit had been made, or that he availed himself thereof. In the instant case the testimony is undisputed that notice of the deposit was immediately given to Phillips and Schaefer, and the witness Anderson, testifying from the records of the bank, showed that the deposit was made by defendant to the credit of Phillips, and that his balance had subsequently twice been less than $191.28; hence he had used some of this money and accepted the deposit. A legal tender was made to Schaefer on the 18th, and it is of no moment whether he then acted only as attorney for Phillips, or was himself the owner of the contract by assignment. Schaefer admittedly did not assign to plaintiff, Wilkinson, until the 19th so that his rights are only such as Schaefer possessed.

Judgment affirmed.

GINOCHIO et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 4123.)

1. Carriers $\Rightarrow$ 321(23)—Evidence held not to warrant instruction injury to passenger raised presumption of negligence.

In an action for the death of a man while trying to board a street car, where the allegation he was a passenger was not denied, uncontradicted evidence of all the eyewitnesses that the car did not stop before he attempted to board it, not having yet reached its regular stopping place, though some witnesses testified it slowed up for an intersecting track, does not justify the giving of an instruction that, when a passenger is injured by an instrumentality under the control of the carriers, it is presumed he was injured by the carrier's negligence.

2. Carriers $\Rightarrow$ 316(1)—No inference or presumption of negligence obtains against testimony of all eyewitnesses.

No inference or presumption as to the negligence of a carrier obtains against the uncontradicted sworn testimony of all the eyewitnesses to the accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Ida M. Ginochio and others against the City and County of San Francisco, to recover damages for death. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied; Lawlor, J., dissenting.

George Lull, City Atty., and R. T. Ainsworth and Charles S. Peery, Asst. City Attys., all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan and Vincent W. Hallinan, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. Angelo Ginochio was injured while attempting to board one of the street cars operated by the defendant. Later he died of the injury so sustained. The plaintiffs sued the defendant for damages, judgment went for the plaintiffs, and the defendant has appealed.

For some time prior to his death the decedent had been residing near the corner of Jones and Vallejo streets, in San Francisco. Early in the afternoon on Sunday, the 18th day of April, 1920, he was seen on, and was seen to get off from, a south-bound Van Ness avenue car, operated by the defendant, and to take a position at a stopping place on the easterly side of the track known as the Van Ness-Eleventh street line. Whether the decedent was on the sidewalk, or was out in the street nearer the car track, is not certain. Some of the witnesses placed him in one of those spots, and other witnesses placed him in the other. The decedent and other persons, five or six in number, waited in that locality for several minutes, some of the witnesses stating that they had waited as long as ten minutes. The decedent stood at the extreme eastern side of the group, some of the others standing further to the west, and in the immediate vicinity of the monument which stands at the intersection of Van Ness and Market. Between the stopping place first mentioned and the monument the tracks of the Van Ness line cross over Market street in a southeasterly direction, making an acute angle with the north line of Market street. When the persons above mentioned were in the positions we have described, a west-bound car came up Market street. As the car approached the intersecting tracks it slowed down, but did not stop. The witness Kelly testified that the car slowed down to two miles an hour, and after it had nearly crossed the intersecting tracks that it started up suddenly. He stated that the decedent approached the car, put one foot on the car, took a hold of it, and immediately fell. He says that the car slowed down at the first stopping place, but that it did not stop at all. Mr. King, the only other eyewitness called by the plaintiff, testified that the decedent attempted to get on the car when it was slowing down; at the same time the car fed up, and the decedent was thrown to the pavement.

The defendant called five witnesses, including the conductor and the motorman. All five of those witnesses stated that the car did not stop until it reached a place in front of the monument. All five were of the opinion that the car approached the intersecting street car tracks at a speed, variously estimated, at from four to ten miles an hour, and crossed over those tracks at a greater speed than testified to by the plaintiff's witnesses. The motorman testified that he did not see the decedent, and did not know of the accident until his car came to a stop. The other witnesses testified that they saw the decedent, and that he either jumped for, ran for, or ran after the moving car. The conductor testified that as the car approached the intersecting tracks he saw the group apparently waiting to board the car; that, as his platform was opposite the group, he motioned to the people to go to the stopping place at the monument; that a little later he saw the decedent run up from the rear, attempt to board the car, fail in the attempt, and fall to the ground. He says he gave a signal of three bells to stop, but the car did not stop until it reached the monument. It was the theory of the plaintiffs that the decedent was a passenger by reason of (1) having become such on the Van Ness avenue car, and being transferred to a west-bound car; and (2), although the decedent had not entered the west-bound car, that the surrounding circumstances were such as to show an intent on his part to become a passenger, and an acceptance of him by the carrier as a passenger. Nilson v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 103, 101 Pac. 413. By its failure to deny the amended complaint, the defendant admitted both of these theories. But it was also the theory of the plaintiffs that the accident was caused by the negligence of the defendant. This theory was traversed by the defendant, and it was the sole issue in the case.

In instructing the jury, acting upon the request of the plaintiff, the trial court gave, and the defendant now objects to, three several instructions worded as follows:

"It is the law that a person riding upon the defendant's car, who is entitled to transfer to a connecting line of the defendant's railway, and who leaves said car for the purpose of transferring to said connecting line, is, while taking the direct and usual route from one line of cars to the other, and while waiting to board the second car for the purpose of continuing his journey, a passenger of the defendant's railway, and that the defendant owes to him the obligation due from a carrier of persons to its passengers; that is, the highest degree of care.

"A passenger so transferring from one line of defendant's cars to another is entitled to assume that defendant will exercise toward him the duty that it owes him, namely, to provide him with the highest degree of care.

"When a passenger is injured and such injury is shown to have been occasioned by some instrumentality which the carrier had under his control or by the manner in which the carrier uses said instrumentality, then it is presumed that he was injured through the negligence of the carrier, and the burden is cast upon the carrier to show that such is not the case."

[1] The respondents rely upon the rule stated in Hart v. Fresno Traction Co., 175 Cal. 489, 167 Pac. 885, as showing that the defendant was negligent, but the agents of the defendant in that case were guilty of active negligence; they held out an invitation to the plaintiff, Hart, to board the car, and as he did so, they so manipulated the car as to throw him off of it. Assuming that the decedent held a transfer, and that he was in the act of transferring, or that he was an intending passenger, the evidence does not show that the defendant violated any duty which it owed to the decedent. It did not appear from the evidence that the ground work of the defendant's right of way was defective, nor that the ground work immediately adjacent was defective, nor that there was any kind of a trap created by the defendant. It did not appear that the instrumentality being operated by the defendant was in any respect defective, or that in any respect it was operated in a negligent manner.

[2] No inference or presumption obtained as against the uncontradicted sworn testimony of all the eyewitnesses. As addressed to a case involving such an issue as was here involved, we think that the foregoing instructions were not at all pertinent. In Steele v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 168 Cal. 375, 381, 143 Pac. 718, 720, the court said:

"Here the essential fact in issue was, How did the accident occur; was it through the act of defendant in starting up the car while plaintiff was attempting to alight, or did it result from an attempt on her part to get off while it was still in motion? and the vice of the instruction was in ignoring any necessity on the part of the jury of finding adversely to the defendant on this issue as a prerequisite to applying the presumption against it, but on the contrary instructing them that such presumption arose and could be applied simply from proof of injury sustained by the plaintiff."

True it is that Mrs. Steele was in the act of leaving the car, whereas the decedent in this case was engaged in boarding a car, but certainly the facts were stronger in the Steele Case, where it was never disputed that Mrs. Steele was a passenger. In a case in which the facts were far more favorable to the plaintiff, Graff v. United Railroads, 178 Cal. 171, at page 173, 172 Pac. 603, at page 604, the court said:

"In the present case there was a dispute over the question whether the injury arose from the manner of operating the car, or from the plaintiff's carelessness in standing too near the side thereof, and the question as to which was the cause of the injury should have been left to the jury instead of being taken from them by the absolute character of the instruction given."

The judgment is reversed.

DIGGS et al. v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. et al. (Civ. 2423.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 13, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 11, 1922.)

1. Pleading ⚡214(5)—Conclusions of law not admitted on demurrer.

In an action by a mortgagee of crop against an irrigation company for failure to deliver water to the mortgagor's lands, allegation that defendant "willfully and wrongfully, and in violation of the contract" between the mortgagor and company, shut off water, "willfully and wrongfully" involved a conclusion of law not admitted on demurrer.

2. Waters and water courses ⚡263—In action on conditional contract for water, plaintiff must allege obligation absolute.

In an action by a mortgagee against an irrigation company for failure to deliver water to the mortgagor's lands, where the company's obligation to furnish water was measured by a conditional contract, it was not sufficient to allege that the company failed to deliver water, but it must appear that the company's obligation became absolute, by reason of the non-existence of the condition.

3. Waters and water courses ⚡263—No privity between mortgagee of crop and water company in irrigation contract of mortgagor.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 2888, 2927, in an action by a mortgagee against an irrigation company for failure to deliver water to the lands of the mortgagor, in accordance with a contract between the mortgagor and the company, where the complaint did not show privity of contract between the mortgagee and the company, nor estoppel within Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, it was not good as against demurrer.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡263—Complaint failing to allege insolvency of cropper, in action by mortgagee of crop against water company, defective.

In an action by mortgagee of crop against a water company for failure to deliver water, in accordance with a contract between the mortgagor and the company, where the only interest of the mortgagee was the right to subject the crop to payment of his obligation against the mortgagor, the failure to allege insolvency of the mortgagor rendered the complaint fatally defective.

BURNETT, J. The trial court sustained a demurrer to an amended complaint without leave to amend, the demurrer being both general and special, and from the judgment entered thereon, the appeal has been taken. It is not disputed that the basis of the action is found in a certain written contract of January 20, 1919, between respondent and one C. W. Levissee. The complaint is too voluminous to set out in full, but respondent has furnished a fair synopsis of it, which we may adopt substantially. It alleges the execution of said contract, which is set out in hæc verba, wherein respondent agreed to sell and deliver not to exceed 600 miner's inches of water to Levissee, for irrigating land owned by or leased to him in the county of Sutter, and to deliver such water at a fixed point designated in said contract, it being expressly provided that said water was to—"be used only by the consumer upon his said lands for the purpose of raising rice and beans thereon."

No lands were described in the contract further than to be designated as "750 acres of land owned by or leased to the consumer in said county of Sutter." No source of supply of the water was mentioned in the contract, but it provided that Levissee was to pay for it in accordance with respondent's regularly established rates for the sale and delivery for development purposes only, of water in Auburn ravine. The contract provided that—

"the water to be furnished hereunder will first be utilized by the company for the generation of electric energy, which is the primary use to which the same will be put. Therefore anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding, it is agreed by and between the parties hereto that the company shall have the right, without incurring any liability to the consumer by reason thereof, to discontinue delivering water hereunder whenever, in the opinion of its engineer in charge, such discontinuance is necessary, in order to conserve the company's stored waters required for the generation of electric energy."

It is also provided that—

"the consumer shall not assign this agreement or any of the rights hereunder without having first obtained the written consent of the company thereto."

It is further alleged that, at the time of the execution of said contract, respondent knew that Levissee had leased the lands described in said complaint and that they were the lands contemplated by the contract; that respondent and Levissee expressly understood and agreed that Levissee was acting as a promoter to enable respondent to sell its water for irrigation of said lands; that, after acquiring said lands, Levissee would assign said contract "to such person or persons as might be available and thereafter, and in accordance with said agreement and understanding had by and between said Levissee and said defendant company, and prior to the commencement of the irrigating season of 1919, said C. W. Levissee did sublet said lands and premises aforesaid and therein and thereby, and at the same time he did assign said contract * * * to defendant W. S. Gause and one A. L. Chambers"; that thereafter Chambers transferred his interest to Gause; that respondent, well knowing of said subletting and said assignment, did furnish and deliver the water in and upon the lands described in the complaint. The said sublease is set out in the complaint, wherein it appears that the lessor was to furnish water for irrigating the rice on said premises, the lease providing:

"Such water to be arranged for, however, by the lessor" and, "the lessor will not be responsible for any failure to supply water at any time for any cause or for any damage, whether on account of failure of supply, defective ditches, floods or wastage."

It is alleged that said sublease of March 20, 1919, was made with full knowledge by all the parties of the terms and conditions of the said two agreements between Levissee and respondent and in full faith that respondent would furnish the water for irrigation as therein provided; that, relying upon said promise, said Gause "did cause to be prepared, cultivated, and cropped to rice" said lands; that defendant corporation at the proper time began the delivery of water, and, as a result thereof and "of careful cultivation and nurture," the rice crop upon said lands was in a flourishing condition, "gave promise of a bountiful crop; whereupon without notice to said W. S. Gause, defendant corporation on or about the 9th day of July, 1919, willfully and wrongfully and in violation of the terms and provisions of its said contract aforesaid shut off all water from said lands, turned and diverted its water supply in other directions and completely deprived said W. S. Gause and all of said lands from any further water for irrigation thereof"; that in consequence thereof, said rice crop shriveled up and became worthless, and it was impossible to raise any crop on said land for the year 1919; that it was upon the direct assurance of respondent that said water would be furnished in full compliance with the term of said contract and in sufficient amount that said sublease was entered into and that the irrigation mentioned therein was to be done with water to be supplied under the contract between Levissee and respondent, and that Levissee and Gause, in entering into said sublease, treated and regarded the water to be supplied by respondent as a part of or appurtenant to said lands during the term of said sublease; that said Gause had no other means or source of irrigating said lands, which was well known to respondent; that—

"said C. W. Levissee duly performed and caused to be performed all covenants and conditions on his part to be performed, as in said contract and agreement with said defendant corporation is set forth, including the payment of all moneys by him required to be paid hereunder."

It is further alleged that, on or about the 3d day of July, 1919, Gause executed a certain indenture, therein set out in hæc verba, to plaintiffs, wherein said Gause, in consideration of the advancement by plaintiff of certain sums of money to him, undertook to pay to them 50 cents for each sack of rice that he should realize from his crop, and also one-half of all sums realized for all rice sold above 4 cents per pound—

"and by said agreement said W. S. Gause did assign and transfer to plaintiff the specific portions and interest in and to the crop to be grown upon said lands during the year 1919 in said agreement mentioned and referred to."

It is further alleged that, "on the said 3d day of July, 1919, and at the same time as a part of the transaction concerning the execution of said agreement last aforesaid, said W. S. Gause" executed to plaintiff a crop mortgage on said rice crop, which mortgage is therein set out in full, and it is on that relation that appellants base their alleged cause of action for damages for failure to deliver the water.

[1, 2] Respondents claim that the order of the trial court is justified on several grounds. One of these is that there is no sufficient allegation showing a breach of the water contract. It is true that the complaint alleges that respondent "willfully and wrongfully and in violation of the terms and provisions of its said contract as aforesaid" shut off all water from said lands, but the quoted portion of the foregoing involves a mere conclusion of law and is not deemed admitted by the demurrer. Fisher v. Fisher, 23 Cal. App. 310, 137 Pac. 1094; 31 Cyc. 54; 21 R. C. L. 440, § 5. The extent of respondent's obligation to furnish water is measured, of course, by the terms of the contract itself and therein it was expressly provided, as we have seen, that the water "will first be utilized by the company for the generation of electric energy" and that the respondent could, without liability to Levissee, discontinue delivering water to him under the contract, whenever respondent's engineer deemed it necessary to do so in order to conserve such water for electric generation. Thereby it appears that respondent's promise was not absolute, but was conditional. It amounted to an engagement to furnish water, provided that, in the opinion of its engineer, it was not needed for the other purpose. It was not therefore sufficient to allege, so it is claimed, that respondent failed to deliver the water, but it must appear that respondent's obligation became absolute, by reason of the nonexistence of the condition therein specified. Respondent construes the contract as though it had been agreed to deliver so much water, if the supply was sufficient, or if it was not needed for electric generation, and therefore concludes that it was incumbent upon the pleader, in order to state a cause of action, to allege that the supply was sufficient, or that it was not needed for electric generation and that the case falls within the principle of such decisions as Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 164 Cal. 472, 129 Pac. 587, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 710, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 932, wherein the defendant had agreed to pay, "when able" and plaintiff did not allege ability to pay and wherein the Supreme Court said:

"If the promise is conditional upon such ability, it is, as is said in Rodgers v. Byers, 127 Cal. 528, 60 Pac. 42, incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege and prove that the condition has been complied with. This is not, like the plea of the statute of limitations, matter of defense. It is a substantial part of the cause of action, and the burden of proof with respect to it, is upon the plaintiff." Citing cases.

[3] The theory of appellants is that such consideration involves a matter of defense and that it was unnecessary to anticipate it in the complaint. There would seem to be much force in the claim of respondent in this respect, but, whatever may be the correct view, it is unnecessary to decide, as it seems plain that the action must fail because appellants have not shown any privity with respondent under the water contract.

The principle is admitted by appellants in the following language: "We admit, of course, that there must be a privity shown, otherwise an action could not be maintained. The plaintiff must legally connect himself up with the defendant in the action and plaintiff must allege some right on his part which has been violated and some legal duty which defendant owed him and which was not performed."

There is no pretense that respondent made any contract with appellants or that any contract, made by the former, was for the benefit of the latter or that any such contract was ever assigned to appellants. If it be admitted that the original contract created a water right, which became appurtenant to the land, this interest was not mortgaged or affected in any way by the instrument executed by appellants and Gause. Their engagement amounted to an hypothecation, only, of the growing crop, and did not convey or incur the leasehold interest or any appurtenance to the land. Neither is there any estoppel in favor of appellants. As to that, the authorities justify the statement of defendant company:

"To constitute an estoppel against respondent in this case, in favor of appellants, it must appear that respondent made certain material false representations, either by statement or conduct implying a statement to appellants, with the intention on respondent's part that appellants should act thereon and that appellants, relying upon such representation, did act thereon to their injury."

The principle is indeed embodied in subdivision 3 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

There is no allegation in the complaint that respondent, by any statement or conduct, intended appellant to believe, or to act upon the belief, that respondent was undertaking to supply water directly to Gause, nor is there any allegation that, when the loan was made, appellants relied upon any representation, either of word or conduct, by respondent, or that they even knew that Gause was using water supplied by respondent. There is likewise no allegation that, in executing the contract with Levisse, respondent contemplated or had any reason to contemplate that persons, not connected with the contract, such as materialmen or money lenders, would act thereon.

In fact, no element of estoppel in favor of appellants is set forth in the complaint, and the only possible ground, as we view it, upon which plaintiffs might recover arises from the relation that, as mortgagees, they sustain to Gause. In reference to this consideration, appellants quote 5 R. C. L. § 109, as follows:

"Besides the right to foreclose on default of the mortgagor, * * * and the right to bring actions of replevin or trover where necessary, generally speaking, the mortgagee has a right of action against any one who interferes with his rights or who damages or destroys the mortgaged property or conceals it with knowledge of the existence of the mortgage or removes it into another state."

It is manifest, however, that the foregoing must be considered in the light of the law as to chattel mortgages, in the states where in the decisions supporting the text are found. In some jurisdictions, as is well known, the mortgagee is vested with the legal title to and right of possession of the crop, but, according to the rule in this state, appellants had no title to any part of the crop (section 2888, Civ. Code), but had merely an unmatrued lien on said crop, for securing the payment to them by Gause of a promissory note that was payable on or before January 1, 1920. Shoobert v. De Motta, 112 Cal. 215, 44 Pac. 487, 53 Am. St. Rep. 207; Alferitz v. Borgwardt, 126 Cal. 201, 58 Pac. 460.

And, unless the mortgage especially conferred the right therefor, appellants were not entitled to the possession of the growing crops. Section 2927, Civ. Code. There is no allegation that appellants were in possession or were entitled to be in possession under the mortgage at the time of the alleged destruction of the growing crop. Under such circumstances, it may be doubted whether appellants could have maintained against respondent an action at law had the latter, by direct trespass, entered on the premises at the time mentioned and destroyed the crop (5 R. C. L. § 108; Bank of Ukiah v. Moore, 106 Cal. 673, 39 Pac. 1071) although, as shown in the latter citation—

"the power of a court of equity to preserve the mortgaged property from destruction, so that it may answer the purpose of the mortgage, is undoubted."

But the foregoing consideration is really not involved herein. We are dealing with the question whether a person not a party to a contract may maintain an action for its violation, because he may have indirectly suffered detriment thereby or would have been benefited if the contract had been observed by the parties thereto. How can the case be any different in principle, as suggested by respondent, from an action under similar circumstances—

"against a third person who had undertaken to furnish Gause a harvester, a tractor, a threshing outfit, or sacks or other necessary implements for caring for his rice crop, or fertilizer for its proper development or even labor for its proper cultivation"?

In such instances, it could not be successfully contended that the mortgagee of the growing crop could maintain an action against the third party for damages, because he had violated his contract with the mortgagor. We may carry the theory of appellants a step further and suppose that they had borrowed from a bank the money which they advanced to Gause, and, by reason of the inability of appellants to realize upon the crop, they could not repay the bank. Under such circumstances, it would hardly be claimed that their creditor could maintain an action for damages against respondent, for its failure to deliver the water under its contract with Levisse or with Gause.

The rule is that there must be privity and that remote damages to third parties cannot be recovered. The reasons for thus limiting the rule are variously stated in the decisions. For instance:

"To hold that such actions could be maintained would not only lead to endless complications, in following out cause and effect, but would restrict and embarrass the right to make contracts by burdening them with obligations, * * * which parties would not voluntarily assume." Roddy v. Missouri Pac. Ry., 104 Mo. 234, 15 S. W. 1112, 12 L. R. A. 746, 24 Am. St. Rep. 333. "If we were to hold that plaintiff could sue in such a case, there is no point at which such actions would stop. The only safe rule is to confine the right to recover to those who enter into the contract; if we go one step beyond that there is no reason why we should not go 50." Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 109. "The object of parties in inserting in their contracts specific undertakings with respect to the work to be done is to create an obligation inter sese. These engagements and undertakings must necessarily be subject to modifications and waiver by the contracting parties. If third persons can acquire a right in a contract in the nature of a duty to have it performed as contracted for, the parties will be deprived of control over their own contract." Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, 46 N. J. Law, 19.

Among other instructive cases upon the same subject, cited by respondent, are the following: Standard Oil Co. v. Murray, 119 Fed. 572, 57 C. C. A. 1; Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. Ed. 621; Henzis v. Kingsland, 110 Mo. 605, 19 S. W. 630, 15 L. R. A. 821, 33 Am. St. Rep. 482; Stockton v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 106 S. W. 423, Knuckles v. Leggett, 7 Colo. App. 265, 43 Pac. 154; Barstow Irrigation Co. v. Cleghorn (Tex. Civ.

App.) 93 S. W. 1023; Clancy v. Byrne, 56 N. Y. 129, 15 Am. Rep. 391; Thompson v. Sea Board, etc., Co., 165 N. C. 377, 81 S. E. 315, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 97; Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100; Buckley v. Gray, 110 Cal. 339, 42 Pac. 900, 31 L. R. A. 862, 52 Am. St. Rep. 88; Kruse v. Wilson, 3 Cal. App. 91, 84 Pac. 442; Wilson v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 788, 157 Pac. 543; Marin Rock Co. v. Stone Co. (Cal. App.) 194 Pac. 732, 734.

[4] Moreover, since the only interest of appellants in said crop was the right to subject it to the payment of their note against Gause, if the latter is solvent they were not damaged by the failure of respondent to deliver the water. In the absence of any averment to the contrary, we must assume that they can enforce the obligation, notwithstanding the loss of their security. In that respect, we think the complaint is fatally defective.

The judgment, in our opinion, should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

NEWHALL LAND & FARMING CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 4172.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 18, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 13, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 15, 1922.)

1. Master and servant — 385(16)—Compensation insurer held liable for cost of medical treatment obtained by employé.

Where an injured employé's letter to the insurance carrier explained the necessity of an immediate operation, which its own physician had also reported as necessary, it was its duty under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 9(a), to provide surgical treatment with all possible diligence, and on its failure to do so within a reasonable time it was liable for the reasonable cost of treatment obtained by the employé.

2. Master and servant — 398—Letter to commission from employé held an "application" within Compensation Act.

An injured employé's letter to the Industrial Accident Commission stating that a case of aggravated hernia, developing from injury, required an operation, and asking the Commission to inquire into the matter of his injury, held an "application" within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 17(a), sufficient to avoid the limitation of six months prescribed by section 11, though not served on the insurance carrier, which was fully informed about the case and the application.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Application.]

3. Master and servant — 417(8)—Compensation insurer not prejudiced by informalities.

The Industrial Accident Commission's neglect to hear the matter within 30 days after the filing of the application as required by Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 17, held a mere informality within section 60, not prejudicial to the insurance carrier.

Application of the Newhall Land & Farming Company and another against the Industrial Accident Commission and another, for certiorari to review an order awarding compensation for injuries. Award affirmed.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a petition for a writ of review.

Ysmael Olivera was employed in December, 1919, by Newhall Land & Farming Company at a ranch in San Luis Obispo county. The Continental Casualty Company was the insurance carrier. The parties are subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 910). Olivera was injured in the course of his employment by being thrown from his horse while trying to overtake a runaway team on the ranch. This accident resulted in an injury designated by the physicians as a right inguinal hernia.

The Industrial Accident Commission found that medical treatment by Dr. Brown was furnished to Olivera by the insurance carrier, which treatment extended from the time of the injury until some time in January, 1920. Olivera testified, as also did Dr. Brown, that a truss was fitted, and it was hoped that the injury might be repaired in time without the necessity of an operation. Dr. Brown testified that at first the truss seemed to give good results, but later, during his treatment of Olivera, it became apparent that an operation was necessary for a permanent cure, and he so informed Olivera. He testified, however, that he had no authority from the insurance carrier to perform the operation, and would not have done it himself, and that he did not tell Olivera who would be engaged to perform this service. From his testimony it is clear that he had no reason to believe that the insurance company would authorize or pay for any operation. He also testified that up until the end of January he considered the truss satisfactory and effective in curing the injury; that he never informed the insurance carrier that a surgical operation was necessary, and was never instructed by them to perform such an operation or to make arrangements to have such an operation performed. Olivera went to his home in Santa Maria after Dr. Brown had done what he could for him without an operation. About May, 1920, he consulted a physician of his own choosing, and was advised by him that an operation was necessary, and that strangulation was likely to result from the injury unless the operation was performed at once.

On May 28, 1920, as found by the Industrial Accident Commission, Olivera wrote to the Continental Casualty Company, demanding further treatment, and stating that it must be had without further delay. The insurance company corresponded with Dr. Brown about the matter, and sent Olivera a check for $38.38 as payment in full of all claims growing out of his injury and disability. On June 8, 1920, Olivera returned this check, stating that it could not be accepted in full payment because the injury was causing much pain and trouble; that an immediate operation was necessary; and stated that he was inclosing a copy of a letter which he was that day sending to the Industrial Accident Commission. In this letter to the insurance company he demanded payments due him under the provisions of the compensation act.

On the same date he addressed a letter to the Industrial Accident Commission, which has been found by it to be an application within the requirements of section 17(a), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917. As this matter is the chief point of attack by petitioners herein, and must be disposed of in this proceeding, it is necessary to set out such application in full. It reads as follows:

"San Luis Obispo, Cal., June 8, 1920.

"Industrial Accident Commission, 525 Market Street, San Francisco, California—Gentlemen: On December 18, 1919, I was injured while in the employ of Newhall Land & Farming Company at their Suey Ranch near Santa Maria. I was given medical treatment by Dr. Brown of Santa Maria but without being permanently cured. A bad case of hernia has developed as a result of the injury and it is in such an aggravated state that the doctor who examined me recently (Dr. P. K. Jackson of San Luis Obispo) advises that an operation is necessary and that a cure or relief cannot be expected otherwise.

"The Newhall Land & Farming Company were covered under their policy No. 48564 issued by Continental Casualty Company through their San Francisco office. The matter has been reported to the aforesaid casualty company. Under date of May 5, 1920, their check was transmitted to me for $38.38 and at the same time they requested my receipt and final receipt. I wrote to them that I could not accept their money under those conditions as my case requires medical treatment but to this letter I have received no reply.

"The doctors advise that an operation be performed without further delay and have arranged to do so on Thursday of this week, June 10th.

I am under the care of Dr. P. K. Jackson and Dr. N. J. Shields of this city.

"I would ask that the matter of my injury be looked into by you and that the aforesaid company be directed to carry out the intent of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

"I forward a certificate signed by Dr. Jackson to the office of the Casualty Company with my recent letter to them.

"Thanking you for prompt attention, I am,
"Very truly yours, Y. Olivera, A."

The Industrial Accident Commission acknowledged receipt of this letter, and stated that the insurance company desired time within which to get a report from Dr. Brown and would communicate with Olivera further after receiving such a report.

After the original award of the Industrial Accident Commission was made, a rehearing was granted at the request of the petitioners here, and additional evidence was submitted and amended findings and award made. It was found that no treatment was tendered to Olivera in response to his demand of May 28, 1920, on the insurance company, and no intimation was made to him that such treatment would be furnished or forthcoming, and applicant, therefore, on the 14th day of June, 1920, obtained such treatment from physicians of his own selection; that the time intervening between said demand and the procuring of such treatment was adequate to give said defendant an opportunity to tender such treatment had it been so disposed. The Industrial Accident Commission, therefore, awarded to Olivera the reasonable cost of such treatment.

It is contended by petitioners that Dr. Brown, the physician for the insurance company, offered to procure for Olivera an operation several months before it was actually performed, and therefore the insurance company is not liable for the cost of medical attention which he procured for himself. It is also contended that the failure of Olivera to accept this offer at the time it was made increased his period of disability before the operation, and also increased the period of disability after the operation, because the injury had increased and required more repair, and the operation was, in consequence, a greater drain on the vital forces. As to this last matter, the commission found that the disability following the operation was not prolonged by the failure to have the operation performed earlier. Section 67, subd. "c," of the Compensation Act provides that the findings and conclusions of the commission on questions of fact shall be conclusive and final, and shall not be subject to review. The objection that Olivera's hesitancy about an operation had increased the period of disability prior to the operation was recognized by the commission, and met by its award and by its findings, which recite that—

"By reason of the injury the applicant was totally disabled from the date thereof until April 25, 1920, a period of $18\frac{3}{7}$ weeks and is entitled by reason thereof to a weekly payment of \$12.83 for $17\frac{3}{7}$ weeks, amounting to the total sum of \$223.43, said weekly payments being based upon monthly earnings of \$90. Said disability also continued after April 25, 1920, but at said time the defendant's physician had tendered to the applicant a surgical operation for the cure of said hernia, and the applicant neglected and refused to submit thereto, or to accept such operation, and the same was not performed until June 14, 1920. Such refusal was unreasonable, and proximately caused disability from said 25th day of April to said 14th day of June, 1920, and applicant is not entitled to compensation for said period."

Allowance of $93.50 was made to the surgeon performing the operation, which was a substantial reduction of his bill appearing in the record for the sum of $261. An allowance of $158.85 was made for hospital bill and $24 for a nurse. All of these sums seem exceedingly reasonable upon the record before us; indeed, petitioners do not contend that they are unreasonable.

As to the contention that Olivera is not entitled to the reasonable cost of medical attention because Dr. Brown suggested and offered him an operation, which he refused, we think this objection is satisfactorily met by the findings of the Commission regarding the failure of the carrier to furnish Olivera surgical treatment at the time he became convinced of its necessity and demanded such treatment of said insurance company. The record discloses that at first Dr. Brown did hold out hope to Olivera of a recovery without an operation. Olivera is a working man, uneducated, and who speaks little English. He had the usual and natural aversion of such a person to an operation. In addition to this he was a man of the age of about 60 years. He endeavored to effect a cure without surgical treatment. Dr. Brown encouraged him in this at first, according to Dr. Brown's own testimony. When it seemed that an operation was imperative, and Dr. Brown so told Olivera, Dr. Brown was not authorized by the insurance company to perform it, nor to secure any one to perform it. He was not himself practicing major surgery, and he stated that he would not have taken the responsibility of the operation. He did not tell Olivera who would be secured to perform the operation. Olivera was not required to accept the services of the first surgeon offered under the provisions of section 9 of the act. The insurance company was not notified at that time of the necessity of an operation, and never tendered such treatment to Olivera, nor authorized any one to do so on its behalf. Olivera returned to his home at Santa Maria, still hoping to effect a cure, and desirous of avoiding a surgical operation, if possible. He was not awarded compensation for this period when he cherished the forlorn hope of a cure without an operation, so the insurance company was not injured in any way by his indecision and natural reticence about this matter. When the absolute necessity of an operation became apparent to him, he called upon the insurance carrier for further treatment, explaining the necessity for an operation. Had the insurance company responded at this time with a reasonable offer of proper treatment, its argument on this question would be more convincing; but it did not do so, nor give any intimation that it would allow Olivera more than the $38 tendered to him at that time. He was in imminent danger, and he had no choice but to select a surgeon and submit to the operation.

[1] Section 9(a) of the Compensation Act provides that, in the event of the neglect or refusal of the employer seasonably to provide medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, he shall be liable for the reasonable expenses incurred by the employee in procuring the same. Olivera's letter to the insurance carrier explained the immediate necessity of an operation. Also the company was in possession of the reports of Dr. Brown, its own physician, sent to it at its request, and showing that such an operation was necessary. We think that under such circumstances it was its duty to provide the surgical treatment with all possible diligence, and it is found by the Commission, and the evidence supports the finding, that it did not do so within a reasonable time.

[2, 3] The only other objection of petitioners is to the "application" hereinbefore set out. It is contended that this is not an application in proper form; that service of same and a hearing thereon were not had as provided in section 17 of the act. It is further contended that the Commission did not regard this letter as an application, and that the hearing was not proceeded with until after a more formal application had been filed by an attorney for Olivera. This formal application was not filed until December 19, 1920, which was too late under the provisions of section 11 of said Compensation Act. Unless, therefore, the letter of June 8, 1920, hereinbefore set forth, can be regarded as an "application," the employee is barred from all relief. Let us examine the facts with reference to the filing of the two applications: On June 8, 1920, Olivera, realizing that he could not recover from his injury without further treatment, went to a friend and had him write a letter to the Industrial Accident Commission, setting forth the facts and Olivera's need for further medical and surgical treatment. This is the letter which has been construed by said Commission, in making its award, as an application. No results having been accomplished by this letter, Olivera, being uninformed as to the nature of proceedings before the Commission, went to an attorney who had had nothing to do with the earlier letter, and was probably uninformed thereof, and uninformed of the status of the entire matter, and this attorney filed a formal application in December, 1920. Later, when the full facts were disclosed to another attorney, who represented Olivera at the hearing, said attorney insisted, on behalf of his client, that the letter of June 8, 1920, was an application within the meaning of the Compensation Act, and that it should be so regarded, and the Commission agreed with this position. If this letter is sufficient as an application, the objection of petitioners that the claim is barred is without merit.

Section 17 of the Compensation Act, as amended in 1919, provides that:

"Upon the filing with the Commission by any party in interest, his attorney, or other representative authorized in writing, of an application in writing stating the general nature of any dispute or controversy concerning compensation, or concerning any right or liability arising out of, or incidental thereto, jurisdiction over which is vested by this act in the Commission, a time and place shall be fixed for the hearing thereof, which hearing, unless otherwise agreed to by all the parties thereto, must be held not less than ten days nor more than thirty days after the filing of such application."

Section 11 provides that the period within which proceedings for the collection of compensation may be commenced in a case like the present one is six months.

It would seem that the filing of the application in writing stating "the general nature of the dispute or controversy concerning compensation, or concerning any right or liability arising out of, or incidental thereto," would "commence proceedings" within the meaning of section 11, in so far as the applicant is concerned; any action which the Commission might take or not take after that assuredly cannot be chargeable to him, and should not destroy his rights. Most particularly is this true in view of the expressed purposes of the Compensation Act and the spirit in which it has always been construed and applied by our courts. The letter of June 8, 1920, assuredly stated fully the matters required to be stated in an application; the Commission has accepted it as an application within the meaning of the Compensation Act, and we agree with the contention of said Commission that any clerical inadvertence in overlooking this application, as such, for a time, should not be visited upon the injured employee who has no control over the administration of the offices of the Commission, and who has done all that is required of him by an act essentially and primarily enacted for his benefit and protection.

The insurance company argues that it was not officially served with a copy of this "application" if this letter is to be regarded as such. But it was informed of the application, whether formally or informally, and so it was not prejudiced in any way. Olivera's letter to the Commission, written on June 8, 1920, recites that there is inclosed a copy of the letter sent to the Industrial Accident Commission (the application). On June 18, 1920, the insurance company wrote to Dr. Brown in connection with the case, and stated in that letter:

"We understand this matter is being referred to the Industrial Accident Commission."

There were communications between the Industrial Accident Commission and the insurance carrier regarding this application, and there is not the slightest doubt that the insurance carrier was fully informed about the fact of the application having been sent to the Commission, and the contents thereof. While it is true that the matter was not brought to a hearing within 30 days after the filing of this application, the section of the Compensation Act governing this matter provides that it must be brought to a hearing within 30 days after the filing of the application "unless otherwise agreed to by all the parties thereto." As this matter is one in which the Commission, and not the employee, is to act, any neglect or oversight of the Commission should not prejudice the employee, under our view of the general equitable purposes of this act. Furthermore, there is evidence in the record from which it may be inferred that the delay was by agreement of the parties—or at least by agreement of the parties complaining of the same here. For the record contains a letter from the Industrial Accident Commission to Olivera, dated June 14, 1920, acknowledging receipt of the application of June 8, and stating that the insurance company had informed the Commission that it was in communication with Dr. Brown about the case and would take up the matter further upon receipt of a report from Dr. Brown. The inference is certainly permissible that the delay was at the instance of the insurance carrier and for its benefit, to enable it to more thoroughly investigate the case and determine what its attitude in the matter should be.

Under all the circumstances of this case, and after a very full and careful reading of the entire record, we find no errors in the proceedings which would justify us in reversing the award of the Commission. Any informalities which may have occurred would not invalidate the award herein made, in view of the provisions of section 60 of the act we are considering; and, furthermore, as we have stated, if any such informalities occurred we do not see that they were prejudicial to the petitioners here.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

CHAMBERS v. GLENN-COLUSA IRR. DIST.
et al. (Civ. 2455.)

1. Waters and water courses ⚡227—Determination of qualifications of signers of petitions for recall of directors of irrigation district.

The secretary of the board of an irrigation district determines the qualifications of signers of a petition for the recall of directors, by an inspection of the petition and of the great register of the county, and is not required to go beyond an examination of these documents, under St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 135, § 28½; Pol. Code, § 1083a.

2. Mandamus ⚡10—Refusal of secretary of board of irrigation district to certify recall petition not arbitrary exercise of power.

Refusal of secretary of board of directors of irrigation district to certify to the sufficiency of a petition for recall of directors, where none of the signers affixed the date of their signing, as required by St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 135, § 28½, was no arbitrary exercise of the power on his part, such as would warrant issue of writ of mandate to compel him to certify, in view of Pol. Code, § 1083a.

3. Mandamus ⚡154(4)—Proper signing of petition for recall of directors of irrigation district held not alleged.

On application for writ of mandate to require secretary of board of directors of irrigation district to certify to the sufficiency of a petition for recall of directors, allegation that "said papers, so constituting said petition, were as follows: (a) One was dated December 30, 1921, and all signatures thereon were placed thereon by the registered voters therein named on the same day, and said paper was circulated by G., and the affidavit of said G., attached thereto, was taken by him before H., a notary public in and for the county of C., on December 30, 1921," and an affidavit as to the genuineness of the signatures and qualifications of signers, held not to show that the signers affixed the date of their signatures to the petition, as required by St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 135, § 28½, in view of Pol. Code, § 1083a.

Application by C. W. Chambers for writ of mandate to require an election to be called in the Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District. Application denied.

Frank Freeman and George R. Freeman, both of Willows, for petitioner.

Hankins & Hankins, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. By an original application to this court, petitioner seeks a writ of mandate to require the secretary of the board of directors of said district to certify to the sufficiency of a certain alleged petition, filed with him, for the recall of the directors and also to require the board to call an election based on such petition. It may be stated that, of the three directors sought to be recalled, one has died and another has resigned, and their successors have been chosen since the petition was presented to the secretary. A demurrer on various grounds has been filed by the irrigation district and the board of directors, and a separate demurrer and an answer by the secretary, Charles F. Lambert. The answer puts in issue the question of the sufficiency of the alleged petition, both as to form and the necessary signatures, and also denies that the petition referred to in this application is the same as the recall petition which was filed with him. We think, though, that we need go no further than the admitted facts to reach the conclusion that the writ should be denied.

The office of the writ of mandate is well understood, and it is not doubted that the duty of said secretary in the premises is ministerial in its character. If the law imposed upon him the obligation to certify to said petition, manifestly the writ will issue. Whether such was his duty depends upon the question whether said petition complied with the requirements of the law. Section 28½ of the Recall Act, referring specifically to irrigation districts, approved January 2, 1912 (Stats. 1911, extra session, p. 135), provided for the following procedure in such case:

"A petition demanding the election of a successor to the person sought to be removed shall be filed with the secretary of the board of directors of such district, which petition shall be signed by registered voters equal in number to at least 25 per cent. of the highest vote cast within such district for candidates for the office, the incumbent of which is sought to be removed, at the last general election in such district at which an incumbent of such office was elected * * * and said petition shall contain a statement of the grounds on which the removal or recall is sought. * * * Each signer shall add to his signature his place of residence, giving the precinct, and, if within a town having named streets and numbered houses, street and number. Each such separate paper shall have attached thereto an affidavit made by an elector of the district and sworn to before an officer competent to administer oath, stating that the affiant circulated that particular paper and saw written the signatures appended thereto; and, that according to the best information and belief of the affiant, each is the genuine signature of the person whose name purports to be thereunto subscribed and of a qualified elector of the district. Within ten days from the date of filing such petition, the secretary of the board shall examine and from the records of the registration ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and he shall attach to said petition his certificate showing the result of said examination."

Subsequent legislation upon the subject, however, is found in section 1083a, of the Political Code. As enacted in 1913, it provided:

"Wherever, by the Constitution or laws of this state, any initiative, referendum, recall or nominating petition is required to be signed by qualified electors, only an elector who is a registered qualified elector at the time he signs such petition, shall be entitled to sign the same."

In 1915 to the foregoing was added the following amendment:

"Wherever, by the Constitution or laws of this state any * * * recall * * * petition * * * is required to be signed, * * * such signer shall at the time of so signing such petition or paper affix thereto the date of such signing."

[1, 2] It is not disputed that the foregoing section of the Political Code is a part of the law applicable to the case herein, and it is admitted that none of the signers to the petition affixed thereto the date of "such signing." The requirement is, of course, plain and unequivocal, within the power of the Legislature to prescribe, and there is no good reason for holding it to be otherwise than mandatory. If it may be disregarded, any other prerequisite in reference to the petition may be ignored. The importance of it is seen in the fact that the signers must be electors at the time their signatures are attached, and the secretary of the board determines their qualifications by an inspection of the petition and of the great register of the county. He is not required to go beyond an examination of these documents to ascertain whether the petitioners were qualified signers.

In Wright v. Engram, 201 Pac. 788, the Supreme Court said:

"The law does not require him to go outside for information, but he must determine 'from the records of registration' whether or not the fact exists. Such an examination involves merely ministerial acts and is in no sense judicial."

Therein the law required the clerk to ascertain only "whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters" and he was to determine this from an examination of "the records of registration." But herein there was the additional requirement that we have mentioned, and the secretary could not determine, by an inspection of the petition, when the signatures were attached. It was not therefore his "plain, ministerial duty" to certify the petition to the board. It is proper to construe liberally this, as well as other provisions of the law, to effect the intention of the Legislature, but to hold that there was in this case a substantial compliance with the requirement of the statute would be a judicial usurpation of the function of the law-making branch of the government. We may add that the requirement is reasonable and easy to be observed and it was no arbitrary exercise of power on the part of the secretary to refuse to certify such petition.

The answer of petitioner to this contention is that "the petition alleges that all the names to each of the separate papers were subscribed by the signers thereto on the same day" and, moreover, the consideration was decided adversely to respondents' contention by this court, in Chester v. Hall, 204 Pac. 237. As to the first of these, the petition herein for a writ of mandate does show to this court the time when the signatures were attached, but the real question is, What did the petition for recall show to the secretary of the board? We are to determine whether the writ should issue, by a consideration of the situation as it was presented to him; and, as we have seen, the showing was not such as to make it his duty to certify the petition.

[3] The allegation that "said papers so constituting said petition were as follows: (a) One was dated December 30, 1921, and all signatures thereon were placed thereon by the registered voters therein named on the same day, and said paper was circulated by George A. McDermott, and the affidavit of said George A. McDermott attached thereto was taken by him before George L. Harden, a notary public in and for the county of Colusa, Cal., on December 30, 1921, and that paper contained 32 signatures" not only fails to show that the signers affixed the date of their signatures, but it does not indicate that there was anything upon the face of the record whereby the secretary could determine when the petition was signed. Even the affidavit of the elector did not state when the signature was made, but only that he "circulated that particular paper and saw written the signatures appended thereto, and that, according to the best information and belief of the affiant, each was the genuine signature of the person whose name purported to be thereunto subscribed and of a qualified elector of said district."

In the Chester Case, supra, it was not decided that the provision requiring the signer to affix the date of his signing is merely directory, but it was held to be a rational conclusion from a consideration of the whole record, that a sufficient number of the electors had so affixed the dates. Moreover, in that case it is stated that "the answer admits that more than the required number of qualified electors signed the petition and affixed thereto the dates of their respective signatures." In addition, the clerk had certified that a sufficient number of electors had signed the petition but he based his refusal to act upon the claim that the petition was fatally defective in respect to the affidavit required to be attached thereto.

Other points are made by respondents, but we think the foregoing is decisive of the controversy.

The application for the writ is denied, and the petition dismissed.

PEOPLE v. RUEF. (Cr. 1031.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 71—Indictment charging "robbery," but alleging facts showing burglary, held demurrable for ambiguity and uncertainty.

Indictment, denominating the offense charged as "robbery," but alleging facts showing burglary, held demurrable for uncertainty and ambiguity.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1032(7)—Variance not available on appeal, in absence of objection in lower court.

Variance between evidence proving burglary and indictment denominating the offense as "robbery," but alleging facts showing burglary, held not available on appeal from judgment of conviction for burglary, in the absence of objection in lower court.

3. Witnesses $\S$ 268(8)—Refusal to permit cross-examination held improper.

In prosecution for burglary, in which witness had on direct examination testified to a confession made by defendant, refusal to permit cross-examination as to whether he had disclosed confession to the grand jury when he appeared before it as a witness held improper, in view of ambiguity in the record as to the precise time referred to; there having been more than one indictment returned against the defendant and his confederates.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1170½(5)—Exclusion of testimony held harmless, in view of other testimony on same point.

Where witness had testified on direct examination as to confession by defendant, refusal to permit cross-examination as to whether witness in testifying before the grand jury had disclosed the confession held harmless, in view of testimony as to such confession by two other witnesses.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 534(1)—Extrajudicial confessions alone are insufficient to sustain conviction.

Extrajudicial confessions alone are insufficient to sustain a conviction.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 535(2)—Testimony corroborating confession held sufficient to sustain conviction in view of independent proof of corpus delicti.

In prosecution for burglary, testimony as to confession made by defendant held sufficiently corroborated to sustain conviction, in view of independent proof of the corpus delicti.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

George Ruef was convicted of burglary in the second degree and from judgment of conviction and order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the second degree. From the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial this appeal is prosecuted.

The evidence shows that the defendant with others, on or about the 29th day of April, 1921, burglarized certain premises on First avenue in the city of San Francisco, taking therefrom a large quantity of wine and liquor. One witness testified that he saw three men in front of the premises from which said property was stolen early in the morning of the burglary. Entrance to the premises was effected through a large hole made by the use of a brace and bit and a saw. The property was carried away in an automobile. About the time of the burglary the defendant had rented a house on Rivoli street in said city, in which an insurance business purported to be conducted. Although the defendant negotiated the lease and paid the rent, the insurance business, if carried on at all, was not conducted in his name, but in that of E. G. Walter & Co., as shown by a sign upon the front of the premises. Subsequent to the burglary a detective searched these premises, and found thereon two hack saws, a bolt cutter, a brace, and three bits of uniform size, which bits fitted the holes made at the point where the entry of the burglarized premises was effected. The defendant admitted to three police officers that he participated in the burglary. He stated that he conveyed his confederates to the premises in an automobile; that according to prearrangement they were to effect an entrance into the basement of the premises, he in the meantime keeping the automobile in motion and occasionally passing the house; that upon an agreed signal he rejoined his confederates at the scene of their activity and loaded into the automobile the wine and liquor as it was delivered to him by them on the sidewalk.

The testimony introduced by the prosecution is uncontradicted; the defendant neither having offered himself as a witness nor called any one in his behalf.

[1, 2] It is first contended by the appellant that there was a fatal variance between the evidence and the indictment, and that it was therefore error on the part of the trial court to deny his motion that the jury be instructed to return a verdict of not guilty. This contention is based upon an evident inadvertence in the indictment, wherein the offense is denominated "robbery" but this general designation is immediately followed by specific allegations showing, with sufficient clearness, that the offense charged was burglary. While the indictment was subject to demurrer upon the grounds of uncertainty and ambiguity, it does not follow that, having gone to trial upon it without objection, and been convicted of burglary, a defendant can upon appeal ignore the language thereof which specifically charged this offense, and affect to believe that he was on trial for robbery, and upon this foundation base a contention that the proof being of burglary there was a variance between it and the indictment.

[3, 4] Defendant also contends that the trial court committed error in restricting the cross-examination of one of the witnesses for the prosecution. This witness, on his direct examination, had testified to a confession made to him by the defendant, and upon cross-examination the court refused to permit him to be asked if, when he appeared as a witness before the grand jury, he had disclosed to that body this alleged confession. The witness had said on his direct examination that the confession had been made to him after the arrest of the defendant on the grand jury indictment. While, therefore, we think, in view of some ambiguity in the record as to the precise time referred to (there having been more than one indictment returned against the defendant or his confederates), the question should have been permitted, still we are unable to perceive wherein the defendant suffered any substantial injury as a result of the ruling of the court, for this confession of the defendant was also testified to by two other witnesses.

[5, 6] Defendant finally contends that the only evidence in the case tending to support the verdict is the confession heretofore referred to. It is, of course, true, as pointed out by the appellant, that extrajudicial confessions alone are insufficient to sustain a conviction; but where, as here, in addition to the confession there is independent proof of the corpus delicti, it is well-established that the verdict is sufficiently supported by the evidence. People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 565; People v. Thrall, 50 Cal. 415; 6 Am. & Eng.

Ency. of Law, 582. A conviction based on a confession will stand although uncorroborated by any other evidence, if the corpus delicti be proven. 16 C. J. 736; People v. Ford, 25 Cal. App. 388, 143 Pac. 1075.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SOUTHWEST PAVING CO. v. WILSON, Street Superintendent.
(Civ. 3793.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. April 3, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨304(13)—Resolution of intention to improve street governs as against plans and specifications.

While an immaterial difference between work provided to be done by a resolution of intention to improve a street and that described in the plans and specifications will not render a proceeding under Improvement Act 1911 void, an unambiguous resolution governs.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨304(13)—Where plans and specifications referred to in resolution of intention to pave call for additional work, proceeding is void.

Where the resolution of intention to pave a street clearly described the work to be done, but the plans and specifications, which the resolution referred to for a more particular description and made a part thereof called for additional work, there was an ambiguity created which rendered the proceeding void, the plans and specifications, though not such an integral part of the resolution as to require that they be published, being a part thereof when reference is made to them as such by the resolution, which the statute (Improvement Act 1911) requires "shall describe" the work to be done.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨289(1)—Proceedings for pavement of streets must be strictly pursued.

Proceedings, such as those prescribed by Improvement Act 1911 for street improvements, by which the citizen is divested of his property in invitum, must be strictly pursued, and the court will not use extrinsic aids or other intents to avoid the effect of uncertainty therein; the rule requiring certainty in contracts generally, in order that there may be a meeting of the minds, being applicable.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨304(13)—Variance between resolution of intention and plan as to width of gutters held such as to render proceeding void.

Where a resolution of intention to pave a street called for gutters 36 inches wide, while the plan, to which reference was made, stated that the gutters were 18 inches wide, there was a positive conflict between the two, resulting in an uncertainty which rendered the proceeding void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by the Southwest Paving Company against L. M. Wilson, as Street Superintendent of the City of Buenaventura. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. F. Orr and Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, all of Ventura, for appellant.

Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. In this appeal the facts are not in dispute. In so far as it is necessary to state them they are as follows:

The defendant is the street superintendent of the city of San Buenaventura. A proceeding under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730) was instituted, and a resolution of intention to improve certain streets within that city was duly passed and published and notice of its adoption posted according to law. Bids were received, and the petitioner was the lowest bidder. Thereafter and in due time the petitioner duly signed and executed a contract "to do and perform all of the work described in said resolution of intention," etc. The defendant declined to sign this contract, and also refused to approve the petitioner's bond for the faithful performance of the work. The reason assigned for such refusals is the existence of certain alleged defects and irregularities in the proceeding. It is agreed that the petition correctly and completely sets forth the objections of the defendant. They are seven in number.

[1, 2] The first one which we will consider is in substance that the resolution of intention calls for the paving of Fir and Chestnut streets up to the north line of Front street. It is expressly provided in the resolution of intention that the plans and specifications are made a part thereof, and special reference is therein made to plan No. 308. But according to plan No. 308 the streets above mentioned were to be paved for a distance of about eight feet south of Front street. A proceeding for street improvement under the act of 1911 depends for its jurisdictional foundation upon the resolution of intention. Fay v. Reed, 128 Cal. 357, 60 Pac. 927. It is true that where an immaterial difference exists between the work provided to be done by the resolution of intention and that described in the plans and specifications the proceeding will not be rendered void, but the clear provision of the resolution of intention will govern. Wentland v. Clark & Henery Const. Co., 37 Cal. App. 34, 173 Pac. 480. This rule, however, does not apply to a case where the resolution of intention is ambiguous and contains contradictory provisions. Piedmont Paving Co. v. Allman, 136 Cal. 88, 68 Pac. 493. The case at bar may be differentiated from each of those cited from this jurisdiction in that here the resolution of intention does describe the work to be done clearly and without ambiguity, but the plans and specifications call for additional work, and it is argued by appellant that an uncertainty and ambiguity results which renders the entire proceeding void. The resolution of intention describes the work to be done as follows:

"All the roadway of Chestnut street from the north line of Front street to a line drawn across said Chestnut street two hundred fifty (250) feet south from and parallel with the south line of Poli street; all the roadway of Fir street from the north line of Front street to the south line of East Main street."

If, in the resolution itself, there were contained a further and separate provision to the effect that the work of paving was to begin, not "from the north line of Front street," but "from a line parallel to and eight feet southerly of said north line of Front street," no doubt could exist that the entire resolution of intention would be void for uncertainty. There would, in that event, be two inconsistent descriptions of the part of Chestnut street which is to be graded and paved. But these contradictory descriptions do occur. The first is in the resolution of intention proper, and the second is in the plans and specifications. If, then, the plans and specifications are to be regarded as a part of the resolution of intention, the uncertainty must invalidate the proceeding, at least as to this particular work. In order that the proceeding may be upheld it must be determined that the plans and specifications are not strictly a part of the resolution of intention. To begin with, the resolution of intention before us expressly declares that—

"Said plans and specifications are hereby referred to for a more particular description of said work and made a part hereof."

In view of this plain provision no doubt can be entertained as to the purpose of the legislative authority which passed the resolution of intention, and that intent must be controlling unless there is some inhibition in the law against making the plans and specifications a part of the resolution of intention.

Our own decisions have not directly passed upon this question, but the situation presented by City of Stockton v. Whitmore, 50 Cal. 554, is quite analogous to that in the case at bar. In that case the council proposed to do only a part of the work described in the resolution of intention. Quoting from the opinion, it is said:

"If it is proposed to improve a street for its whole length through several blocks, the property owners may be perfectly content to have the work done, and would have no motive to attend at the hearing. But they might have grave objections to improving the street for only a portion of the distance."

To be sure, this was not a case where the discrepancy was between the resolution of intention and plans and specifications, but the same consideration which led the court to hold that the work called for by the resolution of intention could not be altered by the council at the hearing applies to the situation here involved. The property owners might be perfectly willing to agree that the precise work called for in the resolution of intention should be done, but might object seriously to any additional work or to only a portion of the work being undertaken. If a variance exists they are not informed and cannot know whether to consent or to use the right to object which is safeguarded by the law. In Wentland v. Clark & Henery Const. Co., 37 Cal. App. 34, 173 Pac. 480, the variance was alleged to be between the resolution of intention and the plans and specifications on the one hand and the record of the assessment on the other. The record of assessment showed the frontage of the property of the plaintiff Wentland to be less than that indicated by the plan. The opinion states that "The jurisdiction to do the work had its origin in the passage and publication and posting of the resolution of intention;" that the resolution of intention provided that the work was to be done in accordance with the plans and specifications "to which said plans and specifications reference is hereby made for description of said work and further particulars"; that the plans and specifications described the work to be done the same as the resolution of intention; that the "plans attached to the specifications were made a part thereof"; that "the specifications did not call for the improvement of a certain number of feet in front of each lot fronting on Pine street or for any specified number of feet"; that the court could see no reason "why plaintiff Phillips should escape payment because of the variance between the statement of an immaterial fact in the specifications and in the final certificate of the engineer of the actual length of the improved line of the street and the actual part of that line which was in front of the Phillips lot." By inference, at least, it is clear that the court held the plans and specifications to be a part of the resolution of intention. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, goes a step further. The resolution of intention there under consideration merely provided that the work should be done "in accordance with the specifications" and "in accordance with the plans and profiles." The court there said:

"We hold that a resolution of intention sufficiently describes the work if it states the kind of work to be done, as stated in the statute, and refers to plans and specifications on file in the office of the city clerk or engineer, which give the details as to the materials to be used, and that the matters referred to need not be published."

The effect of that decision is to establish the rule that, although the plans and specifications are not such an integral part of the resolution of intention as to require that they be published, nevertheless, when reference is made to them by the resolution of intention they are a part thereof, for "the purpose to be served by the publication of the resolution is, in the first place, to inform interested persons of the general character of the improvement proposed, and, in the second place to make a specific declaration of the particular kind of improvement, as a basis of future action." The statute requires that the resolution of intention "shall describe" the work to be done. In the instant case the resolution of intention expressly states that the plans and specifications are to be looked to for "a more particular description of said work"; that they are "made a part hereof." We hold that such a particular description in the plans and specifications which is at variance with the general description of the resolution of intention creates an ambiguity which renders the proceeding void.

[3] It is obvious that the property owners have no certain basis upon which to rely. If the street superintendent were to sign the contract executed by the petitioner, it would be impossible to tell at what point the paving of the streets in question should begin. Persons desiring to bid have no definite starting point from which to reckon. In order that there may be fair competitive bidding, the bids must be for the construction of the same work, not only as to character, but as to extent as well. The rules requiring certainty and definiteness in contracts generally in order that there may be a meeting of the minds of the contracting parties have the same application to agreements of this character as in others. This is a proceeding by which the citizen is divested of his property in invitum. It must be strictly pursued. City of Stockton v. Whitmore, 50 Cal. 554. The court will not use extrinsic aids or other intents to avoid the effect of uncertainty in such a proceeding. Bay Rock Co. v. Bell, 133 Cal. 150, 65 Pac. 299, and Labs v. Cooper, 107 Cal. 656, 40 Pac. 1042.

[4] Another conflict occurs between the resolution of intention and the plans and specifications. The resolution of intention calls for gutters 36 inches in width to be constructed along both sides of the streets named. The cross section of plan No. 308 to which reference is made in the resolution of intention states that the gutters are 18 inches in width. Thus there is created a positive conflict between the resolution of intention and the plans and specifications, resulting in an uncertainty which must render the proceeding void.

Holding these views, it is unnecessary to pass upon other points raised by the appellant, concerning which it is urged that the proceeding is irregular.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

LONGSWORTH v. CURSON et al.
(Civ. 4142; L. A. 6871.)

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

1. Libel and slander §45(2)—Letter written by employees to employers concerning new appointees is privileged.

A letter written by the employees of a tax collector's office to the tax collector concerning a new appointee, in which facts were stated showing that a new appointee would not work harmoniously with the other employees, was from persons interested in the matter to one who was also interested, so as to be privileged within Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3.

2. Libel and slander §112(2)—Evidence held not to show malice in making privileged communication.

Evidence that plaintiff had made a false claim of dependence to procure a deferred classification in the draft, and that while working as extra help in the tax collector's office he had refused to co-operate with other employees, held to show that a letter written by the other employees to the tax collector protesting against plaintiff's appointment as a report clerk, in which it was stated he had a well-known reputation as a slacker and had demonstrated he could not work harmoniously with the other employees, was not actuated by express malice, so as to be actionable notwithstanding the qualified privilege.

3. Libel and slander §5—Compensatory damages can be recovered for libel without proving malice.

If a publication is libelous on its face or is shown to be so by extrinsic evidence, plaintiff may recover compensatory damages without proof of malice.

4. Libel and slander §101(4)—Plaintiff need not prove actual malice until defendant makes prima facie showing of privilege and absence of malice.

A defendant who pleads that the publication was upon a privileged occasion, as defined by Civ. Code, § 47, subds. 3, 4, or 5, must make a prima facie showing of the absence of malice before plaintiff is required to prove actual malice.

5. Libel and slander §120(2)—Punitive damages cannot be recovered without proof of actual malice.

A plaintiff cannot recover punitive damages for the publication of a libel without pleading and proving actual malice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action for libel by Floyd R. Longworth against S. T. Curson and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed, and hearing denied by the Supreme Court.

John F. Poole and Robert L. Williams, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Randall, Bartlett & White, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action for damages alleged to have resulted from the publication of a communication charged to be libelous. The communication consisted of a letter, dated May 8, 1919, from the defendants, the employees of the report department of the tax collector's office of the county of Los Angeles, to W. O. Welch, the tax collector, and is in the following terms:

"Dear Mr. Welch: Appreciating the fact that you are as interested in preventing the introduction of any discordant element into the report department, or any other subdivision of the tax office, the undersigned wishes to call your attention to and at the same time enter our protest against the recent appointment of Mr. Longworth.

"Our objection to this person becoming a member of the department in which we are engaged is primarily predicated upon the well-known reputation of the young man as a 'slacker' in evading the draft and in refusing to aid the government in the purchase of a Liberty Bond, and in other ways indicating and expressing lack of patriotism and loyalty.

"Furthermore, Mr. Longworth has given many demonstrations during his service in the tax office that he lacks resiliency in disposition and temperament, and exhibits a spirit of selfishness and unconcern for the welfare and condition of others that alone should deny him association with those who do express and exhibit sentiments of concern and kindness for those who come in contact with each other in the discharge of office or social duties.

"If yourself and the appointing power of associate coworkers in this and other departments of the county service are seeking harmony and the helpful conditions which can only prevail when the spirit of fairness and loyalty animate the attitude of each member of any particular department, you will recall the appointment of Mr. Longworth as an appointee of the report office, and by this act indicate that you are as keenly interested in the harmonious atmosphere of our surroundings as you are in the development of our efficiency and loyalty to duty.

"Should any additional ground be required to sustain our position in this request, we hold ourselves in readiness to submit same when called for.

"For the above consideration of those who have been loyal, faithful, and considerate in their services to you in the past and at the present, we can only expect a favorable action upon this request."

The evidence shows that the plaintiff began working in the tax collector's office as an extra employee under civil service regulations in April, 1914. Five years later he received a letter from the tax collector notifying him that he was permanently appointed report clerk. At that time he was ill. Later in May, 1919, when he announced himself ready, the tax collector called his attention to said letter, and as a result of this letter his appointment was canceled.

The evidence also shows that at the time the letter was written the plaintiff was about 34 years old; he was a member of Standard Camp, G. A. R., Sons of Veterans, the Ohio State Society, and the young men's bible class of the First Methodist church. Concerning his attitude to the draft law, he testified that he had registered, and in his questionnaire he had asked for a deferred classification upon the ground that his father and mother and sister were dependent upon him for support. On his cross-examination it was developed that his father and mother had visited California and stayed about a year, leaving for their home during the month plaintiff registered. While in California he had contributed to their support, but prior thereto and since then they lived on their farm in Ohio, where they made their own living. The plaintiff admitted on cross-examination that he had not contributed to the support of his sister since the year 1915, and that she was at the time he registered 24 years old, regularly employed, and self-supporting. Other evidence introduced by plaintiff tended to show that rumors had been current to the effect that he was a "slacker"; that he was well known as a conscientious objector to the war; that he had a well-known reputation as a slacker and draft evader; and that his parents were not, as declared by him in his questionnaire, dependent upon him for support. It is in the record and uncontradicted that he had stated to two employees of the tax collector's office that he was a conscientious objector and opposed to the war; to another, at the height of the patriotic feeling aroused by the war he asserted that he was personally and religiously opposed to the conflict.

On the subject of his financial support of the war, the plaintiff testified that he purchased Liberty Bonds to the extent of $250, and war savings stamps in an amount of $60, but did not make these purchases through the tax collector's office as was the case with his fellow employees; that upon one occasion, when invited by a coemployee to purchase war savings stamps, he replied that he had "better use for his money."

Concerning his conduct in the tax collector's office and the charge that he was selfish and exhibited a spirit of unconcern for the welfare of others, it appears, briefly, that he was controversial, that occasionally he stubbornly resisted doing the work as suggested, claiming to have a better method of doing it than the one in operation, and that he was "uniformly disliked." Nor did he contradict the testimony of his own witnesses that he never contributed to funds raised in the office for different purposes, e. g., to purchase flowers for deceased employees of the office, or that on one occasion he refused to contribute 25 cents to a fund raised about Christmas time "for one of our boys that had been crippled during the war" and who "had a wife and two children."

The letter forming the basis of the action was signed by all the regular employees of the report department except one—the head of the department—who for that reason deemed it inexpedient to do so. It was intended originally that a committee of one representing the employees should wait on the tax collector and enter their protest to the confirmation of the appointment, but it was finally decided that the matter should be presented in the form of the foregoing letter, and it was agreed among the subscribers thereto that it should never be spoken of nor referred to. The author of the letter called as a witness for the plaintiff, testified that in writing it he was not actuated by motives of malice or ill-will toward the plaintiff.

Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's case the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted, and the correctness of this ruling depends upon whether or not, giving the evidence the construction most favorable to the plaintiff, it shows the existence of malice on the part of the defendants or any of them.

It is admitted that the letter was a qualified privileged communication falling within the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code, which reads:

A privileged communication is one made—" (3) In a communication, without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for the communication innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information."

When the plaintiff depends upon such a communication in order to recover, it is incumbent upon him to show: First, that the communication is false; and, second, that the person making it was actuated by express malice, and the burden of proving malice is on the plaintiff.

The privilege defined by subdivision 3 of section 47, Civil Code, above set forth, is not absolute, being in this respect unlike those classified by subdivisions 1 and 2 of the same section as official, legislative, or judicial; but it falls within the class of qualified privileged communications where the occasion of their making rebuts the inference prima facie arising from their character as prejudicial to the reputation of the person concerned, and in which the burden is on the plaintiff to prove that there was malice in fact, that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill will.

In the case of Gatewood v. Garrett, 106 Va. 552, 56 S. E. 335, one of the questions before the court was whether or not the following instruction given to the jury correctly stated the law:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant spoke the words, or any of them, as charged in the declaration, of and concerning the plaintiff, yet the presumption of law is that he spoke them honestly, believing in the truth of his statement, although such statements in fact were false or founded upon the most erroneous information; and, in order for the plaintiff to recover in this action, the burden is upon him to prove to your satisfaction that such statements were spoken with actual malice in fact towards the defendant."

In deciding this question the court stated:

"It is not denied that this is a correct statement of the law. The occasion was privileged, and to make the defendant liable he must be shown to have misused the occasion to gratify his malice; the presumption being that he believed the statement to be true."

In the case of Hayden v. Hasbrouck, 34 R. I. 556, 84 Atl. 1087, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1109, at the conclusion of the testimony the defendant moved for a directed verdict upon the same grounds as were urged here for a nonsuit. The appeal there was from an order denying the motion. In the course of the opinion the court states:

"The interview in question being a privileged one the defendant cannot be held liable for the words alleged to have been spoken by her, although the same were untrue and in ordinary circumstances would be actionable, unless in uttering them she was moved by malice toward the plaintiff. And the word 'malice' in this connection does not mean malice in law, or the absence of legal excuse, but malice in the popular sense, the motive of personal spite or ill will. This is sometimes called express or actual malice. Unauthorized communications which are actionable carry with them the inference of malice, and the plaintiff, without proof, can rely upon the presumption of malice which arises from the slanderous nature of the words. But in a privileged communication the occasion repels the inference of malice and there arises a presumption of good faith which the plaintiff is required to satisfactorily rebut. The burden of proving express malice is thrown upon the plaintiff by reason of the privilege in the defendant."

Section 48 of the Civil Code provides:

"In the cases provided for in subdivisions 3, 4, and 5 of the preceding section, malice is not inferred from the communication or publication."

See, also Berot v. Porte, 144 La. 805, 81 South. 323, 3 A. L. R. 1651.

While the evidence shows that the plaintiff registered under the draft act and purchased government bonds, it is still true that the evidence shows without contradiction that he was regarded and bore the reputation of a man who had not discharged his duty to his country while engaged in war with a foreign enemy. That this reputation was not without foundation was shown by the evidence admitted of the conduct and statements of the plaintiff, and by the inexcusable prevarication through which he claimed a deferred classification. At the date of the letter this country had but recently emerged from armed conflict with an aggressive enemy wherein the patriotic spirit of our citizens had been intensely aroused, and where the burdens imposed by the necessities of the conflict had been great, rendering any evasion of duty by a citizen inexcusable, and calculated to justly arouse the indignation of those whose consciences, while not of that sort which forbade them to take up arms, did interpose an effective barrier to any shirking of duty. Under these conditions it cannot justly be said that the sending of the letter under the facts narrated was of itself evidence of malice, nor that the complaint concerning plaintiff's conduct in the office was not made in good faith. The uncontroverted evidence shows that the defendants were acting, as they conceived it, in furtherance of the welfare of the public office in which they were employed. Certainly no malice can be said to have been shown by the mere writing of the letter, and none was shown independent of the letter. Where, as here, a communication imputing misconduct to another is made in good faith by persons who are interested therein to one who has an interest in the communication and a right to know and act upon the facts stated, no presumption of malice arises from the communication itself. Civ. Code, § 48; 25 Cyc. 385, 388; Bayliss v. Grand Lodge, 131 La. 579, 59 South. 996.

It follows that there was no error in granting the motion for nonsuit.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [1] The letter complained of does not show malice on its face. The evidence showed, without substantial contradiction, that it was written and published without malice by certain of the employees in the tax collector's office to the tax collector himself. All of these persons were interested in the matter of the appointment of the plaintiff to an official position in that office. It was therefore published upon a privileged occasion and was a privileged publication within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code, and the nonsuit was properly granted on that ground.

[2] The letter does not charge that the plaintiff was in fact a "slacker," but only that he had a "well-known reputation" as such. The evidence shows that he had that reputation among the employees in the office. The question whether or not his conduct justified that reputation is not decisive of the question whether or not such repute existed. The statements in the opinion of the district court as to his conduct are not in all respects supported by the record. The plaintiff denied that he had ever said to any person that he was a conscientious objector and was personally, and religiously opposed to the war. His father and mother did not, as the opinion says, leave California for their home in Ohio, during the month in which plaintiff registered for the draft, that is, in September, 1918, but remained in California until September, 1919. The district court evidently mistook the date as given in the record. It does appear, however, and without contradiction, that neither his father nor mother were dependent on him for support in September, 1918, or at any other time, and that his sister was not dependent on him at that time, nor for the three preceding years.

[3-5] We do not approve of the statement in the opinion of the district court that the plaintiff in an action for libel for the publication of such a letter as that here complained of must show "that the person making it was actuated by express malice, and the burden of proving malice is on the plaintiff." Under our Code, if a publication is libelous on its face, or is shown to be so by extrinsic evidence, the plaintiff may recover compensatory damages without proof of malice. When the defendant pleads that the publication was made without malice and upon a privileged occasion of the character defined in either subdivisions 3, 4, or 5 of section 47, the defendant must first make a prima facie showing of the absence of malice, and then, but not until then, the plaintiff may in rebuttal prove actual malice on the part of defendant. Snively v. Record Pub. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 198 Pac. 1, 6. It may be added that the plaintiff cannot recover punitive damage without pleading and proof of actual malice. Actual malice was alleged and punitive damages were claimed in the complaint, but there was no proof to support the allegation. For these reasons we are satisfied with the decision affirming the judgment.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

A. Rivera was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore Gottsdanker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was charged with the crimes of burglary and grand larceny. He was convicted of burglary in the second degree and of grand larceny.

Three points are relied upon in support of the appeal. They are that the evidence is insufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty on the count of burglary, that the evidence is insufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty on the charge of grand larceny, and that the court erred in failing to include in its proposed forms of verdict a form of verdict relating to petty larceny.

Mrs. Romero owned a house of two rooms. One of these rooms she occupied, and the other she rented to the witness Sosa. The outside doors of the respective rooms were locked with padlocks. There was a connecting door, fastened with a lock and a hook on the side occupied by Mrs. Romero. During the absence of the occupants, personal property of Mrs. Romero and some other personal property in the room of Sosa were taken away. On the return of the occupants, the outside padlocks were found locked, but the connecting door was off, and the hook was pulled off.

[1] Shortly afterwards the defendant was arrested on the street, carrying a sack which contained the missing clothes of Mrs. Romero, and some clothing taken from the other room. The defendant gave explanations concerning his possession of these articles, which explanations were proved to be false. It was proved that no permission had been given to the defendant to enter this house. These facts were sufficient to prove that the defendant was guilty of the crime of burglary.

[2] It is claimed that the evidence fails to prove grand larceny in that it was not established that the value of the property taken exceeded $50. But the record shows by the testimony of Mrs. Romero that the value of the property taken from her room and belonging to her, exclusive of the property taken from the man's room, was $103.75. Assuming, without deciding, that the evidence was unsatisfactory as to the value of two of the articles, placed at $20 and $25, respectively, there remained a value of more than $50 of the property stolen from and belonging to Mrs. Romero. This value was proved by the evidence without conflict therein.

[3, 4] The defendant did not request any instruction concerning the crime of petty lar-

PEOPLE v. RIVERA. (Cr. 865.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 25, 1922.)

1. Burglary § 41(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of burglary.

2. Larceny § 59—Evidence held sufficient to prove value of stolen property exceeded $50.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, evidence held sufficient to prove that the value of the property taken exceeded $50.

3. Criminal law § 824(15)—Failure to submit form of verdict as to petit larceny held not error, where instruction was not requested.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, where defendant requested no instruction on petit larceny, the court's failure to include in its proposed forms of verdict a form relating to petit larceny was not erroneous.

4. Criminal law § 798½—Failure to submit alternative form of verdict as to petit larceny, in prosecution for grand larceny, not error.

The court's failure, in a prosecution for grand larceny, to include in its proposed forms of verdict a form relating to petit larceny, is not a ground for complaint; such alternative forms of verdict, while convenient, not being necessary.

ceny. Under the circumstances, this omission did not deprive the defendant of any substantial right. Indeed, such suggested alternative forms of verdict, while convenient, are not necessary, and their omission furnishes no ground of complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

TULARE COUNTY v. CITY OF DINUBA et al. (Sac. 3136.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1922.)

1. Constitutional law ☞119 — May alter amount of franchise charges.

The power of the state exists to abrogate or alter the nature or amount of any charges for franchises in favor of municipalities or other political agencies of the state for public purposes, whether as taxes, licenses, or tolls.

2. Constitutional law ☞120 — Rights under franchises contractual and not to be impaired.

The vested rights of an individual or corporation under an executed franchise are contractual, and, under Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, cannot be impaired by any subsequent enactment of the state.

3. Constitutional law ☞113—Contract clause does not extend to waiver by state of rights accruing to state agencies.

The inhibition of the contract clause (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10) does not extend to the waiver or modification of any rights accruing to the agencies of the state in their governmental capacity, by action of the people through constitutional amendments, or by legislative enactment.

4. Taxation ☞1—Broughton Act providing for a toll, which holder of light and power franchise pays for use of highway, matter of contract, and not a tax.

Const. art. 13, § 14, and laws passed to give it effect (St. 1911, p. 530; St. 1913, p. 3; St. 1915, p. 3, and St. 1917, p. 337 [Pol. Code, § 3664a]), are limited to the regulation of taxes and licenses, and the "gross receipt" charge under the Broughton Act (St. 1905, p. 777), is neither a tax nor a license, but a toll which the holder of the franchise undertakes to pay for the use of the highways, being a matter of contract.

5. Taxation ☞1—Percentage payment under Broughton Act for use of highway is a compensation and not a tax.

The percentage payment under the Broughton Act (St. 1905, p. 777) is not a tax upon property of a corporation, but a compensation for the use of the portions of the highway covered by the franchise easement, and is limited to a percentage of the gross receipts shown to arise from the "use, occupation, or possession" of the highways.

6. Statutes ☞47 — Broughton Act held not void for indefiniteness.

Where by reasonable construction, each county or municipality is entitled to its percentage of gross earnings arising from the use of its highways in the proportion that the receipts arising from the use of such highways bears to the receipts attributable to all rights of way of an entire electric system, Broughton Act (St. 1905, p. 777), providing for payment to a municipality of two per cent. of the gross earnings for a franchise for "use, occupation, or possession" of its streets, is not void for indefiniteness.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the County of Tulare against the City of Dinuba and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant San Joaquin Light & Power Company appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Short, Lindsay & Woolley, of Fresno, for appellant.

Fred C. Scott, Dist. Atty., W. W. Middlecoff, Deputy Dist. Atty., and I. H. Ham, all of Visalia, for respondent.

Butler & Van Dyke, of Sacramento, Roy V. Reppy, of Los Angeles, B. F. Woodard, E. W. Cunningham, and George E. Trowbridge, all of Los Angeles, and I. B. Potter, Newman Jones, and Henry W. Coil, all of Riverside, amici curiæ.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought by the county of Tulare to recover from the San Joaquin Light & Power Company, a public service corporation, two per cent. of the annual gross receipts for the use and operation of a franchise, over and upon the public highways of that county, pursuant to the provisions of the act of the Legislature known as the Broughton Act.

This legislation was enacted in 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 777), and provides for the granting of franchises over streets and highways to the highest bidders, by boards of supervisors and other governing bodies of counties and municipalities. The particular provision subject to construction and interpretation on this appeal is that part of section 3 of the act which declares that the successful bidder shall, after the first five years—

"pay to the county or municipality two per cent. of the gross annual receipts of the person, partnership, or corporation to whom the franchise is awarded arising from its use, operation, or possession."

The controversy arises over the meaning and application of the words we have quoted in italics. It is unnecessary to set out the further terms and provisions of the act, other than may be hereinafter required in the interpretation of the provision quoted above.

It is sufficient to say that, in conformity to the authority of the act, proceedings were had under which the defendant corporation acquired from said county a 50-year franchise authorizing the use of each and all of the public avenues and highways of the county of Tulare, for the purpose of constructing and operating electric lines and other appliances for the conveyance and distribution of electricity for various uses.

In pursuance of the rights so acquired, the defendant corporation constructed, and has since owned and operated, a system of poles and wires for transmitting electric heat, power, and light, and telephone service, along, upon, and across certain of the public avenues and highways of the county of Tulare, and has ever since been engaged in the business of transmitting and selling such electricity to the general public in Tulare county, and also through similar connecting systems owned and operated by it, in Fresno and Kern counties, to the inhabitants of the counties named.

This action was brought to recover two per cent. of the defendant's gross receipts for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, not only for all sales of electricity in Tulare county, but likewise from sales of electricity conveyed through the Tulare system to and through the connecting systems in Fresno and Kern counties. Pending the trial, all claim to the percentage from receipts from Fresno and Kern counties was waived by the plaintiff county. As a result of the trial, the plaintiff recovered the judgment appealed from for $5,066.29 being the full demand of two per cent. of all amounts received from the defendant's distributing system in Tulare county.

It appears without dispute that the defendant's distributing system in Tulare county consists of lines of transmission along 189.08 miles of avenues and highways covered by the franchises under consideration, and 91.07 miles over and upon private rights of way acquired and owned by the defendant and not included in the franchise.

The appellant corporation, and amici curiæ appearing in the same behalf, attack the judgment on the following grounds:

(1) That section 14 of article 13 of the state Constitution, adopted since the Broughton Act, and which provides for a method of taxation of corporations which "shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal," effected a repeal of the two per cent. gross receipts charge of the Broughton Act.

(2) That the provision for payment of the two per cent. gross annual revenue arising from the "use, operation, or possession" of the franchise is void for indefiniteness and uncertainty.

(3) That, if the gross receipts from any given part of an electric distributing system extending through several counties can be ascertained as arising from the use of the franchise in one of the counties, it should be confined to the part of the system occupying the streets and avenues in use under the franchise from such county, and not include receipts arising from the part of the system over and upon private easements.

The Question of Repeal.—If the payment of a percentage of gross receipts is imposed as a tax or license, there would be much force to appellant's contention of its repeal or abrogation under the tax amendment to the state Constitution. The amendment referred to was adopted in 1910, long after the Broughton Act and the franchise upon which this action is brought went into effect. It provides an exclusive method of taxation by the state, of corporations and corporate franchises, enumerating as subject to its provisions "telegraph companies; telephone companies; companies engaged in the transmission or sale of gas or electricity, * * * and taxes upon all franchises of every kind and nature," and directs that such revenues "shall be entirely and exclusively for state purposes."

Subsection (a) then provides that all such companies shall—

"annually pay to the state a tax upon their franchises, roadways, roadbeds, rails, rolling stock, poles, wires, pipes, canals, conduits, rights of way, and other property, or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of their business."

It is next provided that:

"Such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property above enumerated of such companies except as otherwise in this section provided"

—and the exception is:

"That nothing herein shall be construed to release any such company from the payment of any amount agreed to be paid or required by law to be paid for any special privilege or franchise granted by any of the municipal authorities of this state."

The state Legislature, at the 1911 session passed an act to carry into effect the terms of this constitutional amendment (Stats. 1911, p. 530) in which it repeats the language of the Constitution, above quoted, and further declares that—

"the word 'municipal' as used in this act shall apply to incorporated towns and cities formed under article 11 of the Constitution of this state and to none other." Stats. 1911, p. 530; Stats. 1913, p. 3; Stats. 1915, p. 3.

A similar limitation of the word municipal in practically the same language, was adopted by the amendment of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 337; Pol. Code, § 3664a). This declaration of the Legislature limiting the application of the word "municipal" is merely in line with distinctions in the use of the term recognized in many decisions of this court. In re Werner, 129 Cal. 567, 62 Pac. 97; People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 489, 22 Pac. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 66; Sacramento County v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 164 Pac. 613; Turlock Irr. Dist. v. White (Cal. Sup.) 198 Pac. 1060.

Appellant argues that this reservation to cities and towns to the exclusion of other political agencies of the state, by the above-quoted provisions of the Constitution, of any payments required by law or contract to be paid for any special privilege or franchise, granted by municipal authority, takes the county from the operation of such reservation, and terminates the right to such franchise charge by counties.

[1, 2] It can hardly be questioned that the power of the state exists, whether by constitutional amendment or legislative enactment, to abrogate or alter the nature or amount of any charges for franchises in favor of municipalities or other political agencies of the state for public purposes, whether as taxes, licenses, or tolls. It is, of course, established law that the vested rights of an individual or corporation, under an executed franchise, are contractual, and that such rights cannot be impaired by any subsequent enactment of the state, under the contract clause of the federal Constitution, § 10, art. 1, forbidding the enactment by the states of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Matter of Russell, 163 Cal. 688, 126 Pac. 875, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 152; Russell v. Sebastian, 233 U. S. 195, 34 Sup. Ct. 517, 58 L. Ed. 912, L. R. A. 1918E, 882, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1282; City of Oakland v. Great Western Power Co., (Cal. Sup.) 200 Pac. 395.

[3] But the inhibition of this provision of the federal Constitution does not extend to the waiver or modification of any rights accruing to the agencies of the state in their governmental capacity by action of the people through constitutional amendments or by legislative enactment. Blanding v. Burr, 13 Cal. 343; 28 Cyc. 310; Creighton v. San Francisco, 42 Cal. 446; Beals v. Amador County, 35 Cal. 624.

Conceding, then, the power of the state to terminate the right of a county to enforce the collection of a percentage of the corporation's receipts under the franchise in question, and that the right of counties to continue to make such collections is not preserved by such proviso, does the tax amendment to the state Constitution and the legislation under it, effect that result?

[4] The answer is that the tax amendment and legislation thereunder is specifically directed and limited to the regulation of taxes and licenses, and the gross receipt charge under the Broughton Act is neither a tax nor a license, but is obviously a toll or charge, which the holder of the franchise undertakes to pay as part of the consideration, for the privilege of using the avenues and highways occupied by the public utility, just as it obligates itself to pay the amount of its cash offer as the highest bidder for the franchise.

It is purely a matter of contract. While it is true that the payment is required by law as a condition of the franchise grant, it is a matter of option with the applicant whether he will accept the franchise on those terms. His obligation to pay is not imposed by law but by his acceptance of the franchise.

Just why the matter of continuing in force the payment of "any amount agreed to be paid or required by law to be paid for any special privilege or franchise granted by any of the municipal authorities of the state" should have been incorporated in the tax amendment legislation, if such charge is not a tax or license, is a matter of speculation. But such reference cannot change or establish the nature of such charges. The exclusive right reserved by the state is confined to "taxes and licenses," and cannot be enlarged by a mere proviso referring to other classes of liabilities, and exempting them from the operation of the law. They were already exempted because not included.

It must be conceded that the respondent has apparently dealt with the percentage charge throughout its argument as a tax or license, and appellant contends that it cannot be otherwise considered consistently with respondent's claim to its percentage upon all the revenue collected in the county from defendant's system, whether arising from the use of the public highways or from defendant's private rights of way.

There is nothing, however, in such considerations to justify this court in refusing to determine the true nature of the obligation involved in the action. We are of the opinion that whatever right was acquired by the county of Tulare to a portion of the gross receipts of the defendant corporation by virtue of this franchise remains unimpaired.

Is the Broughton Act Void for Indefiniteness?—We come next to appellant's second point, that the provision for paying to the county of Tulare a percentage of the gross annual receipts "arising from the use, operation, or possession," of the easement in the public highways, is so obscure and uncertain as to be incapable of ascertainment.

[5] Without doubt, the Broughton Act contains inconsistencies and uncertainties, particularly in its enlarged application to counties. Earlier legislation along the same line was confined to strictly municipal corporations, and was enacted at a period when the public utilities in the nature of street railways and gas and electric systems were generally confined in their operations to the single municipal territory.

At the present time, such agencies commonly extend beyond the municipal limits, and frequently cover several counties with their lines and distributing systems. In the case before us, the defendant corporation has several electrical generating plants distributed over three or four counties, and with its lines of poles and wires extending in connecting systems throughout Tulare, Fresno, Kern, and perhaps other counties, with franchises over the public highways of each of said counties, and its electric current passing back and forth indiscriminately from one or the other of its power houses over the entire system.

It may happen that a power house is located many miles, and across intervening counties, from the territory of distribution to the consumer. Its conduit line may extend through an entire county, over a franchise for the use of a public highway, without delivery to a single customer. On the other hand, such generating plant may be within a few rods of the county line and use only so much of a county franchise as will carry its electric current to the adjoining county. Such generating plant may be just outside a municipal corporation, and distribute its entire product within such corporation. Its lines may extend for miles over private rights of way, not subject to franchise regulations, or may pass at frequent intervals from public highway to private easements and back again to highway, as in the instant case.

It may be readily seen that the adjustment of the payments arising under the various county and municipal franchises will raise serious complications as to what portion of the revenue accrues from any given franchise; and all we have to guide us is the provision of the statute that the payment required shall be two per cent. of the gross annual receipts of the holder of the franchise "arising from its use, operation, or possession."

There are other particulars in which it is extremely difficult to adjust the terms of the act in all cases to the fulfillment of its various purposes, particularly in carrying out the requirement that no condition shall be permitted which shall in any wise favor one person, firm, or corporation, as against another, in bidding for a franchise.

We are not concerned, however, in this case with any feature of the act, other than that which attempts to determine the measure for computing the source and amount of gross receipts from which the two per cent. payment is to be made. The defendant here admittedly holds and uses a franchise over 189.8 miles of the public highways of Tulare county; and is obligated to pay a certain per cent. of its annual gross income to such county, if we can ascertain under the statute what the gross income referred to is, and how it is to be estimated.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, in passing upon the validity of legislation substantially the same as the Broughton Act, which provided for a payment of a percentage of the gross receipts "derived from such occupation and use" of a highway franchise, in the case of State ex rel. Crow v. West Side State Railway Co., 146 Mo. 155, 47 S. W. 959, involving a use of the public roads for a railroad right of way, held that the act was void for uncertainty. The court says, as to the receipts "derived from such use and occupation," that (as under the Broughton Act):

"The provision is made equally applicable to each privilege or franchise mentioned. They are all placed upon the same footing and, under the act must be disposed of in the same way. The Legislature evidently intended to make no discrimination. It will be seen at a glance that it is utterly impossible to give this act any reasonable or sensible construction as applied to railroads. If it means that the company must pay at least two per cent. of its entire gross earnings * * * to each municipality, over whose streets it may be built, and to each county, whose highways it may cross, the railway company, in many instances, will be compelled to pay more than its total receipts for the right to build its road over the highways and through the cities along its way. If, as some of the counsel suggest, the percentage should be computed only upon the gross receipts of that part of the road located upon the streets of the city, or across the highways, as the case may be, then we are met by the fact that there is no method provided (if it is possible to suggest one), by which the actual gross receipts of that particular part of the road can be ascertained. Such receipts will not necessarily be in the same proportion to the entire earnings, as the length of the road upon the highways or streets may be to the entire length of such railroad. Travel may be greater or less upon one part of the road than upon another. Such a rule would be an arbitrary one, which the act has not prescribed, and which will not comply with its terms."

Other inconsistencies, which the court deems irreconcilable with the spirit and purpose of the act, are pointed out in this opinion, but we do not consider them important to the issue before us. It must be conceded that all these difficulties in fixing the amount to be charged to the holder of the franchise on a given and limited part of the highways used by the public utility, with others not there discussed, exist in this case. The gross receipts of this defendant accrue from two distinct agencies. One is the generating plants or power houses of the company, located in three separate counties; the other is the distributing system, consisting of poles and wires extending throughout the three counties, partly upon and over streets and highways and covered by various county and municipal franchises, and partly over private easements owned by the company.

The corporation's gross receipts, to refer to the language of the act, arise from "the use, operation, or possession," not alone of these franchises over the streets and highways, but likewise from the use, operation, or possession of the power houses and private rights of way. The two last named are not subject to any franchise charges, and the county or municipality is not entitled under the law to any part of the gross receipts attributable to these privately owned parts of the system. The percentage payment is not a tax upon the property of the corporation, nor a license charge for the privilege of operating its business. It is a compensation for the use of the portions of the highway covered by the franchise easement, and it is limited to a percentage of such total gross receipts as can be shown to have arisen from the use of the franchise.

It can no more be said that the receipts from electricity sold in the county of Tulare arise from the possession or use of the highways covered by the county franchise than from the possession or use of the private rights of way, or from the use of the connecting distributing lines through which the electric current is received from an adjoining county.

The absurdity of the position that any integral part of an electric distributing system like this is entitled to credit for the whole of the earnings from deliveries and sales in a given county or municipality, when a large part of such service is over parts of the system not subject to such franchise permit, may be shown by various illustrations.

Let us suppose that the only part of the system, which is in Tulare county, consists of a main transmission line upon a single highway traversing the entire width of the county, delivering no part of the current in that county, but carrying it for distribution and sale to an adjoining county. On the suggested theory, Tulare county obviously could not collect a cent of gross earnings, because there would be none in that county, yet, all of the electricity would be supplied through this main line. Assuming, again, that the electric supply was brought to the Tulare county border by a transmission line wholly without the county, and the entire current distributed to consumers in Tulare county through a system of wires wholly on private rights of way, clearly neither county could claim any gross receipts, for, in the one county, no revenue would arise from the conduit on the highway, and, in the other, no franchise would be owned or exercised.

If the electric plant is all within the borders of a single municipality and entirely distributed from transmission lines covered by the franchise, no complications can arise. The entire proportion of the earnings attributable to the transmission and delivery of electricity belongs to the gross receipts from which the two per cent. shall be paid. Immediately the operation of the business passes such limitation, the complications begin, if we treat the separate franchises as controlling the income from all electricity passing through the part of the system covered by such franchise. We may have a condition where the transmission line, merely crossing a street from the power house, under a franchise, to connect with privately owned rights of way over the rest of the county, would claim the same revenue from such franchise, as it would where the entire distributing system was maintained and operated over public highways.

A Practical Interpretation Possible.—Notwithstanding the difficulties suggested, we are of the opinion that there is an entirely practicable and consistent interpretation of this provision of the act, which will permit a fair determination and distribution of the prescribed percentage of receipts arising from the use, operation, or possession of each franchise utilized by the distributing system.

[6] It must be conceded that the purpose of the act was to impose only a two per cent.

charge upon the gross receipts arising from the entire franchise rights enjoyed in all the highways covered by the system, whether in one or several counties or municipalities. When the company or corporation has paid two per cent. of all its earnings properly attributable to all its franchises, whether covering one or more counties, it has fulfilled its obligation. It, of course, cannot concern such corporation how this amount is distributed to the various municipalities, so long as it is released from further liability. The real issue is as to the several rights of the municipalities in sharing the payments. The state is at liberty to make this distribution upon any reasonable basis it sees fit to adopt. It will be noticed that the act in question makes no reference to compensation for the franchise over public highways, from the revenues arising within the county by which the franchise was granted. If that had been the intention, the very obvious way of expressing it would have been to say "two per centum of the gross annual receipts within the county," instead of using the expression "two per centum of the gross annual receipts" arising from "the use, operation, or possession" of the franchise. The reasonable construction of the language used, is that each county or municipality is entitled to its percentage of the gross earnings arising from the use of its highway, in the proportion that the receipts arising from the use of such highways bear to the receipts attributable to all the rights of way of the entire system.

We see no reason why this cannot be estimated on a mileage basis. It may be assumed that the distributing system covers 600 miles of easements. The proportion of the gross receipts derived from and chargeable to the use of the distributing system should be credited to this entire mileage. One-third of this mileage may extend over private rights of way, which are not subject to any franchise liability. The remaining two-thirds of the mileage covered by county franchises is entitled to two-thirds of the two per cent. of the gross amount, and each county is entitled to the percentage of this two-thirds, in the proportion that the mileage of its franchises bears to the total mileage covered by all the franchises.

It may be argued that there is no authority under the law for such mileage apportionment. There is at least some analogy for this solution of the difficulty, by the terms of the act under consideration.

Section 4 makes the following provision:

"In case the franchise granted shall be an extension of an existing system of street railroad, then the gross receipts shall be estimated to be one-half of the proportion of the total gross receipts of said system which the mileage of such extension bears to the total mileage of the whole system, and such estimate shall be conclusive as to the amount of the gross receipts of said extension."

The effect of this provision is that, where a new franchise is granted to permit an extension of the lines of the street railway, the percentage to be charged under the new franchise shall be on a mileage basis. We are not concerned with the fact that the section quoted refers only to street railway franchises, and that it provides for a smaller percentage of gross receipts for the extension than for the original franchise. The significant point is that it determines the earning capacity of both franchises in proportion to their respective mileage.

Doubtless the reason that a special provision was made in the matter of an extension for street railways was to permit of a discrimination against the extension as to the proportion of gross receipts chargeable to it. Indeed, no provision at all is made in the act for other extension franchises. Such extensions are practically new franchises, standing on an equal footing, in the absence of such discrimination as is provided by section 4, and imposing an equal burden with the original franchise, proportionate to their mileage. So it may be assumed that, where one system of distribution receives contemporaneous franchise easements in several counties, these must have attributed to them equal earning powers in the matter of gross receipts, according to their respective mileage.

Such a determination of the earning capacity of the variously located franchise rights is doubtless more or less arbitrary, as, in many instances, a much less quantity of the water or gas or electricity is conveyed through one part of the system than another, just as, in the instance of a street railway, some parts of the line have much greater earning capacity than others. But since the state is dealing, in this phase of the matter, with the distribution of a fund among its own political subdivisions, any plan may be adopted consistent with substantial justice, and, when we are confronted with the fact that no other interpretation of the act can be made without unlawfully interfering with private rights of property, it must be assumed that the one method of distribution which could be made, and which is not repugnant to the terms of the act, was the one intended by the Legislature.

"A statute cannot be held void for uncertainty, if any reasonable and practical construction can be given to its language. Mere difficulty in ascertaining its meaning, or the fact that it is susceptible of different interpretations will not render it nugatory. Doubts as to its construction will not justify us in disregarding it." State v. West Side State Railway Co., supra; People v. Lovren, 119 Cal. 88, 51 Pac. 22, 638.

The legislation for carrying out the tax amendment of 1910 to the Constitution follows some such method of taxing the gross receipts of corporations, where such corporations are not operated wholly in this state. It is there provided (Stats. 1911, p. 530, § 2) that:

"When such companies are operating partly within and partly without this state, the gross receipts within this state shall be deemed to be all receipts * * * beginning and ending within this state, and a proportion based, upon the proportion of the mileage within the state to the entire mileage over which such business is done, of * * * all business passing through, into or out of this state."

That is, where all the earnings are attributable to the operation of the business within state lines, the percentage is assessed upon the whole thereof, but where such earnings arise from operation of the system partly without the state, and therefore in another jurisdiction, the tax will be levied in proportion to the amount of mileage of the system in the respective jurisdictions.

Carrying out the analogy, the county of Tulare may collect its two per cent. of all receipts of the electric company arising wholly from franchise easements within the county, and of the receipts contributed to by all other parts of the system, a proportion based upon the relative mileage of such franchises within the county to the entire mileage of the rights of way contributing to such gross receipts.

In other words, the obvious policy of this law is to treat the public utility in the entire territory occupied as a single entity, and to distribute to each franchise wherever situated its two per cent. of whatever portion of the gross receipts can be traced to its exclusive use, and as to all receipts arising from the indistinguishable use of all rights of way in the system, making the division in proportion to the respective mileage of the various parts.

It cannot be the purpose of the act to limit in its percentage receipts a municipality granting a franchise over its roads to such a corporation as this to gross revenue obtained in such municipality, first, because the statute itself does not bear such a construction, and, secondly, because, as has been pointed out, it might frequently occur under such interpretation, that a county granting the use of many miles of its roads would receive no return whatever from such franchise, because all of the gas or water or electricity is conveyed to and distributed and paid for in another county. On the other hand, the statute will not bear the interpretation that all the gross revenue, wherever received, to which the franchise contributes, shall be chargeable with the two per cent. payment under such franchise, for this might result in the collection of several such payments on the same receipts under various franchises.

In none of the cited decisions of this court, for the recovery of a percentage of gross receipts claimed under franchises for use and occupation of public highways by public utilities, was any question raised as to the method of determining what part of the gross receipts of the utility was attributable to any specified franchise. In Hanford v. Hanford Gas, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 749, 147 Pac. 969, no objection was made that the receipts sought to be recovered were not the product of the use in question. The point at issue was the claim of the corporation that, under its constitutional franchise to maintain its distributing system for light over the public streets, it could also, without further authority, distribute heat and power. In Town of Suisan City v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 35 Cal. App. 380, 170 Pac. 1078, the action was brought by the city to recover a percentage of gross receipts from a franchise for light and power purposes to one Prior, who had theretofore been distributing electricity for lighting purposes under the constitutional franchise. It was held that a grant by the city for lighting purposes was void and in conflict with the constitutional franchise, and that the obligation to pay two per cent. did not arise on the electricity distributed for lighting purposes. In City of Oakland v. Great Western Power Co., supra, the defendant company was operating over streets of the city, a system for the distribution of light, heat, and power. It was occupying the streets under the constitutional franchise for distribution of electricity for lighting. Subsequently, under the Broughton Act, it obtained a franchise for the distribution of heat and power, and still later acquired a blanket franchise from the city giving it the use of all the streets of the city for the distribution of electricity for all purposes. It was held, in the opinion, that the latter franchises did not supersede the preceding ones, and that the city of Oakland could recover nothing for the distribution of light under the constitutional franchise, could recover only the percentage allowed by the Broughton Act for the use of such streets as had been utilized for power and heat under that franchise, and could recover under the charter franchise for power and heat, only from such part of the system as had not been constructed under the Broughton franchise.

The significance of the Oakland Case, so far as it applies, upholds the conclusion we have reached in the instant case, that the rights of the municipality to its percentage under a given franchise are limited to the portion of the gross receipts attributable to that particular franchise.

It is true that the decision also holds that only the receipts from electricity delivered within the city of Oakland can be considered in determining such percentage, but it appears from the opinion that the charter under which the franchise sued on was issued, expressly limits the right of recovery to "the gross annual receipts resulting from the sale of electric energy delivered within the limits of the city of Oakland."

The Oakland Case suggests complications which do not arise in the case at bar, inasmuch as the charter franchise provides for a four per cent., and later a five per cent., payment to the city upon the gross receipts after the first five years, while the portion of the system operated under the Broughton Act is only liable for two per cent. of such gross receipts as arise from the exercise of that franchise. But one distributing system is in use, covering all of the territory, and whether an apportionment of the gross earnings at the different percentages could be made on a proportionate mileage basis, which would protect the rights of the corporation may be questioned. We fail to see, though, any other method which would be at all feasible. However, we are not confronted with such a contingency in this case. The entire distributing system here is under the Broughton Act, and the only parties concerned in the distribution of the percentage payments are the respective municipalities granting franchises. A distribution of the payments according to the relative mileage can be had within the fair intentment of the act.

The city of Dinuba, within the county of Tulare, was a claimant for a part of the franchise percentage and was made a party defendant. No appeal was taken from the judgment adverse to its claim, so a consideration of its rights in the premises is not involved.

Under the conclusions herein reached, the proper action against the defendant corporation is by way of an accounting, to which the defendant and all municipalities, under whose franchises this distributing system is operated, are necessary parties, in order to determine the entire liability of the defendant, and the proportion of the two per cent. payment to which each franchise is entitled.

The first step in this accounting should be to determine, as a question of fact, what proportion of the total annual gross receipts of the public utility should be justly accredited to its distributing system over various rights of way, as distinguished from its power plants or other producing agencies. This will establish the fund from which the percentage of earnings "arising from the use, operation, or possession" of the various franchise easements shall be ascertained.

The percentage of this fund, to be apportioned to the respective public franchises, will not include the proportion of such gross receipts of the distributing system as are attributable to the use of private rights of way occupied by the utility, as such part of the system is not subject to franchise charge. Each municipal franchise will be entitled to its two per cent. of whatever portion of such fund can be shown to arise wholly from the use of the easements under such franchise, and such portion of the remaining fund, as the mileage of the given franchise easement bears to the entire mileage of the distributing system contributing to such gross earnings.

We have adopted this appropriation to the various rights of way, according to mileage, not necessarily as an exclusive method of distribution of the gross receipts, but as a practicable one, where the contribution of the various franchise easements to the gross earnings cannot be otherwise determined. There may be portions of the distributing system where the entire transmission from the producing plant to the consumer is supplied through a given franchise, or is entirely supplied over private easements. Such earnings would inure to such specific franchises or easements. There may be instances where the extent or value of the distributing system over a given right of way may indicate its earning capacity; or where the service of lateral lines may be differentiated from that of main conduits in the value of their use of the easements. In such cases these conditions should be taken into account. But where, as will often happen, contribution to the earnings of the various rights of way is general and indistinguishable, we can see no reason why the proportionate mileage basis should not be used in apportioning the statutory percentage of gross receipts.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, in accordance with the conclusions herein stated.

188 Cal. 701

In re COLLINS. (Cr. 1497.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 8, 1922.
Rehearing Denied June 5, 1922.)

1. Attorney and client —39—Legislature may prescribe conviction of crime involving moral turpitude as sufficient for denial or revocation of attorney's license.

The right or privilege of exercising the vocation of attorney and counselor at law is one which the Legislature may bestow or empower the judicial department to bestow, on terms consistent with the nature and purpose of the right or privilege, and the Legislature may prescribe the possession of good moral character as a prerequisite and prescribe that conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude is sufficient ground for denying application or revoking license.

2. Attorney and client —53(2)—Constitutional law —55—Legislature may provide that conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude shall revoke attorney's license and that record of conviction shall be conclusive.

The Legislature may provide that a conviction of a crime shall ipso facto work a revocation of the right or privilege of such person to continue to act as an attorney and counselor at law, and that the record of conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude shall constitute conclusive evidence thereof for the purpose of striking such attorney's name from the rolls.

3. Constitutional law —306—Provision for disbarment on record of conviction of crime involving moral turpitude does not deprive of right to practice without due process.

A convicted attorney had his day in court when put to trial for the offense, and his disbarment on the record of conviction does not deprive him of his right to practice without due process of law for, while Code Civ. Proc. §§ 287-292, provide for an order for hearing and for notice to the accused of the time and place thereof when the proceeding is under section 287 subds. 2, 3, or 4, no order is required under subdivision 1 relating to disbarment on conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude, and the attorney is bound to know that the legal consequence of his conviction is disbarment.

In Bank.

In the matter of the disbarment of George D. Collins. On application for revocation of order of disbarment on record of conviction of felony. Application denied.

George D. Collins, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

Wm. Denman and C. J. Goodell, both of San Francisco, for Bar Ass'n.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner herein applies for an order vacating and setting aside a former order of this court made on July 19, 1909, striking from the roll of attorneys and counselors the name of said petitioner. It appears, from the face of the moving papers and also of the records of this court, that the action of the court in making said order was taken upon the receipt by it of a certified copy of the record of the conviction of the petitioner of a felony involving moral turpitude; and it also affirmatively appears that said action was taken by the court and said order made by it ex parte and without the service upon the petitioner of any order to show cause, citation, or other process or notice. The present contention of the petitioner, which forms the ground of his said motion, is that the said order thus made was and ever since has been and still is void; that this court did not acquire or have jurisdiction to make said order and that, by the making of the same without notice or other process served upon him, he has been deprived of his liberty and property without due process of law and has been denied the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the federal Constitution.

The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, pursuant to which the order thus assailed was made, are sections 287, 288, 289, and 299 thereof, which, when the order was made, read, in part, as follows:

"Sec. 287. An attorney and counselor may be removed or suspended by the Supreme Court * * * for either of the following causes, arising after his admission to practice: 1. His conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in which case the record of conviction shall be conclusive evidence."

"Sec. 288. In case of the conviction of an attorney or counselor of a felony or misdemeanor, involving moral turpitude, the clerk of the court in which such conviction is had shall, within, thirty days thereafter, transmit to the Supreme Court a certified copy of the record of conviction."

"Sec. 289. The proceedings to remove or suspend an attorney and counselor, under the first subdivision of section two hundred and eighty-seven, must be taken by the court on the receipt of a certified copy of the record of conviction."

"Sec. 299. Upon conviction, of cases arising under the first subdivision of section two hundred and eighty-seven, the judgment of the court must be that the name of the party shall be stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors of the court, and that he be precluded from practicing as such attorney or counselor in all the courts of this state."

It will be seen from a reading of these sections of the Code that no express provision is made for procedure or for notice or other process to be served upon the person whose record of conviction of a felony involving moral turpitude has been filed in this court, prior to, or as a prerequisite to, the making of such an order as in this case was made. It has been held by this court, in the case of Barnes v. District Court, etc., 178 Cal. 500, 173 Pac. 1100, that the provisions of sections 290 and 291 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring a specified procedure in certain proceedings for disbarment, refer only to those provisions of section 289 of said Code which apply exclusively to proceedings to disbar or suspend under the second, third, and fourth subdivisions of section 287 of the said Code, but have no application to subdivision 1 thereof. It would seem to be the clear intentment of that portion of the said provisions of the Code which render the record of conviction conclusive evidence of the fact that no such notice should be required. Said order having been made in strict accordance with the said provisions of the Code above quoted and of this interpretation of their meaning, it follows that the assault which the petitioner makes by this motion upon the order of the court is in effect an attack upon the foregoing provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure as thus interpreted and applied, upon the ground that they are unconstitutional, for the reasons above stated by him. It is contended by the petitioner that the vocation of an attorney and counselor at law and the right or privilege of the exercising the same, like the right to practice any profession, is property which is protected by the federal Constitution from deprivation without due process of law, citing, in support of said contention, Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 592, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 Pac. 965; Shackleton v. McElhinney, 241 Mo. 592, 145 S. W. 1139; In re Boone (C. C.) 83 Fed. 944; Ex parte Steinman, 95 Pa. 237, 40 Am. Rep. 637.

[1] It may be admitted that the right or privilege of exercising the vocation of attorney and counselor at law is a valuable right or privilege, but it must also be conceded that it is a right or privilege which the Legislature had the power to bestow, or to empower the judicial department of the state government to bestow, upon such terms as would be consistent with the nature and purpose of the right or privilege to be exercised; and that, this being so, the Legislature had the undoubted right to prescribe the possession of a good moral character in the applicant, for the grant of the right or privilege of entering and of exercising the legal profession, and also, of necessity, to prescribe the continued possession of such good moral character in the individual receiving such grant. It requires no argument to prove that the possession of this prerequisite to the receipt of and continued exercising of the right or privilege of engaging in the practice of the law is a matter of such paramount public interest as to entirely justify the Legislature in prescribing that the commission of crime involving moral turpitude, by one either seeking to obtain this right or privilege or thereafter exercising it, should constitute sufficient ground for its original denial or for its subsequent revocation. In the case of Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 18 Sup. Ct. 573, 42 L. Ed. 1002, the Supreme Court of the United States, in passing upon the validity of a statute of the state of New York providing that "any person who, * * * after conviction of a felony, shall attempt to practice medicine, or shall so practice, * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," went exhaustively into the subject of the powers of the Legislature in this regard. In sustaining the validity of such a statute, the court said:

"We must look at the substance and not the form, and the statute should be regarded as though it in terms declared that one who had violated the criminal laws of the state should be deemed of such bad character as to be unfit to practice medicine, and that the record of a trial and conviction should be conclusive evidence of such violation. All that is embraced in these propositions is condensed into the single clause of the statute, and it means that and nothing more. The state is not seeking to further punish a criminal, but only to protect its citizens from physicians of bad character. The vital matter is not the conviction tion, but the violation of law. The former is merely the prescribed evidence of the latter."

It is true that, in the above case, the main assault upon the New York statute was made upon the ground that it was an ex post facto law, but, notwithstanding this fact, the broad language and clear reasoning of this high court has application to the general subject of the disbarment from practice of those committing crimes involving moral turpitude. In the course of the foregoing decision, the Supreme Court of the United States quotes approvingly from its earlier decision in the case of Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 27 L. Ed. 552, in which the power of the court to deal with attorneys violating criminal laws was under consideration. The court in this earlier case saying:

"It is laid down in all the books in which the subject is treated, that a court has power to exercise a summary jurisdiction over its attorneys to compel them to act honestly towards their clients, and to punish them by fine and imprisonment for misconduct and contempts, and, in gross cases of misconduct, to strike their names from the roll. If regularly convicted of a felony, an attorney will be struck off the roll, as of course, whatever the felony may be, because he is rendered infamous. If convicted of a misdemeanor which imports fraud or dishonesty, the same course will be taken. He will also be struck off the roll for gross malpractice or dishonesty in his profession. * * * Where an attorney was convicted of theft, and the crime was condoned by burning in the hand, he was nevertheless struck from the roll. 'The question is,' said Lord Mansfield, 'whether, after the conduct of this man, it is proper that he should continue a member of a profession which should stand free from all suspicion. * * * It is not by way of punishment; but the courts in such cases exercise their discretion whether a man whom they have formerly admitted is a proper person to be continued on the roll or not.'"

[2, 3] It will thus appear that the Supreme Court of the United States has, in these cases, definitely held that the Legislature has power to provide that the conviction of a person of a crime, who had prior thereto been given the right or privilege of engaging in the practice of either of said learned professions, should, ipso facto, work a revocation of his right or privilege to lawfully continue so to do. If the Legislature thus possesses this plenitude of power in respect to those members of such professions who have been convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude, it may not be contended that the Legislature has not also the power to provide that the record of such conviction shall constitute conclusive evidence of the fact of such conviction, for the purpose of having stricken from the rolls of such profession the name of the person who has been thus convicted of such a crime. "The vital matter," as was aptly said in Hawker v. New York, supra, "is not the conviction but the violation of law. The former is merely the prescribed evidence of the latter." In this view of the matter the essential fact, working a deprivation of the petitioner's right and privilege of continuing in the practice of his profession, was not his conviction of a crime, nor was it the order of this court made automatically upon the receipt of the record of such conviction, but it was his violation of the law in the commission of said crime; and as to that he had his day in court when he was put to trial for and convicted of the commission of such crime. This is the view taken by the New York courts in construing a statute similar to our own and from which the provisions of our own Code were originally taken. As is stated by the Supreme Court of New York, in the case of In re Lindheim, 195 App. Div. 827, 187 N. Y. Supp. 211:

"The provisions of our judiciary law above cited are mandatory in case of a conviction for a felony, and upon such conviction the result prescribed follows automatically, and upon presentation of the facts to the court the prescribed order must be made."

A similar view is expressed by this court in the case of In re Riccardi, 182 Cal. 675, 189 Pac. 694, wherein the court says:

"It has always been understood that conviction of an attorney of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, made disbarment incumbent, without any discretion in this court to give other judgment. And this, we think, must be so, in view of section 299 of the Code of Civil Procedure which prescribes exactly the judgment to be given in such a case, viz., 'that the name of the party shall be stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors of the court, and that he be precluded from practicing as such attorney or counselor in all the courts of this state,' while in other cases the judgment 'may be according to the gravity of the offense charged; deprivation of the right to practice * * * permanently, or for a limited period.' We do not see how the Legislature could have more clearly expressed its determination that the only penalty in such a case is permanent disbarment. And certainly it would not be a wise rule that would invest the court with discretionary power in a matter where the sole evidence upon which it acts is a certified copy of a record of conviction."

In the case of In re Shepard, 35 Cal. App. 492, 170 Pac. 442, the precise question involved in this proceeding arose, and, in passing upon the same the District Court of Appeal said:

"It is insisted that this court had no jurisdiction to remove Shepard's name from the roll of attorneys without notice. * * * Under these sections, proceedings for removal or suspension are divided into two classes. The first of these includes, alone, proceedings based upon convictions of felonies or misdemeanors, involving moral turpitude. The second class includes two subclasses, first, those proceedings to be taken for matters within the knowledge of the court, and, second, those which may be taken upon the information of another. Certainly it appears to us, whether notice is required in proceedings under both subclasses of the second class or whether it is not, it is clear that no notice is required in proceedings of the first class."

It cannot, therefore, be said that the plaintiff has been deprived of his right to practice without due process of law. Sections 289, 290, 291, and 292 of the Code of Civil Procedure provide for an order for hearing and for a notice to the accused of the time and place thereof, when the proceeding is under the second, third, or fourth subdivisions of section 287. But with regard to a disbarment under subdivision one, no notice or order is required or provided for. The only notice which the accused attorney is to have under that subdivision is that which he receives on the trial of the criminal charge of which he has been convicted. The law informs him that one of the results of his conviction will be his subsequent disbarment, in the manner provided by the Code of Civil Procedure. This answers the constitutional requirement that he shall have due process of law before he can be deprived of his right to practice. The entire matter is involved in the criminal proceeding. The same point arose in the case of In re Bloor, 21 Mont. 49, 52 Pac. 779, under a statute taken bodily from our own Code provisions and in which the court said:

"We believe no complaint or accusation in writing is necessary where an attorney and counselor has been convicted of a felony, or a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, and where the record of conviction has been duly certified to this court. We also think that it is not necessary to issue or serve any citation upon an attorney or counselor, of proceedings to disbar him, where he has been convicted of a felony, or a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, and where the record of his conviction has been duly certified to this court before this court acts, where such record is the basis of the disbarment proceedings. It is the bounden duty of such attorney, so convicted, to know that the legal consequence of his conviction is his disbarment. There is no discretion in the Supreme Court, for it must proceed, under section 418 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on receipt of a certified copy of the record of conviction; and by section 402, Id., the record of conviction is conclusive evidence."

In the later cases of In re Sutton, 50 Mont. 91, 145 Pac. 6, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1223, and In re Thresher, 54 Mont. 475, 170 Pac. 1163, the foregoing language from the earlier decision of that court is cited with approval. It will be noted that, while the petitioner herein has cited copiously cases referring to the right and privilege of an attorney to exercise his vocation as a valuable personal and property right, he has referred us to no case holding that, after conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude, an attorney is entitled to any further notice or process prior to the entry of an order of court, based upon the record of such conviction, and which record is, by the express terms of the statutes, made conclusive evidence of the fact of the commission of such crime and of his conviction thereof. Such being the state of the authorities and the terms of the statute, we are constrained to hold that there is no merit in the petitioner's contention.

The application is denied.

CHEESMAN v. HANBY, Justice of the Peace, et al. (L. A. 6862.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 11, 1922.
Rehearing Denied June 8, 1922.)

Justices of the peace ⇨ 163—Stay bond necessary to supersedeas on appeal on both law and facts.

Code Civ. Proc. § 978, requiring a bond on appeal from a justice of the peace in double the amount of the judgment to make the appeal operate as a supersedeas, when construed in the light of the history of similar legislation showing that a supersedeas bond was required before any distinction was made between appeal on questions of law only and appeal on questions of law and fact, which requirement was continued without substantial change after that distinction was recognized, requires a supersedeas bond to make an appeal on both the law and the facts operate as a stay of execution, notwithstanding the rule that such an appeal vests jurisdiction of the entire case in the superior court.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Emmett D. Cheesman against J. Walter Hanby, as Justice of the Peace of Los Angeles Township, and others, to enjoin enforcement of a judgment. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fletcher Bowron, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, Roy W. Dowds, Deputy Co. Counsel, H. G. Bittleston and N. B. Nelson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. A judgment was rendered against the appellant in the justice's court presided over by the respondent, J. Walter Hanby, for the sum of $74.67. She gave notice of appeal to the superior court on both the law and the facts, and gave a bond for costs in the sum of $100. She gave no bond for a stay of proceedings as required by section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and claims that no such bond is necessary when the appeal is on both the law and the facts. An execution was issued on the judgment by the justice of the peace after the appeal was taken and levied upon a claim of $20.19 due the appellant. Thereupon the appellant brought this action in the superior court to enjoin the respondent justice of the peace and the respondent constable from enforcing the judgment. The superior court denied the appellant's prayer for an injunction, and she takes this appeal from that judgment.

It is conceded that, if the appeal had been on the questions of law alone the execution of the judgment would not be stayed without a stay bond in double the amount of the judgment. Rushton v. Reeve, 178 Cal. 199, 172 Pac. 608. Section 978, Code of Civil Procedure, makes no distinction between the two methods of appeal and the appellant's contention is wholly based upon the theory that by an appeal on the law and the facts, jurisdiction over the entire case is vested in the superior court, and hence the justice of the peace is no longer empowered to issue or enforce an execution. This contention is based in part upon the reasoning of the court in Bullard v. McArdle, 98 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 193, 35 Am. St. Rep. 176, and upon the statement of appellant's contention in the opinion in the case of Rushton v. Reeve, supra. With reference to the decision in Bullard v. McArdle, supra, it is sufficient to say that the court was dealing with a case in which both a cost bond and a stay bond had been given, and the effect of such an appeal upon the judgment in the justice's court, while the question in Rushton v. Reeve, supra, was as to the effect upon the justice's court judgment of an order of the superior court dismissing an appeal where a cost bond only had been given upon the appeal upon a question of law alone. The language of the Code with reference to the giving of bonds on appeal seems too clear to justify any extended discussion. It provides that an appeal "is not effectual for any purpose" unless an undertaking be filed for the payment of costs on the appeal, and (see McConky v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 83), if a stay of proceedings be claimed, in a sum equal to twice the amount of the judgment, including costs, when the judgment is for the payment of money, etc. This language is clearly equivalent to a statement that the enforcement of the judgment is not stayed unless a stay bond as specified is given.

This construction was placed on a similar provision of the Code of Idaho by the Supreme Court of that state. Wilson v. Doyle, 12 Idaho, 295, 85 Pac. 928.

The Legislative history of section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure also points to this construction. In 1850 the Legislature in "An act to regulate proceedings in courts of justices of the peace in civil cases," passed April 10, 1850 (Stats. 1850, pp. 179, 186), provided for a stay bond upon appeals from the judgment of a justice of the peace in section 74 of such law as follows:

"No appeal shall operate as a supersedeas to any execution issued on the judgment, unless the defendant shall file with the justice a bond, with two sufficient sureties to be approved by such justice, in a penalty double the amount of the judgment, inclusive of interest and costs, payable to the appellee, conditioned that the appellant will prosecute his appeal to effect, or that failing therein, he will pay and satisfy such judgment as may be rendered against him by the county clerk. In the absence of the appellant, such bond may be signed by his sureties alone."

Section 75 of that statute (Stats. 1850, p. 186) provided for a cost bond as follows:

"An appeal may be taken by any party, upon filing with the justice a bond to the appellee, with surety to be approved by the justice, conditioned for the payment of the costs of the appeal; but in such case the appeal shall not have the effect to stay execution."

Such appeals were made upon statements of the case and other papers (Stats. 1850, p. 186, §§ 73, 77) but the case was tried anew in the county court (Stats. 1850, c. 84, pp. 203, 204, § 4) as is now done in appeals upon both law and fact (section 976, Code Civ. Proc.). In 1851 the Legislature revised the laws relating to practice in courts of justice, enacting the Practice Act (Stats. 1851, p. 51), which is the basis of our Code of Civil Procedure. Under this act an appeal from the justice's court was taken by the aggrieved party (Stats. 1851, p. 51, §§ 624, 625, 626, p. 150). Section 628 of this act (Stats. 1851, pp. 51, 150) is substantially the same as section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but prohibited the justice from transmitting the papers to the county court unless a cost bond of $100 was filed, "or if a stay of proceedings be claimed," a bond in twice the amount of the judgment and costs, instead of providing as in section 978, Code of Civil Procedure, that the appeal should be "ineffectual for any purpose" if such bonds were not given. Upon the appeal the court could reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment of the justice's court, or, "if necessary or proper, order a new trial." Stats. 1851, pp. 51, 110, § 367. In 1853 sections 626, 627, and 628 of the Practice Act were amended so that the justice was required to transmit the papers when an appeal was taken (section 19 amending section 627, Stats. 1853, pp. 276, 280), and section 628 was amended to provide for bonds, and provided in the language of section 978, Code of Civil Procedure, that the appeal should not be effectual for any purpose "unless an undertaking be filed," etc. That amendment repealed the requirement of section 625 for a statement of the case (Stats.

1853, pp. 276, 280, § 17), and section 366 of the Practice Act was amended to read "There may be tried anew in the county court, judgments in all civil cases rendered by justices', recorders' and mayors' courts." Stats. 1853, pp. 276, 277, § 7 amending section 366 of the Practice Act. In 1854 the distinction between appeals on questions of law and fact was first introduced by amendments to the Practice Act (Stats. 1854, pp. 59, 70, § 54, amending section 624, section 55 amending section 625). The amendments provided for a trial anew when the appeal was on questions of fact or both law and fact (Stats. 1854, pp. 59, 70, § 56, amending section 626), but when taken on questions of law alone it was to be heard on a statement of the case (Stats. 1854, pp. 59, 66, § 38 amending section 366), although if it appeared necessary upon the hearing of the appeal a new trial might be had where the appeal was on questions of law alone (Stats. 1854, pp. 59, 66, § 39 amending section 367). The object of the provision for an appeal on questions of law alone was to obviate the expense of a new trial in the appellate court where the facts were not in dispute. People ex rel. Hitchcock v. Freelon, 8 Cal. 517. These provisions of the law have remained substantially the same since 1854, excepting that in 1860 section 628 (corresponding to section 978, Code of Civil Procedure) was amended to make provisions for the form of stay bond where the judgment appealed from was for the recovery of personal property, etc. (Stats. 1860, pp. 298, 305, § 30, amending section 628).

Without setting forth in further detail the various statutory changes regulating appeals from a justice's court, it is sufficient for present purposes to point out that the requirement of a stay bond in substantially its present form was enacted before the distinction was drawn between appeals from a justice's court on the law and on both law and facts (Stats. 1853, pp. 276, 280, § 20 amending section 628 of the Practice Act, supra), and when all appeals from the justice's court resulted in a trial anew (Stats. 1853, pp. 276, 277, § 7 amending section 366 of the Practice Act, supra); and that such requirement was continued in substantially unaltered form after the distinction between the two methods of appeal was introduced in 1854 (Stats. 1854, pp. 59, 70, supra).

It is clear from this legislative history that there was no intention on the part of the Legislature to require a stay bond in cases of appeal on questions of law alone, and not in cases of appeal on both law and facts. There seems no room for doubt from the terms of the Code (section 978, Code Civ. Proc.) and from its legislative history that a stay bond is essential to prevent the enforcement of a justice's court judgment pending an appeal, but if this were a matter of doubt these provisions have been so construed for nearly three-quarters of a century, and this practical and long continued construction should not be overturned.

The justice's court, in the absence of a stay bond, had power to enforce the judgment by execution, and for that purpose to require the defendant to submit to an examination on supplemental proceedings. The point that the claim levied upon by the respondent constable is exempt from execution is not seriously pressed.

Judgment affirmed.

In re TETSUBUMI YANO'S ESTATE.
(Sac. 3191.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 1, 1922.
Rehearing Denied May 29, 1922.)

1. Guardian and ward ⚡10, 13(4)—Father is ordinarily entitled to custody and is presumed competent.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1751, the father of a minor under 14 years is entitled, as a matter of right, to the guardianship of such minor, unless shown to be incompetent, and competency is presumed and should be so found by the court, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

2. Guardian and ward ⚡10—Preferential right of father applies to guardianship of estate.

The preferential right of a father to the guardianship exists as to guardianship of the estate as well as to guardianship of the person, which latter scarcely needs the protection of Code Civ. Proc. § 1751, in view of Civ. Code, § 197, making the parent the natural guardian and entitled to the custody of the person of the minor child, except as to circumstances set out in section 246, subd. 4.

3. Citizens ⚡3—Infants ⚡22—Native-born Japanese infant can take property.

A native-born child of Japanese parents is an American citizen and as such entitled to acquire and hold property, real and personal, and her infancy did not incapacitate her from becoming seized of the title to real estate.

4. Deeds ⚡194(4)—Acceptance of beneficial deed will be presumed.

Delivery to an infant and acceptance by him will be presumed, when a deed is clearly beneficial to him.

5. Deeds ⚡194(5)—Recording is sufficient delivery to infant.

When a deed, clearly beneficial to an infant, is given to him, his acceptance will be presumed, and the recording of the deed is sufficient delivery.

6. Aliens ⚡6(2)—Conveyance to disqualified alien transfers title until divested by state or inquisition had.

Alien Land Act 1913, by its provision that action shall be brought by the state for the escheat of any land conveyed to aliens in contravention of the act, recognizes the general rule that a conveyance to an alien, disqualified to hold real estate, transfers the title to such alien until the same is divested by the state, or by inquisition had upon its denouncement.

7. Guardian and ward ⚡13(1)—Extent of property right of qualified infant cannot be determined in proceedings to appoint guardian.

Whether a conveyance of property to an infant, who is a native-born citizen, made at the direction of her father, who was disqualified to hold land under Alien Land Act 1913, transferred title to the infant in view of the father's purpose, is a question which cannot be decided in proceedings for the appointment of the guardian of the infant, since she is entitled to a guardian to represent her in the settlement of that issue.

8. Aliens ⚡7—Payment of consideration by disqualified alien for conveyance to one qualified to hold title does not establish trust.

Payment by an alien, disqualified to hold land, for land conveyed to his daughter, who was a native-born citizen, does not establish a trust in the father's favor under Civ. Code, § 853, since the law will not imply a trust in favor of an alien prohibited from holding the lands, and a trust in favor of such alien would be unenforceable under Alien Land Act 1913.

9. Aliens ⚡7—Disqualified alien can procure conveyance of land to native-born child.

An alien disqualified to hold land can secure a conveyance of land to his minor daughter, who was a native-born citizen and therefore entitled to acquire and own real estate, though the conveyance was made to her confessedly because the laws did not permit the alien to buy the land for himself.

10. Guardian and ward ⚡10—Alien disqualified to own land may be guardian in absence of statute.

Initiative Alien Property Act 1920, disqualifying an alien, who cannot acquire land because he cannot acquire citizenship, from acting as guardian of a ward who owns land, recognizes that an alien Japanese was not disqualified, merely by his alienage, from qualifying as a guardian prior to the enactment of that statute.

11. Guardian and ward ⚡10—Initiative act prohibiting guardianship by alien did not apply to prior proceedings.

Initiative Alien Property Act 1920, which took effect December 9, 1920, did not apply to proceedings for the appointment of a Japanese as guardian, where the order refusing the appointment was made on November 6, 1920, in view of section 12 of the act, which declares that it shall not affect pending actions or proceedings.

12. Treaties ⚡8—Treaty with Japan does not secure to Japanese the right to be guardian of his own child.

The treaty between the United States and Japan, which gives to the citizens or subjects of each, in the territory of the other, protection and security for their persons and property, does not protect the right of a Japanese subject residing in this country to be appointed as guardian of his minor child, who was a native-born citizen of the United States, since the denial of such privilege would not endanger the person of the parent or jeopardize his property.

13. Treaties ⚡13—Native-born child of Japanese parent cannot invoke protection of treaty with Japan.

A native-born child of Japanese parents, residing in this country, being a citizen of the United States, cannot invoke the clauses of the treaty with Japan, protecting the property of Japanese subjects in this country.

14. Constitutional law ⚡210—Guardian and ward ⚡10—Statute, depriving resident Japanese of right to guardianship over estate of his child, denies equal protection of the laws.

Initiative Alien Property Act 1920, § 4, forbidding the appointment as guardian, of any alien not eligible to citizenship, with respect to property of the minor which the alien cannot acquire for himself, denies to the alien the equal protection of the laws which Const. U. S. art. 14, § 1, secures to all persons, including aliens, and which pledges the protection of equal laws, since it deprives such alien of the privilege given by Code Civ. Proc. § 1751, entitling a father to preference for appointment as guardian of his minor child, unless he is incompetent.

15. Constitutional law ⚡211—Ineligibility to citizenship is not reason for classification, with respect to right to act as guardian.

Though the clause of Const. U. S. art. 14, § 1, guaranteeing equal protection of the laws, does not prevent classification based upon some reasonable difference in the circumstances, it does prevent arbitrary classification, and the fact that an alien cannot acquire citizenship forms no reasonable basis for classification, with respect to the right of a parent to be appointed as guardian of his minor child.

16. Constitutional law ⚡205(2), 206(1)—Denial of right of father to act as guardian of his child invalid as to native-born citizen.

Initiative Alien Property Act 1920, § 4, providing that an alien shall not be appointed guardian, with respect to the estate of a minor, in lands, the title to which he could not acquire, violates Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. Cal. art. 1, § 21, prohibiting special privileges or immunities to a citizen, or class of citizens, when applied to the father of a citizen, since it deprives such citizen of the rights under Code Civ. Proc. § 1751, giving the father of every minor the preferential right to be guardian of the minor, unless incompetent, and section 1748, giving a minor over 14 the right to nominate a guardian.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

In the matter of the estate and guardianship of Tetsubumi Yano, a minor. On petition of Hayao Yano for letters of guardianship. Petition denied, and petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied in bank; LAWLOR, J., dissenting.

Algernon Crofton, of San Francisco, and Chas. A. Wetmore, Jr., of Marysville (Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Albert H. Elliot and Guy C. Calden, both of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by Hayao Yano, an alien Japanese, from an order of the superior court of Sutter county, denying him letters of guardianship of the person and estate of his minor daughter, Tetsubumi.

The petition for guardianship was filed October 23, 1920, and alleged that petitioner was the father of said minor daughter; that she was of the age of two years; that she had estate in Butte county, consisting of 14 acres of land, more or less, and that she was in the care and custody of petitioner and his wife, the mother of said minor, who were her only relatives in said county of Sutter.

It was made to appear on the hearing, by undisputed evidence, that the petitioner was a Japanese and not a citizen of the United States or the state of California; that he was and had been for several years a resident of California; that he was of good character, a good father, sober and industrious; that the minor was his daughter, aged between two and three years, and a native-born citizen of the United States and the state of California; that she had no guardian, and held title to 14 acres of improved land in Butte county of the value of $3,000 or thereabouts, which required care and cultivation.

[1] Under this state of facts the petitioner was entitled to letters of guardianship, unless the fact of his being a Japanese alien defeated his right.

It is settled law in this state that the father of a minor under the age of 14 years, is entitled, as a matter of right, under the provisions of the Codes to the guardianship of such minor, unless shown to be incompetent. Competency is presumed and should be so found by the court, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Code Civ. Proc. § 1751; Matter of Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 123 Pac. 283; In re Mathews' Estate, 169 Cal. 26, 145 Pac. 503; Id., 174 Cal. 679, 164 Pac. 8; In re Galleher, 2 Cal. App. 364, 84 Pac.

352; Estate of Moore, 179 Cal. 302, 176 Pac. 461; Guardianship of Person and Estate of Akers, 184 Cal. 514, 194 Pac. 706.

[2] The Code makes no distinction as to this preferential right to letters of guardianship between guardianship of the person and guardianship of the estate. The last above-cited expression of the rule of the statute involved guardianship of both person and estate. Indeed, the parents' right to letters of guardianship of the person of a minor child scarcely needs the protection of section 1751, Code of Civil Procedure, as such parent is by law the natural guardian and entitled to the custody of the person of a minor child. Civ. Code, § 197; In re Hunt, 103 Cal. 355, 37 Pac. 206. The mere fact, if such were shown, that the minor would receive better care, training, and support, and be under better influences under other guardianship, cannot defeat the right of the parent to letters, except under the circumstances set out in subdivision 4 of section 246 of the Civil Code. In re Mathews, supra. No such showing was made here. There was no finding of incompetency and no evidence which would have justified such finding.

The sole ground for denying the petition, as appears from the record, is contained in the statement of the court refusing letters to the petitioner as follows:

"The guardianship is denied. It appears that the child had no property. The property or deed was taken in the child's name, solely to evade the laws of the state of California."

It appears from the transcript that, subsequent to the Alien Land Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 206), denying the right to acquire real estate to aliens disqualified to become citizens, and about a year prior to the Initiative Act of 1920 (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii), which adds the further disqualification of such alien to act as guardian of a minor, for property which the alien himself is incompetent to acquire under the act, the petitioner bargained for, and caused to be conveyed to his daughter, the minor named in this proceeding, the tract of land referred to in the petition. The deed was introduced in evidence, showing the conveyance by the grantors directly to the minor. The petitioner testified that he had the land deeded to his infant daughter because he was Japanese and could not take title himself; that his baby was a citizen of the United States; and that he had the land conveyed to her for that reason alone.

[3] The ruling of the court in this matter cannot be sustained on the ground stated in the order, that the minor took no title to the property. She was a native-born American citizen and as such entitled to acquire and hold property, real and personal. Her infancy did not incapacitate her from becoming seized of the title to real estate. 22 Cyc., 527, 529; Masterson v. Cheek, 23 Ill.

72; Scanlan v. Wright, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 523, 25 Am. Dec. 344.

[4, 5] Delivery to, and acceptance by, an infant will be presumed. When a deed clearly beneficial to an infant is given to him, his acceptance will be presumed, and the recording of the deed is a sufficient delivery. 22 Cyc. 529; Masterson v. Cheek, supra; Haddon v. Neighbarger, 9 Kan. App. 529, 58 Pac. 568; Spencer v. Carr, 45 N. Y. 406, 6 Am. Rep. 112; De Levillain v. Evans, 39 Cal. 120; Turner v. Turner, 173 Cal. 782, 161 Pac. 980.

[6] Even a conveyance to an alien, disqualified under the law to hold real estate, has been generally held to convey title to such alien, until the same is divested by the state or by inquisition had upon its denouncement. This was so, even under the common law, which excluded aliens from acquiring and holding real property. Merle v. Mathews, 26 Cal. 455; Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208, 25 L. Ed. 603; Norris v. Hoyt, 18 Cal. 217; Santa Paula Water Co. v. Peralta, 113 Cal. 44, 45 Pac. 168. It is apparent that the present Alien Land Law recognizes the same rule, as it provides that action shall be brought by the state for the escheat of any lands conveyed to aliens in contravention of the act.

[7] In any event, the nature and extent of the minor's property rights under the deed in question, she being qualified to own real estate, could not be determined in this guardianship proceeding. She would require a guardian to represent her in the settlement of just such a controversy.

[8] The fact that the father paid the consideration for the transfer of this land to the minor does not establish a trust in the father's favor, under section 853 of the Civil Code. Where aliens are prohibited from holding lands, an implied trust by operation of law will not arise in their favor. 2 Corp. Juris, 1057, § 5; Phillips v. Crammond, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11092, p. 497; Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh (30 Va.) 492; Leggett v. Dubois, 5 Paige Ch. 114, 28 Am. Dec. 413. Besides, the attempt of the alien to obtain title through such a trust would be in violation of the Alien Land Law, and could not be enforced.

[9] The act of petitioner, in securing conveyances of land to his daughter, while confessedly carried out because the laws of California did not permit him to buy it for himself, was in no sense unlawful, since the daughter is a citizen of the United States and entitled to acquire and own real estate. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that it was not the purpose of this conveyance to vest absolute title to the land in the minor. If any legal ground appears in the record for denying letters of guardianship, it must be found elsewhere than in the reason stated in the order of the court.

[10] There is no claim that an alien Japanese was disqualified, merely by reason of his being an alien from qualifying as a guardian at the time this petition was filed and acted upon. The very fact that the act of 1920, in terms, creates such disqualification, is a recognition of the right of such aliens to qualify and serve as guardians, in the absence of such inhibition.

[11] All the proceedings in the superior court, including the final order denying the petition, were had in this matter before the Initiative Alien Property Act of 1920 went into effect, though the final order was not made until after the adoption of the law by popular vote at the election of November 2, 1920. Stats. 1921, p. lxxxiii.

That act provided that thereafter no alien, disqualified to acquire and hold real estate—

"may be appointed guardian of that portion of the estate of a minor which consists of property which such alien * * * is inhibited from acquiring, possessing, enjoying or transferring by reason of the provisions of this act."

It further provides that the—

"public administrator of the proper county or any other competent person or corporation, may be appointed guardian of the estate of a minor citizen whose parents are ineligible to appointment under the provisions of this section." Section 4.

Section 12 of the act declares that it—

"shall not affect pending actions or proceedings, but the same may be prosecuted and defended with the same effect as if this act had not been adopted."

The act did not take effect until December 9, 1920, five days after the official declaration of the vote thereon by the secretary of state. The order appealed from, having been made on November 6, 1920, was, of course, unaffected by the act. What we have already said sufficiently shows that the order was erroneous and that it must be reversed. The appellant, however, has presented and elaborately argued certain additional points upon which he claims the right to a reversal, to the effect that the Initiative Act of 1920, in the respect here involved, is invalid upon constitutional grounds. Section 4 of the act also authorizes the superior court to remove a guardian whenever it appears "that facts exist which would make the guardian ineligible to appointment in the first instance." If the court below, upon a retrial, should believe that the provisions of the act declaring the petitioner ineligible are valid, it may be that it would refuse to issue letters to him, or, having done so, it might immediately revoke them, on the ground that, as the facts showing ineligibility appeared in the proceedings, it was its duty to do so. Under these circumstances, we deem it ad-visible to consider and determine the additional points presented.

These points are: (1) That the law in question violates the Treaty between the United States and Japan (37 Stat. 1504); (2) that it denies to the Japanese parent the equal protection of the laws, contrary to section 1, art. 14, of the Constitution of the United States; (3) that it denies to the child, who is a native-born citizen of the United States, the privileges guaranteed to her by section 21, art. 1, of the Constitution of California, and the privileges and equal protection of the laws secured to her by the Fourteenth Amendment aforesaid.

[12] 1. The preamble of the treaty states that it is made to fix clearly and positively "the rules which are hereafter to govern the commercial intercourse" between the respective countries. The opening clause of article 1 declares that the citizens of each country shall have liberty to enter and reside in the territory of the other, carry on trade therein and, among other things, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes. It contains no guarantee of the right to lease land for agricultural purposes. The principal clause relied on is a part of article 1, as follows:

"The citizens or subjects of each of the High Contracting Parties shall receive, in the territories of the other, the most constant protection and security for their persons and property, and shall enjoy in this respect the same rights and privileges as are or may be granted to native citizens or subjects, on their submitting themselves to the conditions imposed upon the native citizens or subjects."

[13] This, it will be seen, guarantees to subjects of Japan, residing here, protection and security for their persons and property, and provides that, in this respect, that is, in respect to such protection and security, they shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as citizens of this country. It is suggested, though the appellant does not lay stress upon this point, that one of the privileges of a native citizen of this country is the right to be appointed guardian of his own child, and that, as the act forbids the appointment of a Japanese alien residing here as guardian of his own child, it is, therefore, a direct denial of a privilege secured by the treaty. The language of the treaty, however, does not include such privilege. The rights and privileges which it declares the Japanese citizen shall enjoy here are such rights and privileges only as may be necessary for the protection and security of his own person or property. It cannot be said that it is necessary for the security or protection of either the person or the property of a parent that he should become the guardian of his own child. Eligibility to appointment as guardian is not property, nor is it a right of property. It pertains exclusively to the person.

It may be given or withheld by the law of the state in which the parent and child reside. The withholding thereof from all parents would be within the power of the state. Undoubtedly, when given, it is a privilege pertaining to the individual parent, but it is not a privilege which enhances his own personal security or which assists him in protecting his property. A deprivation of the privilege would in no manner endanger the person of the parent, or jeopardize his property. The child, being a native citizen of the United States, cannot as such, invoke the protection of the treaty to secure to the father, a citizen of Japan, equal privileges with other residents who are not citizens of Japan. The question whether the child is deprived of the privilege of having its own father serve as its guardian does not arise under the treaty. It must look to the provisions of the laws of this country, for the protection of its privileges as a citizen thereof. The law does not violate the treaty with Japan.

[14] 2. Our law provides that the father or mother of a minor child, less than 14 years of age, if competent, is entitled to be appointed guardian of such child in preference to any other person. Code Civ. Proc., § 1751. This law is general in terms. It is not confined to citizens in its application, but purports to confer the right upon all residents regardless of citizenship. The initiatory act of 1920 (Stats. 1921, p. lxxxiii, § 4), by its terms, forbids the appointment of any alien not eligible to citizenship as guardian of a minor, with respect to property of the minor of a character, which such alien cannot acquire for himself, that is to say, with respect to agricultural land belonging to such minor. Its effect is that a citizen of Japan, who is the parent of a native-born child, cannot be appointed guardian of the property of the child, where that property consists entirely of agricultural land. This restriction is not put upon a citizen of any country whose citizens are eligible to citizenship here, nor upon any other class of residents of this state who are not citizens thereof. It is clearly a discrimination against citizens of Japan, residing in this state.

Section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of the United States declares that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." We had occasion to consider this language in Ex parte Kotta, decided on September 12, 1921, 200 Pac. 957. We there said that "the word 'person,' as used in this amendment includes aliens," and, quoting from Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 396, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220, that it applies "without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality," and that the guarantee of "the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws." These statements are also quoted and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 36 Sup. Ct. 7, 60 L. Ed. 131, L. R. A. 1916D, 545, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 283. In Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 31, 5 Sup. Ct. 359, 28 L. Ed. 923, the court declared that this guarantee means that "equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights." It needs no argument to demonstrate the proposition that a law which gives to one person the right or privilege of becoming the guardian of his child and withholds it from another, both being alike competent in all respects, is not equal as between the two persons. The person from whom it is withheld is not in such a case accorded the protection of equal laws. In this respect the Initiative Act of 1920 is clearly a violation by this state of the guarantee contained in the Fourteenth Amendment, that no state shall deny to any person the equal protection of its laws.

[15] It cannot be successfully contended that the law may be declared valid in this respect, on the ground that persons who are ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States form, by reason of that fact alone, a class by themselves, for which the state may enact peculiar legislation, depriving them of rights or privileges which are accorded to others not of that class. The rule in regard to classification, peculiarly applicable to such an attempt, is that the classification—

"must be founded upon differences which are either defined by the Constitution or natural, and which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity in the legislation. It must not be arbitrary, for the mere purpose of classification, that legislation really local or special may seem to be general, but for the purpose of meeting different conditions naturally requiring different legislation." [Italics ours.] Darcy v. Mayor, etc., 104 Cal. 645, 38 Pac. 500.

A law—

"makes an improper discrimination if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar restrictions or disabilities upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from a larger number of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to the privileges granted or burdens imposed, and between whom and the persons not so favored or burdened no reasonable distinction or substantial difference can be found justifying the inclusion of one and the exclusion of the other from such privileges or burdens. The difference on which the classification is based must be such as, in some reasonable degree, will account for or justify the peculiar legislation." Ex parte Miller, 162 Cal. 698, 124 Pac. 430.

"While reasonable classification is permitted, without doing violence to the equal protection of the laws, such classification must be based upon some real and substantial distinction, bearing a reasonable and just relation to the things, in respect to which such classification is imposed; and classification cannot be arbitrarily made without any substantial basis. Arbitrary selection, it has been said, cannot be justified by calling it classification." Southern R. Co. v. Greene, 216 U. S. 417, 30 Sup. Ct. 291, 54 L. Ed. 536, 17 Ann. Cas. 1247.

The right or privilege of a father to be the guardian of his own minor child does not in any respect depend upon or arise out of his nationality or his eligibility to citizenship in this country. It has no relation thereto. Such privilege is no doubt as much prized by a Japanese resident of good character, who is not a citizen of this country and cannot become such, as by any other father of like character, who is a citizen or is eligible to become one. A law denying the privilege to one class and giving it to the other cannot be said to be a law justified by a classification based on a distinction which calls for such peculiar legislation. Such attempted classification does not relieve the act from the charge that it violates the Fourteenth Amendment.

[16] 3. The foregoing observations apply with equal force to the proposition that the act of 1920, taken in connection with section 1751 of the Code of Civil Procedure, denies to the child, Tetsubumi Yano, the privileges guaranteed to her by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and by section 21, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state. Section 21 declares that no citizen or class of citizens shall "be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens." The child is a native citizen of the United States and of the state of California. Nothing can be denied to her because of her race or color that is not denied to all citizens, regardless of race or color. Any privilege that is given generally to citizens of other races must also be given to her, upon the same terms, and her race cannot be considered as a factor in the problem, or as a cause for denial thereof to her. The effect of the two laws would be that all native minor children, possessed of agricultural land in this state, whose parents are aliens residing in this state and eligible to citizenship, would have the privilege of having their father or mother appointed guardian of that part of their estate, while, on the other hand, all native-born minors, who are possessed of agricultural land in this state, whose parents are aliens and reside here, but are ineligible to citizenship, if a guardianship of such land is necessary or convenient, would be compelled to have strangers as such guardians. Furthermore, while a native California child of alien Japanese parents, if over 14 years of age, could nominate its own father as the guardian of its personal property or of its real property leased for purposes of trade or residence solely (Code Civ. Proc. § 1748), it must nominate some stranger as guardian of any farming land it may own. No such burdensome disability is imposed upon any native-born child whose parents are citizens or eligible to citizenship. All such discriminations are forbidden by the constitutional provisions above mentioned.

It is argued, on behalf of respondent, that the object of the law is to prevent evasions of the law forbidding aliens ineligible to citizenship to acquire, possess, or enjoy agricultural land, that the only class doing so is composed exclusively of aliens who cause land to be vested in their own minor children, with a view of being appointed guardian of the estate of such children, and that it is permissible for the state to regard the persons who are producing the evil, which it desires to prevent, as a class by themselves, and to enact such measures operating only upon that class as may be necessary to accomplish the desired object as has been pointed out in Patstone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 138, 34 Sup. Ct. 281, 58 L. Ed. 539, and Ex parte Spencer, 149 Cal. 401, 86 Pac. 896, 117 Am. St. Rep. 137, 9 Ann. Cas. 1105. But, even in such case as has been shown, the differences on which the classification is based must suggest a reason for the peculiar legislation, and the legislation must be such as will have some tendency to remove the evil intended to be prevented.

The appointment as guardian would not enable such parents to acquire, possess, or enjoy agricultural land, and therefore their ineligibility to such appointment could not prevent their so doing. A guardian neither acquires, possesses, or enjoys the property belonging to the ward, in any accurate or legal meaning of these terms. At most, he merely has, for some purposes, the control of the property, but the control is not in his own right and does not inure to his benefit. He controls it as trustee only, and is held to strict accountability to the child, for all the benefits accruing from the use of it. He must render such accounts annually, or oftener, if required by the court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1773, 1774. He must hold all the receipts from the farming operations as the property of the native-born child, and must use so much of it for the support and education of the child as may be necessary, and no more, and must safely invest the remainder as the property of the child and for its sole use and benefit. In all of his acts as guardian he is under the supervision and control of the superior court of the county. His compensation is limited to the reasonable value of his services, and is to be fixed by that court. The use is in the child, not in the guardian. When the child becomes of age the control of the guardian immediately ceases. If the child should die, the control would pass forthwith to its heirs, and the alien parent, in that event, would not even inherit the property or any part thereof. It seems plain that, since the alien parent could not by this means evade the operation of the law, nor acquire, possess, or enjoy agricultural land, the law cannot be upheld on the ground that such persons constitute a class, and the only class, who attempt to evade the law forbidding alien ownership. They could not, by the use of such guardianship, enjoy the rights of ownership. The classification is therefore clearly arbitrary, and does not "suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify" the peculiar legislation addressed to the class, as is said in Darcy v. Mayor, supra.

The object sought to be attained by these statutory provisions, that is, to discourage the coming of Japanese into this state, may be a proper one, and may be even desirable for the promotion of the welfare and progress of the state. The court can only consider its validity under the limitations of the Constitution. A similar object prompted the adoption of the anti-Chinese provisions of the Constitution of 1879, which, so far as they were effectual, were declared invalid by the federal courts. This entire question is international in character, and is a matter properly to be disposed of by the federal government. Appeal for its adjustment should be made to Congress, rather than to attempt to accomplish it by discriminatory legislative measures of the state.

Our conclusion is that the provisions of the Initiative Act of 1920, forbidding the appointment of an alien resident, ineligible to citizenship, as guardian of the farming land of his native-born child, and authorizing the removal of such parent, if previously appointed as such guardian, are invalid.

The order appealed from is reversed.

SHAW, C. J., and SLOANE, WASTE, SHURTLEFF, WILBUR, and LENNON, JJ., concur.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. I cannot agree with the conclusion announced with respect to the constitutionality of that portion of the Alien Land Law, which provides that no alien ineligible to citizenship may be appointed guardian of—"that portion of the estate of a minor which consists of property which such alien * * * is inhibited from acquiring, possessing, enjoying or transferring by reason of the provisions of this act."

The plain object of this provision was to deny the right to be such guardians to aliens, who were made ineligible to hold agricultural land under the Alien Land Law so as to prevent an evasion of the terms of that act, of which this provision is a part. The first question presented in considering its constitutionality, it being conceded it does not violate the terms of the treaty with Japan, is whether it denies to such aliens the equal protection of the laws. In Terrace v. Thompson (D. C.) 274 Fed. 841, 843, it is said:

"A state may lawfully prohibit aliens acquiring land within its boundaries, if there is no treaty to the contrary. Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat, 259, 272, 4 L. Ed. 234; Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 484, 25 L. Ed. 628; De Vaughn v. Hutchinson, 165 U. S. 566, 570, 17 Sup. Ct. 461, 41 L. Ed. 827; Clarke v. Clarke, 178 U. S. 186, 20 Sup. Ct. 873, 44 L. Ed. 1028; Blythe v. Hinckley, 180 U. S. 333, 21 Sup. Ct. 390, 45 L. Ed. 557."

The several cases cited in the prevailing opinion state the general rules relating to classification for purposes of legislation. In this instance the aliens coming within the inhibition of the legislation seek by indirection, to control agricultural land which the Alien Land Law, the validity of which is not questioned by the majority opinion, denies them the right to own. To hold that, under the federal guarantee of equal protection of the laws, the state is powerless to prevent circumvention of a law it had the authority to enact, is in effect to declare that it cannot, by an exercise of its sovereign will, effectuate the purpose of the original legislation—to prevent its agricultural land from passing under the control of such aliens. I am not prepared to assent to such a conclusion. It seems clear to me that the state, having the power to enact the original law directed at these aliens, may classify them in supplemental legislation, the object of which is to make the parent legislation effective.

The statute held constitutional in Patsone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 138, 34 Sup. Ct. 281, 58 L. Ed. 539, made it unlawful for any unnaturalized foreign-born resident to kill any wild bird or animal, except in defense of person or property, and "to that end" made it unlawful for any such person to own or be possessed of a shotgun or rifle, with a penalty of $25 and a forfeiture of the gun. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, said:

"But we start with the general consideration that a state may classify with reference to the evil to be prevented, and that, if the class discriminated against is, or reasonably might be, considered to define those from whom the evil mainly is to be feared, it properly may be picked out. A lack of abstract symmetry does not matter. The question is a practical one, dependent upon experience. * * * The question therefore narrows itself to whether this court can say that the Legislature of Pennsylvania was not warranted in assuming as its premise for the law that resident unnaturalized aliens were the peculiar source of the evil that it desired to prevent."

It appears from that case that unnaturalized foreign-born residents were the chief slaughterers of wild birds and animals, and to prevent violations of a statute which made the killing of the game unlawful, such persons were denied the right to own property, consisting of certain kinds of firearms, which they might use to kill game. Here, the object is not to prevent a violation of a statute, but to prevent an evasion of it, for, while it is true the alien parent does not acquire title to the land, as a practical matter he does secure control of it in his capacity as guardian. The only persons who would evade such a statute are those against whom it is directed, namely, aliens ineligible to citizenship—a definite class of the population, as between the members of which the act makes no discrimination. To prevent the circumvention of the law, such aliens are denied the right to be guardians of these estates by use of which form of guardianship they would control them. I perceive no distinction in principle between the two cases.

Viewed purely as a question of guardianship, it may be true, as stated in the prevailing opinion, that—

"the right or privilege of a father to be the guardian of his own minor child does not in any respect depend upon or arise out of his nationality or his eligibility to citizenship in this country. It has no relation thereto."

But, when it is considered that out of all the persons who may become guardians of this class of property, these aliens alone seek to be appointed as such with the definite object of evading the Alien Land Law, there is a relation established between them and the right to be guardians, which places them in a distinct class with reference to that subject.

The means adopted to accomplish the objects and purposes of the Alien Land Law are not unreasonable. As pointed out in the main opinion, matters of guardianship are within the control of the Legislature. The qualification and competency of guardians are therefore subject to statutory change. This provision is the latest expression of the legislative will on the subject of eligibility to guardianship. It is an additional qualification of the rule that a parent, or person nominated by a minor over 14 years of age, may be appointed as guardian. Section 1751, Code Civ. Proc. A parent, who is incompetent, has no right to be appointed guardian of his child. In the case at bar, it was found by the trial court and the petitioner himself admitted that the land was transferred to the minor and that petitioner is seeking to be appointed guardian solely because, under the Alien Land Law, he could not own the land himself. It is urged that one who avowedly seeks to circumvent a law of the state and defeat its plain purpose is an unfit person to be a guardian. However that may be, this statute expressly renders ineligible to be guardians of a certain class of property in the estates of minors those in the class of whom petitioner is one. It does not interfere with the right of a natural parent to be the guardian of the person of the minor or of that portion of its estate which the guardian himself might lawfully acquire and enjoy. Such a regulation is clearly within the legislative power of the state.

Considered from this viewpoint, the rights of the minor are not infringed by this provision. It cannot be questioned that this minor has, under section 21, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state, the same rights as any other native-born citizen. Neither can it be questioned that the title to the land has vested in her. But no child has a right to have its parent appointed its guardian, if the parent is incompetent to discharge the duties of guardianship. By the provision in question, an additional class of persons are rendered incompetent to be guardians of property of a particular character. A minor has no more right to have a parent, declared by law to be ineligible appointed as guardian than such parent would have to be the guardian. The rights of each are subject to statutory regulation and in such a case as this, neither can have more ground for complaint than if the parent were disqualified because of incompetency to discharge the duties of the office. This legislation applies to all minors, whatever the nationality of their parents may be, and it applies whether the person sought to be appointed guardian is the parent of the minor or a stranger.

It follows that, since it was adopted to prevent the evasion of the Alien Land Law by the class of persons directly affected thereby, it was proper to classify them for the purposes of this provision, and, since the means used are not unreasonable, the enactment should be upheld as aiding the enforcement of the Alien Land Law, in spirit as well as in letter.

In re UNGER'S ESTATE.ROLL v. MOORMAN et al.*(L. A. 7142.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 11, 1922.)

1. Trial $\S$ 139(1)—Nonsuit erroneous if evidence is sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

If the evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff, it is error to grant a motion for nonsuit.

2. Wills $\S$ 166(1)—Evidence held insufficient to establish undue influence.

Evidence held insufficient to show that a will was procured by undue influence.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Application by Frances Moorman and another for the probate of the will of Minnie Unger, deceased. From an order admitting the will to probate, contestant, Emily Unger Croll, appeals. Affirmed.

H. Parker Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. T. Kendrick, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. [1] This is an appeal from an order admitting to probate a will of the decedent, dated March 2, 1918, after the granting of a motion for nonsuit, at the close of the testimony in a will contest, instituted by the appellant, Emily Unger Croll, a daughter of decedent, upon the ground that the will was procured by the undue influence of Charles W. Unger, a son of the decedent, and Frances Moorman, a daughter of the decedent. The only question involved in the appeal is whether or not the evidence was sufficient to have sustained a verdict of the jury that the will was procured by undue influence, if such a verdict had been rendered, for, if there was sufficient evidence to sustain such a finding, the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. Vanderford v. Foster, 65 Cal. 49, 2 Pac. 736; Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 123 Pac. 294; Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 Pac. 631; Stieglitz v. Settle, 175 Cal. 131, 165 Pac. 436; Estate of Flint, 179 Cal. 552, 177 Pac. 451; In re Wall's Estate (Cal. Sup.) 200 Pac. 929.

[2] The evidence tends to show that the testatrix loved the contestant, notwithstanding the apparent estrangement between them; that the respondents Frances and Charles lived with the testatrix and prevented the contestant from seeing her mother or living with her, although the mother desired to live with the contestant and expected to do so when Charles and Frances married and established homes of their own; that the testatrix saw the contestant but did not want Charles and Frances to learn of that fact. The contestant testified that, in 1917 or 1918, her brother Charles said to her: "I will see that your mother will leave you but a dollar." Frances went with her mother to a law office in February, 1918, and, two days after the will was executed, returned with her mother to get the will and paid for it. Appellant also relies upon other evidence showing hostility between the children before and after the mother's death, and also upon the terms of the will giving contestant the mother's gold watch and chain, and upon the claim that the mother did not understand English and therefore did not understand the balance of the clause, particularly the word "resents." The clause of the will thus relied upon by the appellant to show undue influence is as follows:

"I also give and bequeath to my oldest daughter, Emily Croll, my gold watch and chain worn by me and I hereby state that the reason I do not give her an equal share with my other two children is that I have heretofore done more for her than for them and I also resent the way she has treated me as well as other members of my family and wish to state that I am free to act as I please in this matter and not influenced in any way by either of my two children at the time of making this will."

Thus the contestant relies upon evidence tending to show an opportunity and a disposition on the part of the respondents to exercise undue influence, and a prevention of counter influence by the contestant, as circumstantial evidence tending to show that the unequal disposition of the mother's property was a result of undue influence on the part of Charles and Frances, the respondents.

On the other hand, it appears that John N. Metcalf, the attorney who drew the will, had known the testatrix for about 15 years and had been her attorney for a long time. He was familiar with the affairs of the family, and the testatrix stated to him fully why she discriminated against the contestant. He questioned her at length concerning her wishes, and drew her will in accordance with her directions, expressed when he was alone with her. The attorney and his clerk, Agnes L. Boyd, attested the will as subscribing witnesses and testified that the testatrix was not acting under undue influence at the time the will was drawn and executed. There is no evidence that Charles or Frances, the son and daughter, charged with undue influence, were present at the time the will was executed, and both testified that they knew nothing about the will until after it was executed. Frances testified that she first learned of the will two days after its date, and Charles that he was away at the time the will was executed and that he did not learn of it until June, and then did not see the will until after his mother's death. Whatever inferences of undue influence might arise from the circumstances relied upon by the contestant are fully met by the uncontradicted evidence showing how the will was in fact drawn and executed. Thus the undisputed evidence taken as a whole is insufficient to establish undue influence, even if we wholly discredit the express denial of undue influence by the respondents, as the jury might have done. For a discussion of the principles involved see Estate of Anderson (Cal. Sup.) 198 Pac. 407.

57 Cal. App. 141

Ex parte GERBER. (Cr. 871.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 22, 1922.)

1. Physicians and surgeons — 6(5) — Physician licensed to practice naturopathy held entitled to practice optometry.

Under St. 1901, p. 56, § 16, providing that those who for a valuable consideration prescribe any drug, appliance, medical or surgical treatment, or perform any operation, shall be deemed as practicing medicine or surgery, and St. 1909, p. 418, providing that a person holding a certificate of the Association of Naturopaths, and practicing thereunder before passage of the latter act, shall be entitled to practice on indorsement of the certificate by the State Board of Medical Examiners, which by St. 1907, p. 252, § 16, was authorized to issue certificates authorizing the holder to practice any system or mode of treating the sick, in view of the fact that in a directory of persons authorized to practice by St. 1917, p. 93, to be published by the State Board of Medical Examiners, which is prima facie evidence of right of persons named therein to practice, a person whose certificate to practice naturopathy had been indorsed by the Board of Medical Examiners was classified therein as a practitioner of medicine and surgery and was entitled to practice optometry under Optometry Law, § 10, permitting duly licensed physicians and surgeons to treat eyes or fit glasses.

2. Physicians and surgeons — 6(1/2) — "Naturopathy" defined.

"Naturopathy" is a process or system whereby remedies for disease are discovered and whereby they are applied to the healing of disease.

3. Physicians and surgeons — 2 — Statute providing for a board of osteopathic examiners supplanted.

St. 1901, p. 113, § 2, legalizing the practice of osteopathy and providing for a board of osteopathic examiners, was supplanted by St. 1907, p. 252, providing for a State Board of Medical Examiners containing osteopathic physicians.

In the matter of Rudolph H. Gerber. Application for writ of habeas corpus to the sheriff of Los Angeles county to secure release of petitioner Rudolph H. Gerber from custody. Petitioner discharged.

H. C. Millsap and Millsap & Kendall, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Irwin Widney and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. [1] Petitioner demands his release from an alleged unlawful detention pursuant to his conviction upon a charge of having violated that portion of section 1 of the Optometry Law (Stats. 1913, p. 1097) providing that no person shall engage in the practice of optometry without having first obtained a certificate of registration from the State Board of Optometry. Petitioner does not claim ever to have obtained such a certificate, but he contends that his imprisonment is unlawful because of the provisions of section 10 of the Optometry Law to the effect that the act shall not be construed "to prevent duly licensed physicians and surgeons from treating or fitting glasses to the human eye." In other words, petitioner makes the claim that he was a duly licensed physician and surgeon at the time of the commission of the acts which were the basis of the charge against him. Whether or not he then was so licensed is the only question presented for our consideration and decision in this proceeding.

Petitioner is a graduate and holds a degree from a school conducted by the Association of Naturopaths of California, which association is a corporation, having been organized in August, 1904. The officers of the association whose duty it is "to pass upon and determine the educational requirements of students" of the school, are known as the State Board of Examiners of the Naturopathic Physicians of California. At the time of petitioner's graduation and under date March 17, 1905, this board issued to petitioner a certificate to the effect that he "has passed the required examination in all branches of Naturopathic Therapeutics and that the Board of Examiners herewith in consideration of the applicant's qualification and by the authority vested in us by the state of California confers upon Rudolph H. Gerber the degree of doctor of naturopathy with all the privileges, rights and advantages thereunto belonging." This certificate has never been revoked, and petitioner, ever since its date, to quote from his petition in this proceeding, "has continuously engaged within the state of California in the practice of naturopathy, making a specialty of the treatment of the eye."

[2] Counsel for both petitioner and respondent tell us that the word "naturopathy" has never been defined in any dictionary, but notwithstanding that fact we shall experience no great difficulty in determining whether petitioner, in practicing that system, if we may for the moment so designate it, has been following the calling of a physician and surgeon, and also whether he has been licensed to do so. These questions may be resolved, from the facts we have stated above as a basis, upon the provisions of certain statutes and upon certain practices of the State Board of Medical Examiners, a body the nature and functions of which will be dealt with below. It is to be observed, then, as to the facts, that petitioner is a graduate of a school the destinies of whose students are under the control of the State Board of Examiners of the Naturopathic Physicians of California, that upon his graduation this board certified that he had passed the required examination in all branches of naturopathic therapeutics, that they conferred upon him the degree of doctor of naturopathy, and that petitioner has since engaged in the practice of naturopathy, making a specialty of the treatment of the eye. Webster's definition of "therapeutics" is: "That part of medical science which treats of the discovery and application of remedies for disease." He defines the adjectives "therapeutic" and "therapeutical": "Of or pertaining to the healing art; concerned in discovering and applying remedies for disease; curative." The same lexicographer defines "treatment" as the "act or manner of treating; management; handling; usage; as, unkind treatment; medical treatment"; and one of his definitions of the verb "treat" is, "to care for medicinally or surgically." This, he it noted, is the only meaning given by him to the word "treat" which can by any possibility fit the expression "treatment of the eye." It is not difficult, then, from the facts given us, and with the aid of Webster, to formulate the definition that naturopathy is a process or system whereby remedies for disease are discovered and whereby they are applied to the healing of disease.

The statutes which we have mentioned, being the medical practice acts successively passed by the Legislature, contain provisions defining those who shall be regarded as practicing medicine and surgery, and we now turn to them. The first of these statutes was passed in 1876. It provides (Stats. 1875-76, p. 792, § 11) that—

"Any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine, within the meaning of this act, who shall profess publicly to be a physician and to prescribe for the sick, or who shall append to his name the letters 'M. D.'"

This section was amended in 1878 (Stats. 1877-78, p. 918, § 5) to read as follows, in part:

"Any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine, within the meaning of this act, who shall profess publicly to be a physician, or who shall habitually prescribe for the sick, or who shall append to his name the letters 'M. D.'"

The medical practice law of the state was entirely recast by a statute passed in 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 56). Section 16 of the act contains the following:

"The following persons shall be deemed as practicing medicine or surgery within the meaning of this act: (1) Those who profess to be, or hold themselves out as being, engaged as doctors, physicians or surgeons in the treatment of disease, injury, or deformity of human beings. (2) Those who, for pecuniary or valuable consideration, shall prescribe medicine, magnetism, or electricity, in the treatment of disease, injury, or deformity of human beings. (3) Those who, for pecuniary or valuable consideration, shall employ surgical or medical means or appliances for the treatment of disease, injury, or deformity of human beings, except dealers in surgical, dental or optical appliances. (4) Those who, for a pecuniary or valuable consideration, "prescribe or use any drug or medicine, appliance, or medical or surgical treatment, or perform any operation for the relief or cure of any bodily injury or disease."

The next act concerning the practice of medicine and surgery was passed in 1907, but it contains no definitions upon the subjects covered by our quotations from the earlier statutes. The act of 1907 will be referred to more at large below.

The facts, as we have outlined them above, and the definitions which we have extracted from the statutes, will go far toward settling the question whether petitioner was engaged in practice as a physician and surgeon at the time of the commission of the alleged offense charged against him. The solution of that problem, however, will be effectively aided by a consideration of the question whether he was licensed to practice whatever calling he was engaged in at the time. From this point forward, in fact, the two questions go hand in hand; so much so that they may be said practically to be one.

Two years after petitioner had commenced the practice of his profession under the diploma issued to him by the State Board of Examiners of the Naturopathic Physicians of California, the Legislature passed the medical practice act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 252). That act contained a certain section 16, the terms of which need not be stated, as we are at present concerned with its provisions as recast by an amendment passed in 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 418). A part of the section as then amended reads, the italics being ours:

"Any person who holds an unrevoked certificate issued by the board of examiners of the Association of Naturopaths of California, incorporated under the laws of the state of California, August eighth, 1904, and who shall be practicing naturopathy prior to the passage of this act, shall be entitled to practice naturopathy in this state, the same as if it had been issued under this act. The board of medical examiners shall indorse said certificate at their first meeting after this act becomes a law, or at any subsequent meeting of the board, but not later than six months after the passage of this act by signature of its president and secretary and affixing its official seal."

In accordance with the mandate of this provision the State Board of Medical Examiners placed its indorsement on petitioner's naturopathic certificate on April 8, 1909.

The clause of the language last above quoted to the effect that one situated as was petitioner "shall be entitled to practice naturopathy in this state, the same as if it [his naturopathic certificate] had been issued under this act," at once inspires inquiry as to the effect of certificates issued under the act (of 1907) by the State Board of Medical Examiners. In truth, it will not be amiss to inquire into the nature and functions of that board under all the medical practice acts, for they all provide for such a body and define its powers and duties. Under the act of 1876 (Stats. 1876, p. 792) the board was made up of members of the various incorporated state medical societies. It issued certificates authorizing the holders thereof to practice medicine and surgery in the state. These certificates were of two kinds, those which were to be issued to graduates "in medicine" upon the mere production of their diplomas to the board, and those to be issued to persons, not graduates in medicine, who passed examinations conducted by the board. None could practice medicine or surgery without having procured one of these certificates, of either the one form or the other. The act of 1878 (Stats. 1877-78, p. 918) was, as shown by its title, supplemental to and amendatory of the act of 1876. Instead of referring to state medical societies in general, it provided that the Board of Examiners should be appointed from the Medical Society of the State of California, the Eclectic Medical Society of the State of California, and the California State Homeopathic Medical Society. Otherwise, and so far as the functions of the board are concerned, the terms of the act take no material departure from those of the act of 1876. The statute of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 56) continued the provision that the board should be composed of members of the three medical societies above mentioned. It required that every person, "before practicing medicine or surgery, or any of the departments of medicine or surgery," must have a certificate issued by the board and authorizing him so to practice. This certificate was to be issued, whether the applicant had a diploma from a medical school or not, pursuant to an examination to be conducted by the board, except that the board might in its discretion issue the certificate without examination in the case of applicants holding certificates issued by the examining boards of other states. The act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 252) was in the main similar to the act of 1901. By its terms, however, the Osteopathic Association of California was, together with the medical societies already mentioned, allowed representation on the board of examiners. The act also evidenced this departure from the terms of the earlier statutes: It provided that three forms of certificate should be issued by the board:

"First, a certificate authorizing the holder thereof to practice medicine and surgery; second, a certificate authorizing the holder thereof to practice osteopathy; third, a certificate authorizing the holder thereof to practice any other system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted."

The earlier statutes had directed alone the issuance of certificates permitting the practice of medicine and surgery. All of these medical practice acts, that is to say, those of 1876, 1878, 1901, and 1907, vest in the board of examiners the power both to refuse and to revoke certificates on account of the unprofessional conduct of applicants for or holders of them. In the last two acts, those of 1901 and 1907, an elaborate machinery is provided for the conduct of hearings before the board pursuant to charges of unprofessional conduct. A written complaint is to be filed, followed by a written citation issued under the seal of the board to the person against whom the charge is preferred. Time is allowed within which to file written answer to the charge and default is to be entered if no answer is presented within the period. Provision is made for the issuance and service of subpoenas to compel the attendance of witnesses, depositions are to be taken, and "the board shall proceed to determine the matter, to that end shall hear such evidence as may be adduced before it," and it may then refuse or grant certificate, or revoke or refuse to revoke certificate, as the case may require.

If it were not for the language of the act of 1907 to the effect that the examining board may issue certificates in three forms, we might here end our quest. Up to the time of the inclusion of that provision in the chain of medical practice acts the functions of the board concerned only the practice of medicine and surgery, which practice, and no other, we are willing to concede for the purposes of this decision, at least, is conducted by those persons known as physicians and surgeons. In the exercise of its duties up to 1907, then, the board of examiners was the sole arbiter of the destinies of physicians and surgeons. No person might take up the practice of medicine or surgery except upon the duly declared consent of the board, and none might continue in that practice in defiance of its mandate, enunciated after a formal and proper investigation pursuant to a charge of unprofessional conduct. Physicians and surgeons could be made only by the board. Short of death or voluntary retirement from practice, they could be unmade only by the board. The legislative direction that such a body should indorse the certificates of practicing naturopaths, contained in section 16 of the act of 1907, as amended in 1909, would be most significant and would practically control the question whether a doctor of naturopathy follows the calling of a physician and surgeon. The significance of the direction does not entirely disappear because of the provision of the act of 1907 for the issuance of certificates in three forms, but it is materially minimized thereby. We therefore take up for consideration a point which involves what we have referred to early in this opinion as certain practices of the State Board of Medical Examiners.

[3] A statute not yet mentioned by us was passed by the Legislature in 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 113) for the purpose of regulating the practice of osteopathy. It provided for a board of five examiners to be composed wholly of osteopaths and to be appointed by the Osteopathic Association of the State of California. That board was to issue certificates allowing the practice of osteopathy, but the act provided that no such certificate should "authorize the holder thereof to prescribe or use drugs, nor to perform major surgery," and that "the system, method and science of treating diseases of the human body, commonly known as osteopathy, is hereby declared not to be the practice of medicine or surgery, within the meaning" of the act of 1876, or of any of the acts amendatory thereof. We have already mentioned the fact that the act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 252) allowed the osteopaths representation on the State Board of Medical Examiners, and it is now pertinent to state the extent of that representation, in fact to state the manner in which the board was to be made up from the various societies and associations. The body was to be appointed by the Governor and was to consist of eleven members, being the total of "five members from a list of ten names presented by the Medical Society of the state of California, two members from a list of four names presented by the California State Homeopathic Medical Society, two members from a list of four names presented by the Eclectic Medical Society of the State of California, and two members from a list of four names presented by the Osteopathic Association of the State of California." It will be observed that nine-elevenths of the board thus provided for were to be selected from the societies whose members formerly and under all earlier statutes had made up the examining boards which had issued certificates only to physicians and surgeons and whose functions related only to the practice of medicine and surgery. It will be remembered, also, that the act of 1907 directed the issuance, as one of the three forms of certificates to be issued by the newly constituted board, of certificates authorizing the holders thereof to practice osteopathy. It is evident, then, that the act of 1907 supplanted the act of 1901 legalizing the practice of osteopathy and providing for a board of osteopathic examiners. We now proceed to a consideration of certain provisions of another act to which we have not yet referred (Stats. 1917, p. 93). This statute contains a provision that the State Board of Medical Examiners "shall, on or before the first day of January of each year, compile and may thereafter publish and sell, a complete directory giving the addresses of all persons within the state of California who hold unrevoked licenses to practice under any medical practice act of the state of California, which license shall in any manner authorize the treatment of human beings for diseases, injuries, deformities of any other physical or mental conditions," and that—

"The directory shall contain in addition to the names and addresses of said persons, the names and symbols indicating the title, name or names, school or schools, which such person has attended and from which graduated, the date of issuance of the license, the present residence of said person and a statement of the form of certificate held. The directory shall be prima facie evidence of the right of the person or persons named therein to practice."

The facts before us do not show whether the directory thus authorized was issued for years prior to 1921 and 1922, but they do show that it was put forth in each of those years. The publication for each of the years mentioned shows first, as to petitioner, the mere entry "Rudolph H. Gerber, Los Angeles." Some pages beyond this entry appears a statement or note in each directory to the effect that certain affixes used therein show the character of the certificates held by the various "physicians," the letter "O" indicating a license to practice osteopathy and the letter "N" indicating a license to practice naturopathy. This note is followed on a later page in each directory with the entry "Rudolph H. Gerber, 523 S. Westmore Avenue, Los Angeles (N) April 7, 1909." Each directory contains the following statement, arranged, however, in tabular form:

"From August 1, 1901, to August 10, 1913, certificates were issued as follows: To practice medicine and surgery 2,233. To practice osteopathy 258. To practice any other system 0."

It is to be observed that this tabulation is formulated agreeably to the provision of the statute of 1907 requiring the examining board to issue certificates in three forms. We are, then, justified in stating the following recapitulation: As petitioner's certificate as a naturopathic physician was both issued to him and indorsed by the medical board between August 1, 1901, and August 10, 1913, he must be represented somewhere in the figures of the tabulation we have just quoted. The use in the directories of the letter "N" after petitioner's name in opposition to the letter "O" demonstrates that the board did not include petitioner among the 258 persons to whom licenses had been issued to practice osteopathy. They therefore did include him among the 2,233 who had been licensed to practice medicine and surgery, for none had been licensed to practice "any other system." Finally, then, we have, in effect, the declaration of the State Board of Medical Examiners that petitioner is among the physicians and surgeons of the state. We need not dwell upon the importance and controlling weight of this declaration, for if our course of reasoning has shown anything it has demonstrated that the examining board is better qualified than any other person or agency in the state, both in fact and by law, to determine whether a given individual be a physician and surgeon, if we except the courts, for with the courts, as a matter of law, must finally rest the solution of such a question. We are satisfied with the conclusion of the Board of Medical Examiners as to the standing of petitioner, not only because it has reached that conclusion, but because of the other matters set forth in this opinion. We conclude that petitioner was a physician and surgeon at the time of the commission of the acts out of which the charge against him grew, that he was entitled to practice optometry under the provisions of section 10 of the Optometry Law, and that therefore his detention is unlawful.

Petitioner is discharged from custody.

SMITH v. MASONIC MINES ASS'N et al.
(Civ. 2428.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 25, 1922.)

1. Stipulations $\S$ 18(4)—Party stipulating that only issue was location of single boundary not entitled to object that other issues not tried.

Where, in an action to quiet title, there was an understanding between the court and the respective counsel that the only issue involved was the location of a single boundary, after the case was tried on that theory, a party had no right to object that other issues raised by the pleading were not tried.

2. Boundaries $\S$ 3(3)—Courses and distances give way to ascertained monuments.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2077, providing that, when ascertained monuments are inconsistent with measurement of lines, angles, etc., the former are paramount, courses and distances must give way to ascertained monuments.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1009(3)—Findings based on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where, in an action to quiet title, the evidence as to the location of a boundary was conflicting, the finding as to its location was conclusive on appeal.

4. Mines and minerals $\S$ 38(18)—Evidence held to support findings as to boundaries of a claim.

Evidence held to support findings as to the location of boundaries of a claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action to quiet title by D. M. Smith, administrator, against the Masonic Mines Association and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore, of Oakland, for appellants.

Charles L. Hayes, of Bridgeport, and John D. Murphey, of Berkeley, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants appeal from a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to certain mining property. The plaintiff alleged ownership in fee of the property and that defendants claimed an interest therein adverse to him. The answer denied plaintiff's ownership and admitted that the defendants claimed an interest in the property.

Defendants demurred to the complaint on the grounds that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and "that the same is uncertain in that it alleges ownership in fee, in plaintiff, and then bases title on a mining location made by one Ormand Smith." The complaint contains the usual allegations of an action to quiet title, and the reference therein to the mining location by Smith is merely for the purpose of describing the property. Neither ground of demurrer, therefore, has merit.

[1] The property described in the complaint is known as the Snow Shoe mine or mining location. From the briefs it may be gathered that the defendants own the Chemung mine lying to the south of the Snow Shoe, the north end line of the Chemung coinciding with the south end line of the Snow Shoe. Neither party proved ownership and appellants contend that the judgment must be reversed for such failure of proof. At the beginning of the trial the following occurred:

"The Court: The complaint seems to be in the usual form for an action to quiet title. From what has occurred, I take it that the main controversy is as to the boundaries of the claim of plaintiff.

"Judge Murphey: That is the only question in so far as it appears to me to get at, and if I recollect right it is the south line of the Snow Shoe and the north boundary line of the Chemung—is that correct?

"Mr. Whitmore: That is the line in controversy. There may be other questions arise later.

"Judge Murphey: It is the southern boundary line of the Snow Shoe and the northern boundary line of the Chemung claim.

"The Court: The understanding will be for the present at least to limit the testimony to the location of the boundary, assuming that Mox Smith was the owner of the Snow Shoe Mine and that he is now dead, and that action is being brought by his administrator, duly appointed by the order of the court?

"Judge Murphey: For the purpose of determining the boundary line.

"Mr. Whitmore: For that purpose only.

"The Court: That is the purpose only. You may proceed."

In their brief appellants say:

"It developed at the trial that the real controversy was the location of the south end line of the Snow Shoe mine, where it conflicts with the north end line of the Chemung mine."

The evidence of both parties was directed exclusively to the issue so stated. After the understanding had between the court and respective counsel as to the scope of the trial and after the completion of the trial, on the theory that but the one issue was involved, appellants cannot now be heard to complain that the other issues raised by the pleadings were not tried. Such understanding must be treated as an admission or stipulation by defendants that the plaintiff was the owner of the Snow Shoe.

[2] The appeal is taken on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. Finding No. 3 describes plaintiff's mining claim by tracing the boundaries thereof from monument to monument, the description of all monuments being identical and consisting of a "stake 4x4 inches and about 4 feet high, set in a mound of stone." Omitting from the finding the description of the several monuments, the claim is bounded as follows:

"Commencing at the location monument of said claim * * * located 11 feet south from a certain cut known as the Schofield cut * * * and running thence easterly 242 feet, more or less, to the east center side line monument; * * * thence running northerly 631 6/10 feet, more or less, to the northeast corner monument; * * * thence westerly 600 feet, more or less, to the northwest corner monument; * * * thence southerly 636 feet, more or less, to the west center side line monument; * * * thence southerly 724 feet, more or less, to the southwest corner monument; * * * thence easterly 600 feet, more or less, to the southeast corner monument; * * * thence northerly 724 feet, more or less to the east center side line stake of said Snow Shoe mining claim hereinbefore described."

In their specifications of particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient to sustain the findings, appellants state:

"The evidence is insufficient to sustain finding 3 and particularly in that the location monument of the Snow Shoe mine or mining location was located about 11 feet south of a certain cut known as the Schofield cut, and in that the distance from the location monument to the north end line of the Snow Shoe mine or mining location is found to be 636 feet, when the evidence shows that it is 750 feet, and in that the evidence shows that the location monument is 214 feet northerly of the point where the same is located by said finding."

[3] There was positive evidence that the location monument was originally placed 11 feet north of the Schofield cut. Admittedly the finding is incorrect in locating this monument 11 feet south of the cut, instead of 11 feet north thereof. This error, however, is immaterial, as it forms no part of the described boundaries. The course of measurement from the location monument to the east center side line monument is described as "easterly," and easterly would correctly describe such course whether the location monument be placed 11 feet north of the cut or 11 feet south thereof. The boundary monuments were all in place. Courses and distances must give way to ascertained monuments. Section 2077, Code Civ. Proc. Defendants introduced evidence to the effect that the location monument was a considerable distance north of the cut, but such evidence merely created a conflict on which the findings are conclusive on appeal.

[4] There is evidence to support the court's finding as to the location of the south end line. George Van Sickle testified:

"I am familiar with the mining location called the Snowshoe. Have seen it many times. I think the Snow Shoe claim was located in October, 1912. I helped measure it off. * * * I have been familiar with the Snow Shoe ever since 1912. The southwest corner of the Snow Shoe was staked. As near as I can tell you it was staked properly. It was square across. The end center line is in the proper place. * * * I saw the south end center stake just after the location was made."

William M. Fuller testified:

"I am familiar with the Snow Shoe claim. I first knew it about October, 1912. I first made an examination of it about the first of the year 1913. * * * All the monuments of the Snow Shoe, except the southwest corner, are about the same as they were. There is a monument there now. Many times there was no monument there. Many times it has been away. I built it up several times myself. The south center monument was about 200 feet south of a large bluff. The north end center of the Chemung is very near the bluff and it has been there ever since I have been in Masonic, and the south end center line of the Snow Shoe is about 200 feet south of that."

The evidence shows that the Snow Shoe was located before the Chemung, and consequently any conflict in the original boundaries must be resolved in favor of the former. From the foregoing it is clear that the findings are supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DIAMOND. (Cr. 607.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 23, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 22, 1922.)

1. Burglary § 41(1)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction.

In a prosecution for burglary, testimony as to defendant's unlawful entry of the building, from which he fled when discovered, held to support a conviction of burglary in the first degree.

2. Criminal law § 1186(4)—District attorney's comment on defendant's failure to deny state's testimony held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for burglary, a remark of the district attorney as to how easy it would be for defendant to deny the facts testified to by a state's witness, if they were not true, was not such error as resulted in a miscarriage of justice under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where the court instructed the jury not to consider it and that defendant's refusal to testify for himself could not be used against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Charles Diamond was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. McGregor, of Oroville, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] The defendant was charged with burglary in the first degree, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict. To show the strong and conclusive character of the showing made by the people, we may quote the following testimony of L. C. Webb, who was employed to watch the residence of J. H. Heuberger, the prosecuting witness, on the evening in question while all the family were absent from home:

"I went there, and went inside of the house and sat in the kitchen until some time—an hour or so, I don't know how long—and I got to thinking they might probably try that outer building, and I moved out in to the summer dining room or back porch where I could see the back buildings and stayed there about until 11:30 or somewhere around there. * * * I said about 11:30, or as near as I can figure out, two men approached from the northeast corner of the house and came around to the screen door and tried the screen door and then turned around and walked back around the east end of the porch, and I thought they were going on around, and I stepped back a little to see the door into the kitchen for fear they might try another door, and I heard a sound as if some one was whispering, and I thought they were still at the corner of the screen porch because the east end of the screen porch had a canvas over it and I couldn't see if any one was there, and I presumed they were there after I heard the sound, and I waited, and one of them came about one-half way between the corner and the screen door and came in on it and lit a match and looked in, and after he looked in on the screen porch he walked back to the corner, and they were there for a little bit, and they both came around to this door coming on to this back room and cut the screen and proceeded to walk in, and I halted them and ordered them to throw up their hands, and, instead of throwing up their hands, they whirled and ran out the door, * * * and I fired the shotgun over their heads, and they ran around the corner, and one of them or both of them shot back at me twice."

He further testified that from the street lights and from a match that was struck he recognized one of the men as Diamond, the defendant, and that he was the one who unhooked the screen and entered the building first. This testimony was not disputed nor discredited in any way, and, manifestly, the unlawful entry of the building by the defendant having been thus shown, it was a rational and almost necessary inference that he there and then had the intent to commit larceny, thereby completing the offense of burglary. We may add that the presence of the watchman is accounted for by the circumstances that it was the custom of Mr. Heuberger and his family to be away attending a dance every Friday evening—that being the day of the week in question—and that he had reason to believe that his premises had been invaded by trespassers on previous occasions.

It is not claimed that the evidence does not warrant the verdict, but criticism is made of certain rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence and of a certain statement of the district attorney in his closing argument to the jury.

We deem it unnecessary to notice specifically these rulings, but it is sufficient to say that we have examined them with care, and, if it be conceded that doubt may exist as to the propriety of some of them, it is quite apparent that if any error was thereby committed it did not result in any prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant.

[2] Said remark of the district attorney was as follows:

"The testimony of Mr. Webb stands absolutely uncontradicted; the defense cannot prove that he was not at that house that night and did not do the thing that Webb said he did—break into the house by ripping out the screen door and unlocking it and went in armed with a loaded pistol and he fired back through the wire at Webb, with the undoubted intention of killing him. Now the defendant cannot deny that; the fact stands uncontradicted before you; if the defendant wanted to deny it—I mean if it were not true—how easy it would be for him to deny it."

Thereupon the record shows the following proceeding:

"Mr. McGregor: We will object to the last remarks of the district attorney and assign them as prejudicial error. (At this time at the request of the court the foregoing remarks by the district attorney are read by the reporter.)

"The Court: The refusal of the defendant to—not to take the stand and testify for himself, cannot in any manner prejudice him or be used against him in the trial. Therefore the statement last made by the district attorney will be stricken out and you will not consider that at all against this defendant."

Appellant cites several cases in which it was held that such conduct of the district attorney constituted prejudicial error, and of these, one, to wit, People v. Mirandi, 38

Cal. App. 178, 175 Pac. 653, was decided since the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. But in the Mirandi Case the error denounced by the appellate court consisted in the action of the trial court in overruling the defendant's exceptions to the unwarranted remark of the district attorney, while herein the trial court properly and correctly instructed the jury as to their duty in the matter. Moreover, in that case, the evidence of guilt was circumstantial and not so convincing as to justify the appellate court in excusing the flagrant error.

This case is governed by the principle laid down in People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 157 Pac. 599, wherein it was said:

"While it was wrong for the district attorney to comment at all on the failure of defendant to testify upon this subject, it would be most unreasonable to assume in the light of the attitude of the trial judge in the matter and the nature of the remarks that the jury could have been influenced to the prejudice of the defendant by the statement complained of. See People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 235, 33 Pac. 202. Certainly we cannot hold that this statement 'has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.' Section 4½, art. VI, Const."

We are assured that herein it would be a gross "miscarriage of justice" to reverse the cause, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

IN RE HAMALIAN'S ESTATE.

HAMALIAN v. BABIGIAN.

(Civ. 4104.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 25, 1922.)

1. Executors and administrators $\S$ 194(5) — Prima facie case in application for family allowance made when separation agreement shown to the advantage of husband.

Separation agreement, whereby husband transferred to wife an undivided one-half interest in property of the value of $6,000, and the wife transferred to the husband her interest in property of the value of $41,000, showed upon its face that the husband secured an advantage, and under Civ. Code, § 2235, made a prima facie case in an application for family allowance.

2. Courts $\S$ 200¼—Probate court has jurisdiction to consider application for family allowance.

The probate court has jurisdiction to consider an equitable attack by a wife upon separation agreement made with her husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George H. Hamalian, deceased, Nevrik Hamalian against Ed. S. Babigian, administrator. Appeal by widow, from an order dismissing her petition for family allowance. Reversed.

George Cosgrave, of Fresno, for appellant.
Ohannesian & Ohannesian and Harris & Hayhurst, all of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from an order dismissing the petitioner's application for a family allowance. The petitioner and the decedent were married in February, 1913; their relations were not amicable, and from time to time they lived separate and apart. The last separation occurred May 8, 1919, and on the 26th of May, a purported settlement was made between the petitioner and the decedent of and concerning their property rights. Shortly after that purported settlement the husband died, July 3, 1919. Administration on his estate was commenced, and thereafter the administrator filed in the probate court an inventory and appraisal which showed an estate of an apparent valuation of $41,974.88. When that inventory had been filed the petitioner applied for a family allowance. In her petition she set forth the making of the purported property settlement, but alleged that the same was obtained by and through the false representations made to her by the decedent, and was obtained by and through his coercion. A hearing of said petition was had in the trial court, and the petitioner called to the stand seven witnesses, and also introduced certain documentary evidence. When the petitioner had rested the respondent administrator moved that the application be denied. As shown by the record, both court and counsel looked upon the motion as a motion to dismiss, and as such the trial court ruled on it. On her appeal the appellant claims that she had made a prima facie showing as to false representations and coercion. As to false representations there is some evidence in the record that the decedent stated that he was worth $6,000, whereas, in truth and in fact, he was worth $40,000, or thereabouts. There is neither allegation nor proof that the appellant relied or acted upon any representation made by the decedent. As resting upon coercion the showing contained in the record is that, at the time the decedent called on the appellant for the purpose of negotiating the property settlement, he talked in a loud tone of voice; "he hollered." If the relation of husband and wife, a highly fiduciary relation, was not shown by the record, it must be conceded that the record was so weak as not to support any other ruling than as made by the trial court.

[1] But, disregarding the alleged false representations and coercion, the record as made showed another set of facts, which, taken alone, made out a prima facie case in favor of the petitioner at the time she ceased the introduction of evidence. At that time it had been proved without contradiction that the appellant and the deceased were husband and wife on the 26th day of May, 1919; that on that date a purported contract was made between them, under and by virtue of which the deceased transferred to the wife his undivided one-half interest in certain real and personal property of the value of $6,000, and that at the same time the appellant transferred to the decedent her interest in properties of the value of over $41,000. On the face of the transaction the husband obtained an advantage. The properties the appellant had transferred her interest in may have been heavily mortgaged, and the interests of both parties may have been nominal. Again, although the appellant executed a deed, in form a grant, bargain, and sale deed, the fact may transpire that she had no interest whatever to convey, and therefore she was not wronged. In the face of a motion for a dismissal, when the motion is made at the end of the plaintiff's case, the evidence must be taken most strongly in favor of the plaintiff or petitioner, and, as so construed, the petitioner had made a prima facie showing under the rule stated in section 2235 of the Civil Code. McKay v. McKay, 184 Cal. 742, 195 Pac. 385.

[2] During the argument, a question arose as to the jurisdiction of the probate court to consider the equitable attack made by the petitioner. The point was not discussed in the briefs. The point has been definitely decided in this state, and the question above mentioned is without merit. Estate of Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 554, 129 Pac. 999; In the Matter of the Estate of Cover (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 583.

It was error, therefore, to dismiss the appellant's petition, and the order should be, and the same is, reversed.

PEOPLE v. CRIMMIN. (Cr. 590.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 28, 1922.)

1. Homicide — 237—Evidence held to justify finding defendant sane.

In a murder prosecution, evidence held to justify the jury in finding that the defendant was not insane at the time of the killing.

2. Criminal law — 554—Jury is not bound to accept defendant's testimony.

A jury is not bound to accept as true even the uncontradicted testimony of defendant, especially where facts were exclusively within his own knowledge, and there is no means of disproving his testimony.

3. Criminal law — 834(3)—Instruction on intoxication and insanity held properly modified.

Where the court gave defendant's instructions that defendant's intoxication at time of homicide would not excuse him, but if intoxication had ceased and been followed by insanity, he could not be held accountable, it was proper to strike the concluding words, "The question to be determined is whether or not he was intoxicated or insane, and if you find that he was insane, it matters not how such insanity was produced. Insanity produced by intoxication is just as much insanity as insanity produced by any other cause," since it might mislead the jurors into believing that insanity immediately produced by voluntary intoxication, which disappears on return of soberness, is a defense.

4. Criminal law — 1137(3)—Defendant conceding correctness of instruction may not complain that one he requested is inconsistent with it.

Where appellant has conceded that one instruction correctly states the law applicable, he cannot complain of any inconsistency between it and another instruction which he himself proposed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Michael Crimmin was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Henry Brickley and Frank E. Murphy, both of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of manslaughter and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

At about 11:30 a. m. March 18, 1921, the defendant was arrested for drunkenness at Stockton, and placed in the "drunk cell" of the county jail with other intoxicated men. At 4:10 p. m. the jailer entered the cell to give the prisoners their meals, and found them all asleep. He called them two or three times, but did not succeed in awakening them. At 10:15 that evening one of the prisoners was found dead upon the cell floor, the skull fractured in several places, some of the bones of the face broken, the neck bruised and dislocated, and with blood on the face and hair. The defendant at that time was lying in his bunk. His shoes and pants were bloody. The officer said to him: "That man is dead. Did you do it?" The defendant replied: "I guess I will be tried for murder." One of the witnesses testified that between 8 and 9 o'clock the next morning the defendant said: "I have been drinking very heavy. * * * I have been drinking alcohol." On being asked if he hit the deceased the defendant said: "Yes; I hit him; he annoyed me in my cell, pulling my clothes, and I think I knocked him down. * * * I went back and went to bed, and he came after me again. * * * I got up and hit him again." When asked if he kicked the deceased and why, the defendant replied: "I think so. * * * I think he called me a son of a bitch." Another witness gave substantially the same testimony, and stated that the defendant said: "Well, it seems like a dream. * * * I guess I got the delirium tremens."

[1, 2] At the trial the defendant testified that for 10 days prior to the homicide he had been "drinking denatured alcohol, lemon extract, Jamaica ginger, and wintergreen"; that the night of the homicide he heard voices calling him vile names and threatening to kill him; that he saw a horse, which was singing a song called "Casey Jones"; that he saw a cat dancing a jig; that he noticed hands and rats and swarms of red ants; and he related other things, which he imagined he saw and experienced. Basing their answers on defendant's testimony, several physicians testified that in their opinion he was insane at the time of the homicide. From October, 1914, to May, 1915, the defendant was confined in the state hospital at Stockton for insanity produced by intoxication. In 1917 he was in the Merced county hospital a month for alcoholism.

Appellant contends that the evidence shows without substantial conflict that the defendant was insane at the time of the homicide. Enough has already been stated to show that the jury was justified in finding to the contrary. It further appears that the defendant not only gave the officers an account of what occurred, but that he testified at his preliminary examination and was examined by the medical staff of the state hospital. At no time prior to the trial did he mention the hallucinations with which it is now claimed he was afflicted on the night of the tragedy. A jury is not bound to accept as true even the uncontradicted testimony of a defendant, especially where the facts are exclusively within his own knowledge and there is no means of disproving the testimony. His story here is substantially contradicted by his previous statements and the surrounding circumstances.

[3] The court gave an instruction which, as stated by appellant, "is in the language of Mr. Justice Henshaw in the case of People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 233, 54 Pac. 830, cited and approved in People v. Hower, 151 Cal. 638, 91 Pac. 507." Appellant says:

"As an abstract proposition of law it is undoubtedly correct, but we contend it is inapplicable to the facts in the case at bar."

Appellant's contention is based upon his claim that the evidence shows without conflict that the defendant was suffering from delirium tremens, but there was ample evidence to support the inference that he was suffering from drunkenness instead.

The defendant proposed the following instruction and the court gave it as modified by striking out the part inclosed in parenthesis:

"It is true that under the laws of this state no act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition, yet there is a distinction to be made between a state of intoxication and a condition of mind following such state of intoxication. If at the time of the commission of the alleged homicide the defendant was actually intoxicated such state of intoxication would not justify or excuse him in the commission of the homicide. But if, on the other hand, the state of acute intoxication had ceased and another condition of mind had taken its place and such condition of mind rendered him insane and irresponsible for his acts and conduct, then he cannot be held accountable for such acts and conduct. (The question to be determined is whether or not he was intoxicated or insane, and if you find that he was insane it matters not how such insanity was produced. Insanity produced by intoxication is just as much insanity as insanity produced by any other cause.)"

The modification was manifestly proper. The part stricken out is subject to the objection discussed in People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 233, 54 Pac. 830. The part stricken out would naturally tend to confuse the jurors and lead them to believe that insanity, or mental derangement, immediately produced by voluntary intoxication, and which disappears on the return to soberness, is a defense to a criminal charge. If by the part stricken out it was intended to refer to the insanity mentioned in the preceding sentence, then it states no principle of law not embraced within the instruction as given.

[4] At the request of defendant the court gave an instruction on the subject of temporary insanity which appellant contends is in conflict with that first herein considered.

Having held that the first instruction is applicable to the facts, and appellant having conceded that it correctly states the law, he cannot complain of any inconsistency between it and an instruction which he himself proposed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HALL v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 3773.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 14, 1922.)

Master and servant — 367—Truck owner hauling milk for dairyman held "independent contractor" not "servant" or "employee" within Compensation Act.

A motor truck owner in the trucking business, who contracted to haul milk daily for a dairy man at a specified price, having complete charge of the hauling, paying the expenses thereof, guaranteeing timely transportation, and free to haul for others, was an "independent contractor" not a "servant" or "employee" within Civ. Code, § 2009, and the Workmen's Compensation Act, and therefore not entitled to compensation under the act and Const. art. 20, § 21.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Independent Contractor; Servant.]

Proceeding by David Ramgren against E. D. Hall, for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, petitioner Hall applies for a writ of certiorari. Award annulled.

Earl D. Killion, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

JAMES, J. By this proceeding there is presented to the court for review an award made by the industrial accident commission, together with the evidence heard in support thereof. One Ramgren made application under provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended by St. 1917, p. 831) to secure an order allowing to him compensation on account of injuries alleged to have been suffered while in the employ of petitioner. An award was ordered by a majority of the commissioners, the third member dissenting therefrom. It is insisted that the award cannot be sustained for two principal reasons: (1) Because Ramgren was, at the time he was injured, acting not as the employee of Hall but as an independent contractor; (2) conceding that Ramgren was such employee, that the act which he was engaged in doing was one wholly outside of the discharge of any duty owing to or required of him by his employer.

Under the undisputed facts as the record shows them to be, we are of the opinion that the commission erred in its decision, and that the award cannot be allowed to stand. Petitioner, Hall, was a rancher and dairyman. As a dairyman he produced a considerable quantity of milk, which he daily transported from his dairy in Lankershim to a creamery in the city of Los Angeles. Some of the neighboring ranchers were also engaged in the dairy business. Prior to the time that Ramgren began to haul petitioner's milk, petitioner had it transported through the agency of a person who was doing truck service between Lankershim and Los Angeles. This person sold his business to a second one and the latter continued to carry it on for a short while when, being unable to keep up payments which he had agreed to make to his predecessor on account of the purchase of a motor truck, he abandoned the business. Petitioner arranged to purchase that truck, but, so far as the record shows, did not operate it in handling the milk. Ramgren owned a motor truck and for a number of months—eight or more—had engaged in doing hauling for ranchers and any other persons who might be desirous of securing his services. Petitioner, about October 1, 1920, made a contract with Ramgren to have the latter haul the former's milk daily to Los Angeles. The price agreed upon for the service was $9, if one load was hauled and delivered, and $14, if two trips were made on the same day. Petitioner included the milk of two of his neighbors in making up the loads, and he received from them 18 cents per can for the delivery. He stated, however, that he made no profit on account of transportation of this last-mentioned milk. On the sixth day after Ramgren commenced to haul the milk, he arrived at one of the creameries at which he was to make delivery, and, finding a truck ahead of him being unloaded, started to assist the operator of that truck in passing the cans of milk into the creamery. This he did in order to expedite his own delivery. While placing a can of milk upon an automatic conveyor the fingers of one hand were caught between the can and a beam and badly crushed.

The situation, then, as to the facts material to a consideration of the points mentioned was that petitioner, having a quantity of milk which he desired to have daily transported from Lankershim to Los Angeles creameries, contracted with Ramgren, who was engaged in the trucking business, to have the milk carried at a specified price, varying as to whether there were one or two loads hauled on the same day. Ramgren, in his testimony before the commission, stated that this "employment" with Hall did not prevent him from using any time that might not be occupied in actually transporting the milk, to do hauling for other persons. He stated that it was required of him to furnish the truck and fuel and oil, and that, if anything happened to the truck on the trip, it would be his (Ramgren's) duty to secure other means of transporting the milk. In other words, Hall was without the right to in any manner control the actions or movements of Ramgren. Hall was entitled only to insist that the milk be taken away from the place where it was produced at a seasonable time and delivered with reasonable expedition. As to the route which Ramgren might take, or the manner in which he might handle his own truck, these were matters wholly beyond the right of any control in Hall. We agree with the conclusion expressed by Commissioner Naftzger, in his dissenting opinion, that the facts of this case closely parallel those considered in Flickenger et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission et al., 181 Cal. 425, 184 Pac. 851. The conclusion announced by the Supreme Court in that decision was that the claimant was an independent contractor and therefore not entitled to compensation under the act hereinbefore referred to. Counsel for petitioner pertinently cites Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Brush, 176 Cal. 448, 168 Pac. 890, and section 2009, Civil Code, to the same point. Section 2009, in defining the term "servant"—which is synonymous with "employee"—declares that such person is one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, "otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling and who, in such service, remains entirely under the direction and control of the latter, who is called his master." In the Flickenger Case, supra, our Supreme Court also determined that the Legislature has no power, by any amendment to the Workmen's Compensation Act, to provide that an independent contractor, as the law had determined his character to be prior to the adoption of article 20, § 21, of the Constitution, may claim the benefit of that act, nor to enlarge the definition of the word "employee" as the same was then understood and defined.

Certain other facts shown in evidence we deem immaterial to a consideration of the question just discussed. Those facts were that the state railroad commission, as well as the public utility department of the city of Los Angeles, require certain permits to be secured by persons operating truck businesses, and that Hall, in order to enable Ramgren to transport petitioner's milk, made application as principal for those permits. As a matter of fact, the permit of the railroad commission was not ordered to be issued to Hall until some time after Ramgren had entered upon the discharge of his contract and after he had suffered his injury. The question here concerns not a matter of permits or the regulations of any board, but the legal relation of the parties, as determined by the obligations of their contract and the methods to be used in discharging the same. Petitioner could not have required Ramgren to desist from doing the act in which he was engaged at the time he received his injury; had he assumed to give any such direction, Ramgren might well have answered:

"Under our engagement I have the right to use my own judgment as to means and methods, and the only thing that you can require of me is that your milk shall be taken and delivered at the specified times."

Clearly the rights which could properly be insisted upon by Ramgren show that his position was that of an independent contractor and that he was not a servant or employee of petitioner in any legal sense whatsoever.

Had we reached the conclusion that the relation of employer and employee existed, we would be inclined to hold that, as to the second contention made, petitioner was in error. We think that, assuming the existence of the relation of employer and employee, there was some substantial ground for concluding that the acts being done by Ramgren, at the time he received his injuries, were for the direct benefit of the employer and reasonably included within the scope of his duties. It is unnecessary to analyze the evidence further, particularly that referring to the fact that petitioner arranged for the delivery of other milk than his own, which evidence was material mainly to the claim that petitioner's business was exempt from the provisions of the Compensation Act.

The award is annulled.

JUDSON MFG. CO. v. S. L. JONES & CO.
(Civ. 4098.)

1. Principal and agent — 148(2), 151(2)—Agent's notifying seller of refusal to accept delivery after certain hour held notice that agency to receive terminated at such hour; receipt of goods after termination of authority not binding on principal.

The authorized spokesman for the receiving agent of a company operating a steamer selected by the purchaser of goods to receive same for shipment when delivered at its dock was the purchaser's agent, whose statement to the seller's representative that any shipment received after a certain hour would not be shipped operated as a notice from the purchaser that the company's agency to receive terminated at that hour, so that, if the company, after that hour, without further request by the purchaser, assumed to act as the purchaser's agent in receiving the goods, such act would not be binding on the purchaser.

2. Estoppel — 83(1) — Seller estopped by promise to take possession of goods not delivered by certain hour from claiming value thereof on ground it did not retake possession.

Where a seller's representative, on being informed that the company operating a steamship selected by the buyer for shipment of a quantity of goods to be delivered at its dock would not receive goods delivered after a certain hour, stated that the seller would take possession of loads delivered thereafter, and the buyer relied and acted thereon, the seller could not change its position to the buyer's injury by stating that it did not retake possession of a load, for the value of which it sued.

3. Sales — 161—Railroad, by which seller consigned goods to buyer, held not latter's agent because contract did not specially designate place of delivery in city named.

As respects the question of delivery to carrier as being delivery to buyer, a railroad company, by which a seller consigned goods to a buyer in a named city, was not the buyer's agent because no place of delivery in such city was specially designated, the buyer being entitled to select the point of delivery and give the seller notice in due time.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action to recover the value of goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered. The defendant interposed an answer in which it denied the delivery, and also set up an estoppel. The defendant was given a judgment in the trial court, and the plaintiff appealed.

The case was tried on its merits. The trial court made copious findings, in which it found, among other things, that there was no delivery, and that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming that a delivery was had. For some months the plaintiff and defendant had been engaged in making numerous contracts for the purchase and sale of iron and steel products. Each of those transactions had been carried forward and completed without any controversy arising between the parties. Then, on January 17, 1918, the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff placing an order for goods "f. o. b. steamer San Francisco, * * * shipment —per S. S. Hudson Maru, scheduled to sail from San Francisco March 23," 1918, and which order was designated (purchaser's record) No. 232. On February 11, 1918 (purchaser's record) No. 259, the defendant purchased another bill of goods "f. o. b. steamer San Francisco, * * * shipment by April 24," 1918. Following the practice theretofore existing between them, the defendant notified the plaintiff before February 28, 1918, that the defendant had obtained shipping space and asked that the goods designated in both of the above-mentioned orders should be delivered on board the Yuki Maru scheduled to sail March 4, 1918. After that request was received, and on February 28, 1918, the plaintiffs shipped by Southern Pacific from its factory at Emeryville the goods designated, in car N. W. P. No. 4805 and car S. P. No. 53012, the goods mentioned in both orders. As early as 8 o'clock a. m. on March 1, 1918, the defendant knew of such shipment, and between 8 and 9 o'clock a. m. of that date Mr. H. B. Harmon, representing the plaintiff, and Mr. D. R. Nunez, representing the defendant, met at pier 54, where the steamer Yuki Maru was loading. Such meeting was pursuant to mutual notices exchanged by letters and telephonic messages. At that time the representatives of both parties were endeavoring to ascertain whether or no the shipments could legally be made without violating regulations of the federal government. Before going further, it is proper to state that from the record before us the Associated Terminals Company, a corporation, was the duly appointed agent to receive at pier 54 for those operating the steamship Yuki Maru, freight to be taken on board of that vessel, and that G. W. Wilson was one of the agents of the Associated Terminals Company authorized to act for that company. When, therefore, Mr. Harmon and Mr. Nunez appeared on the wharf, and talked to Mr. Wilson, they were talking to the agent or subagent of the defendant—because Mr. Wilson was the spokesman for the Associated Terminals Company, and that company was the receiving agent for the steamship company that operated the Yuki Maru, the carrier selected by the purchaser. When they appeared on pier 54, and up to the time that they left that pier, according to the uncontradicted testimony in the record, the freight cars hereinabove mentioned had not been placed on the dock. A three-cornered conversation occurred, in which the real point at issue was whether or not the cargoes contained on the two cars could be received and shipped after midnight February 28, 1918, because the new federal regulation had taken effect at that hour. The conversation was of such a nature that Mr. Harmon and Mr. Nunez were definitely advised by Mr. Wilson that any shipment of iron or steel received after 12 o'clock midnight, February 28, 1918, could not and would not be received on board the Yuki Maru. It is a conceded fact that the Yuki Maru was to sail, and did sail, March 4, 1918. Defendant's order No. 259, although shipped from Emeryville February 28, 1918, in car 53012, was not received and was not shipped on the Yuki Maru, but was shipped in the Siberia Maru on a later date, was duly paid for, and is not an issue in this case.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence a duplicate copy of a receipt issued to the Southern Pacific Company by the S. S. Yuki Maru Trans-Oceanic Company, "Receipt for freight delivered," then, "No. 046, N. W. P. 4805, Car No. S. L. Jones & Company. Pier 54. Received of Southern Pacific Company the following article, way bill from Emeryville, point of shipment. Consignor: Judson Iron Works. Date of way bill, 1/3/28. Number of way bill, 1342." Under the heading "Articles" the following: "C. L. Bar Steel. S. L. Company. Yuki Maru. Unloaded 3/2/18, 5 a. m., 561 bars steel." In the lower left-hand corner: "S. S. Yuki Maru. Trans-Oceanic Company. H.," and "561" in a circle. It will be noted that the receipt shows on its face that the car was unloaded March 2, 1918, at 5 a. m. In this connection it is important to state that Mr. Nunez testified that, when he and Mr. Harmon were on the dock at 8 a. m., March 1, 1918, car 4805 was not on the dock. He also stated that neither of the cars were on the dock, and that the dock was comparatively clear of cars, and that cars on the dock could be readily seen and enumerated.

After talking to Mr. Wilson and having heard from him that cars 4805 and 53012 had not arrived in time, and that the loads on the same therefore could not legally be accepted, Mr. Harmon and Mr. Nunez went to the office of the Southern Pacific on Market street and endeavored to get that company to assist them in getting the loads placed on board the steamer. They were advised by the Southern Pacific officials that it was impossible. From there they went to the war trade board and talked to Mr. C. O. G. Miller, the head of the board. Mr. Miller informed them that they were not allowed to ship the steel out of the country at that time if it had not been put on board before 12 o'clock midnight February 28, 1918. They then left Mr. Miller's office, and before they separated Mr. Nunez asked Mr. Harmon if he would take care of the goods until an export license could be obtained. Mr. Harmon said that he would do so as to both cars. He said he would take the two cars to the warehouse of his company. And it may be stated in passing that Mr. Harmon duly issued the proper orders to bring about such a result, and that his associates endeavored during the following weeks to locate car 4805, but failed in their endeavor, but that car 53012 was taken to the warehouse as agreed. On March 2—that is, the next day—Mr. Nunez in a letter repeated the substance of the conversation (Defendant's 2), and on March 4 Mr. Harmon answered that letter and confirmed the agreement (Defendant's 2).

Therefore it had been the practice followed by Mr. Harmon that when a delivery was made he would present a bill for the amount thereof. As to the load on car N. W. P. No. 4805 he never presented a bill.

A few days later the Southern Pacific presented to the defendant its bill for freight. The defendant immediately notified the Southern Pacific that the bill should have been presented to the plaintiff, and at the same time sent copies of the correspondence to the plaintiff.

In this condition the matter rested until August. Whatever became of the shipment is not known. Assuming that the Associated Terminals Company and the Trans-Oceanic Company had been designated as the agents of the defendant the foregoing facts show that both companies had declined to act as such agents after midnight, February 28, 1918. That those companies had so declined Mr. Harmon and the plaintiff had direct and positive notice. If thereafter, without further request on the part of the defendant, the shipping company assumed to act as the agent of the defendant, such act on its part would not be binding on the defendant.

[1] From the facts which we have recited it seems to us that it is patent that, whether the load of N. W. P. No. 4805 was ever placed on board the Yuki Maru, nevertheless such placing was not a delivery as against the defendant. Although the Trans-Oceanic Company had been selected by the defendant, as the agent of the defendant, the shipping company had expressly and positively declined to accept the shipment on behalf of the defendant, and this fact was stated in the presence of the agent of the plaintiff. Until thereafter the defendant was further notified, and until it had given further instruction, the shipping company had ceased to be its agent. 2 C. J. p. 554; Van Dusen v. S. Q. M. Co., 36 Cal. 571, 95 Am. Dec. 209.

[2] And it further appears that the case, as presented by the foregoing facts, shows that on the 1st day of March, 1918, the plaintiff, through Mr. Harmon, stated that it would take possession of the loads on the two freight cars; that such statement was made in the best of good faith, intentionally and deliberately, and led Mr. Nunez and the defendant company to believe, and they did believe, the statement, and did act thereon. Having done so the plaintiff may not change its position to the injury of the defendant by stating that it did not retake possession of the load on N. W. P. No. 4805, and it cannot thus claim the value of said load as against the defendant.

[3] The appellant claims that the Southern Pacific was the agent of the defendant in the foregoing transactions, and cites Meyer v. Sullivan, 40 Cal. App. 723, 181 Pac. 847. As we understand the claim, it is that the contract did not name a place of delivery. In this we think, that the appellant is in error. The contract did name a place of delivery, to wit, San Francisco, and the most that can be said is that no point was specially designated in San Francisco. Under such facts the defendant was entitled to thereafter select the point, and in due time to give the plaintiff notice thereof. This it did, and both parties acted thereon. Under these circumstances it is quite clear that the Southern Pacific was acting as the agent of the plaintiff and not of the defendant.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

REED et al. v. CLARK et al. (Civ. 3896.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 3, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 612(2), 640—Order denying motion to vacate default affirmed, where transcript containing judgment roll is not certified by judge.

An order denying a motion to vacate a default judgment will be affirmed, where the contents of the transcript containing the judgment roll and other documents have been certified by the clerk only, and not by the judge who determined the motion.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1135—Where mere inspection of record discloses no right to relief, order appealed from will be affirmed.

Where a mere inspection of the record discloses that appellant can obtain no relief, the order appealed from will be affirmed for lack of record showing error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Reed and another against Stephen A. D. Clark and another. From an order denying defendants' motion to vacate a default, they appeal. Affirmed.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James P. Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The defendants have appealed from an order made by the superior court on the 16th day of May, 1921, which was an order made after entry of judgment in the action. By said order the court denied a motion of the defendants to vacate the default entered against them, and to set aside an order striking out their fourth amended answer, and that they be permitted to file a fifth amended answer.

[1, 2] Respondents now move that the order appealed from be affirmed, for the reason that appellants have not filed any transcript containing any judgment roll or bill of exceptions upon which said appeal might be considered. There is a typewritten transcript which contains the judgment roll and some additional documents in the form of notices and affidavits. The contents of the transcript have been certified by the clerk, but there is no certificate by the judge of the superior court. The situation is closely parallel to that shown in Barnabee v. Hunstock, 42 Cal. App. 659, 183 Pac. 951. Pursuant to authorities there cited, it was held that, where the order appealed from is subsequent to the judgment, and arises on a record outside the judgment roll it is not for the clerk, but for the judge who determined the motion, to certify the papers and proceedings on which the order appealed from was made, and that in the absence of a record on which the merits of the appeal could be determined, the order should be affirmed. Where a mere inspection of the record discloses that appellant can obtain no relief, "the proper order would be one of affirmance of the order upon appeal for lack of record showing error." Hibernia Sav. & Loan Socy. v. Doran, 161 Cal. 118, 118 Pac. 526.

The order is affirmed.

GREATHOUSE v. DALENO. (Civ. 3673.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 27, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 25, 1922.)

1. Evidence — 397(1)—Parol evidence inadmissible where it varies terms of contract, but admissible where it does not contradict writing.

Under Civ. Code, § 1625, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856, 1860, parol evidence is generally not admissible to vary the terms of a contract which is complete in all its terms, but is admissible where it in no way changes or contradicts the instrument.

2. Evidence — 442(1) — Rule that written agreement supersedes negotiations not applicable to collateral agreement not purporting to affect terms.

The rule that an agreement in writing supersedes all prior or contemporaneous oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter has no application to a collateral agreement upon which the instrument is silent, and which does not purport to affect the terms of the instrument.

3. Evidence — 442(5) — Contemporaneous agreement requiring owner to remove trees to permit contractor to grade land held effectual.

Where written contract to grade certain land on which there were a large number of trees, and to complete the work on a certain date, did not provide for removal of the trees, contemporaneous agreement requiring an owner to remove the trees held effectual, under Civ. Code, §§ 1597, 1598, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856, 1860.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by H. B. Greathouse against Fred Daleno. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; WILBUR, J., dissenting.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke and Dickson F. Maddox, all of Visalia, for appellant, Earl A. Bagby, of Visalia, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 24th day of November, 1920, the plaintiff entered into a written contract with the defendant whereby the plaintiff agreed to level and grade a 40-acre tract of land owned by the defendant. The grade was to be such that water would flow thereon in certain specified directions. The plaintiff agreed to furnish at his own cost all labor, material, teams, machinery, appliances, and outfit for the work, to begin work not later than 10 days from the date of the contract, and to fully complete and finish the same not later than January 1, 1921. Upon failure of the contractor in any material or substantial respect to perform any covenant or agreement contained in the contract, it was stipulated that the owner might at his option terminate the agreement, and that in such event the contractor should have no claim for any work theretofore done by the contractor. It was further provided that time is of the essence of the agreement, and of each covenant thereof.

This is an action by the contractor to recover damages for breach of the contract in the manner stated in the complaint. It is alleged in the complaint:

"That on the day of the execution of said agreement there were situated upon said land to be leveled and graded large numbers of oak and willow trees so situated as to prevent the proper leveling and grading of said lands, but which trees the said defendant, at the time of the execution of said written agreement, as a part of the consideration therefor, and as an inducement unto plaintiff to enter into the same, agreed to immediately remove from the said land at his, the said defendant's, own cost and expense; that the said defendant thereafter-er commenced to remove said trees from said land, but that said trees are not yet removed so as to permit the proper leveling and grading of said lands, but, on the contrary, the defendant still keeps and maintains on said lands large numbers of trees, without the removal of which the plaintiff cannot complete his said agreement for the grading and leveling of said lands; that by the terms of said agreement said plaintiff agreed to fully finish and complete the said grading and leveling not later than January 1, 1921; that plaintiff has not so completed the said grading and leveling, but has in all respects complied with said contract so far as was possible, and would have completed said leveling by said last-mentioned date had he not been prevented from so doing by the said failure of the said defendant to remove said trees; that the defendant, as plaintiff is informed and believes, willfully and intentionally failed to remove said trees, so that said contract could not be completed by the plaintiff by or not later than January 1, 1921; that the plaintiff has at all times been ready, willing and able to perform his agreement aforesaid according to the tenor thereof."

It is further alleged that on or about January 3, 1921, the defendant elected to terminate the contract because the same had not been fully performed, and gave notice thereof to the plaintiff. The complaint alleges:

"That by reason of such termination plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $1,800."

A general demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was presented by the defendant and overruled by the court. The defendant having answered, the case was tried before a jury.

The defendant appeals from a judgment entered against him in the sum of $900 pursuant to the verdict rendered. The case is presented here on the judgment roll, without a bill of exceptions.

Appellant contends that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, because the only fact alleged in the complaint in justification of respondent's failure to perform his contract within the time limited by the contract is that appellant did not comply with a separate oral agreement to remove from the land trees which were an obstruction to the grading, and that, by such failure to remove the trees, appellant prevented respondent from completing the work; that such separate oral agreement, being inconsistent with the terms of the written contract, was incapable of proof, and therefore could not constitute an excuse for plaintiff's failure to complete the work of leveling and grading in accordance with the terms of the written contract. As counsel for respondent does not dispute the proposition that the complaint as written intended to plead an oral contract for the removal of the trees, we shall herein assume that this is a correct construction of the complaint.

[1, 2] The rules limiting the conditions under which oral evidence may be received other than the contents of the written instrument, where the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing, are set forth in section 1625 of the Civil Code, and sections 1856 and 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is admitted to be the general rule that, where a contract in writing is complete in all its terms, parol evidence to vary those terms may not be admitted. A well-understood concurrent rule is that, where the parol evidence which is offered is entirely consistent with and in no way changes or contradicts the written instrument, such parol evidence may be admitted. Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 330, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469; Johnson v. Bibb Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 95, 73 Pac. 730.

"The rule that an agreement in writing supersedes all prior or contemporaneous oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter has no application to a collateral agreement upon which the instrument is silent, and which does not purport to affect the terms of the instrument." Whittier v. Home Savings Bank, 161 Cal. 311, 317, 119 Pac. 92, 95.

[3] We are of the opinion that the oral agreement now under consideration is a contemporaneous agreement as to a matter upon which the writing is silent. The subject-matter of the oral agreement is distinct from that to which the writing relates. The fact being shown that there were trees on the land so situated that they prevented the proper leveling and grading of the land, a condition was thereby established which made it impossible for the contractor to perform his work unless they were first removed.

"Everything is deemed possible except that which is impossible in the nature of things." Civ. Code, § 1597.

"Where a contract has but a single object, and such object is * * * wholly impossible of performance, * * * the entire contract is void." Civ. Code, § 1598.

On the record as here presented, it is to be presumed that upon sufficient evidence the jury found that, at the time when the written contract was made, there was upon the land a large number of trees so situated as to prevent the proper leveling and grading of the land, and that without their removal, the plaintiff could not perform his agreement; in other words, that without the removal of the trees the due performance of the contract by respondent was in the nature of things not possible. But the contract did not bind respondent to remove those trees any more than it would have bound him to remove a house if one had been there. A situation existed which made appropriate a separate agreement with the owner not to pay the contractor any additional consideration, but to create on his property a condition which would make possible the performance of the contract as written. In order to save the contract, another agreement became necessary to deal with the conditions as they existed.

The judgment is affirmed.

CAMBRIDGE CO. v. CITY OF ELSINORE.
(Civ. 3632.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 3, 1922.)

1. Work and labor ⇨12—Recovery may be had on quantum meruit for services rendered and accepted, although contract not strictly performed.

Where one who agrees to perform services acts with a bona fide intention of fulfilling his contract, but fails strictly to do all that he has agreed to do, he may, nevertheless, recover on a quantum meruit the reasonable value of the labor actually done, if such services were beneficial to and accepted by the other party to the contract.

2. Assignments ⇨72—In construction of assignment, main object is to ascertain intention of parties.

In the construction of an assignment, the main object is to ascertain the intention of the parties as in any other contract.

3. Assignments ⇨72—Where no contradiction or ambiguity appears in assignment, apparent meaning regarded as intention.

Where the words of an assignment convey a definite meaning, and there is no contradiction or ambiguity, then the apparent meaning of the instrument must be regarded as the one intended.

4. Assignments ⇨115—Assignee of fee provided by express contract cannot recover quantum meruit for assignor's partially performed services.

Where defendant made a contract with engineer for services, and he assigned to assignor of plaintiff his right to the fee provided therein when contract had been fully performed, held that plaintiff assignee acquired no right except to the fee that might become due by the terms of the express contract between the engineer and defendant, and assignee could not recover on a quantum meruit the reasonable value of engineer's partially performed services.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Cambridge Company against City of Elsinore. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. R. Freeman, of Corona, for appellant. Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action upon a quantum meruit, brought by plaintiff, as assignee of the rights of one Frank A. Lathrop, to recover from the city of Elsinore the sum of $1,680. This sum the complaint alleges to be the reasonable value of services which it is claimed were performed for defendant by Lathrop under a written contract whereby Lathrop was employed as consulting, designing and supervising engineer in the installation of a sewer system for the city. Lathrop assigned his rights to one W. E. Stowell, and she in her turn assigned to plaintiff. Judgment passed for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Lathrop's employment by the city was under an express contract in writing, executed by him and defendant on March 8, 1911. This contract, after reciting that the city officers intend submitting to the qualified voters the question of the issuance of bonds for the construction of a sewer system and to cause such system to be built when the necessary bonds should be authorized and sold, declares that the defendant "hereby engages and employs the said Frank A. Lathrop to act as the consulting, designing and supervising engineer of the said improvement." Following this are certain promises on the part of Lathrop to perform certain specified services for defendant, some to be performed by him before and some after the issuance and sale of the sewer bonds. The contract was entire, and not severable. Under its terms Lathrop was not to receive any pay until after a full and faithful performance of all of the agreed services. It expressly declares, after enumerating the services that Lathrop is to perform, that—

"Said Frank A. Lathrop agrees * * * to forfeit all claim to the fee hereinafter specified, if the work undertaken [the work of constructing the proposed sewer system] cannot be completed in a thoroughly proper and workmanlike manner, in full accord with the plans and specifications, and within the estimated cost."

Then follows a promise on the part of the city to pay Lathrop for his services, the city agreeing, "within 40 days after the completion and acceptance of the construction of that portion of the system provided for by the initial bond issue, to pay to the party of the second part [Lathrop], as compensation for the services herein specified, a total fee amounting to 8 per cent. of the money received from the sale of the said bond issue."

In the year 1911 an election was held at which the question of the issuance of bonds to pay for the construction of the proposed sewer system was submitted to the qualified electors of the city. The affirmative of the proposition failed to receive the necessary number of votes. Nothing further was done until October 28, 1912, when the matter of the issuance of bonds to meet the cost of the contemplated sewer system being again agitated, the city's board of trustees adopted a resolution whereby it was resolved that—

"The construction of a sewer system by the city of Elsinore be started at once, and that Mr. Lathrop be continued as engineer of the contemplated works."

By thus voting to "continue" Lathrop as engineer in the construction of the contemplated sewer system, defendant, in effect, continued the employment that was evidenced by the written contract of March 8, 1911. Indeed, plaintiff's complaint is drawn upon the theory that the services, the reasonable value of which it is seeking to recover, are services that were rendered by Lathrop under his employment of March 8, 1911, continued by the board's resolution of October 28, 1912. Subsequent to such continuance of Lathrop's contract of employment, the issuance of bonds again was submitted to the electors. At this election a bonded indebtedness in the sum of $20,000 for the construction of the first unit of the proposed sewer system was authorized, and the bonds were sold for $21,000, 8 per centum of which ($1,680) is the amount sued for here.

[1] The record before us is most unsatisfactory. It leaves many important facts in complete obscurity. It consists, in the main, of colloquies between court and counsel during arguments upon objections to evidence. It seems to be conceded, however, that Lathrop did not substantially perform the services which he agreed to render under his written contract of employment, and that therefore there can be no recovery upon his express contract with defendant, but this notwithstanding appellant claims that under the doctrine of such cases as Jones, etc., Co. v. Doble Co., 162 Cal. 497, 123 Pac. 290, Katz v. Bedford, 77 Cal. 322, 19 Pac. 523, 1 L. R. A. 826, and Castagna v. Balletta, 82 Cal. 250, 23 Pac. 127, it is entitled to recover, upon an implied contract, the reasonable value of such services as Lathrop did perform. These cases enunciate the well-established rule that where one who agrees to perform services acts with a bona fide intention of fulfilling his contract, but fails strictly to do all that he has agreed to, he may, nevertheless, recover on a quantum meruit the reasonable value of the labor actually done by him, if the services performed were beneficial to the other party to the contract and have been accepted and enjoyed by the latter.

Appellant is met at the threshold with the objection that the assignment from Lathrop to Mrs. Stowell did not convey any right that Lathrop may have had to recover upon an implied contract to pay the reasonable value of partially performed services. The assignment to Mrs. Stowell, contained in a written communication sent by Lathrop from Los Angeles, dated April 21, 1913, and addressed to defendant's board of trustees, reads:

"Mr. President and Members of the Board of Trustees of the City of Elsinore, California, Gentlemen: In consideration of the fact that W. E. Stowell of 2694 West Ninth street, this city, has kindly consented to make, has and is making all such expenditures as have been and may become necessary after April 1, 1913, to enable me to properly fulfill my contract with your city, dated March 8, 1911, on the engineering for a sanitary sewer system for your city, I hereby, with your permission, sell, assign and set over to said W. E. Stowell all of such fees as may be due me under the terms of said contract, to be paid to said W. E. Stowell when said contract has been properly fulfilled by me, according to the terms of said contract. This assignment will not result in any change in the services to be performed by me as stipulated in the said contract, as I will continue in the future, as I have in the past, to personally carry out said contract in full accord with its terms. I will greatly appreciate an official notification, at your earliest convenience, by your honorable body, to said W. E. Stowell, at 2694 West Ninth street, Los Angeles, Cal., that this assignment has been accepted by you. Yours very truly, Frank A. Lathrop." (Italics ours.)

At a meeting of the city's board of trustees, held May 5, 1913, the assignment was "accepted" by the board, and the document was filed with the clerk.

The assignment is not an attempted assignment of money then due to Lathrop, as is contended by respondent in one part of its argument. It is an assignment of the "fee" (8 per cent. of such money as might be derived from the sale of the bonds) which the city, in its written contract of March 8, 1911, agreed to pay to Lathrop "within 40 days after the completion and acceptance of the portion of the [sewer] system provided for by the initial bond issue." It is therefore an assignment of a "fee" to be earned by Lathrop's future services as well as by those already rendered by him. It is the assignment of a "fee" that was not to become due until some time after its assignment to Mrs. Stowell, i. e., on the completion and acceptance of the initial unit of the sewer system.

Assuming, for the purpose of this decision, that if Lathrop had made no assignment he could have recovered the reasonable value of his partially performed services, appellant's right to recover therefor depends entirely upon the nature and extent of the right which Lathrop assigned to Mrs. Stowell, appellant's assignor. It will be noted that Lathrop did not assign to Mrs. Stowell his contract with respondent. Nor did he assign to her whatever moneys might be due or become due to him for any services that he might perform for the city under his employment. The only right assigned to Mrs. Stowell is the right to the "fee" that was to be earned by the complete performance of Lathrop's contract. The assignment to her is an assignment of a specific, well-defined, and definite right, namely the right to "such fees as may be due me, under the terms of said contract," i. e., under the terms of Lathrop's written contract of March 8, 1911, with the city. Further, the assignment fixes the time and the condition of payment to Mrs. Stowell as follows: The "fees" are "to be paid to said W. E. Stowell when said contract has been properly fulfilled by me, according to the terms of said contract."

[2, 3] In the construction of assignment the main object is to ascertain the intention of the parties, as in the case of any other contract. This intention is to be derived from a consideration of the whole instrument, and is to be sought in the words and language employed; and, if the words are free from ambiguity and express plainly the purpose of the instrument, there is no occasion for interpretation. 5 C. J. p. 943. See, also, Lynip v. Alturas School District, 24 Cal. App. 426, 141 Pac. 835. Courts cannot correct suspected errors, omissions, or defects, or by construction vary the contracts of parties. If the words of an assignment convey a definite meaning, and there is no contradiction or ambiguity, then the apparent meaning of the instrument must be regarded as the one intended. Schoonmaker v. Hoyt, 148 N. Y. 425, 42 N. E. 1059.

[4] This assignment needs no construction to ascertain its meaning and scope. It clearly, unambiguously, and with certainty speaks for itself. As plainly as language can express any proposition, it provides that Lathrop's assignee is to have such "fees" as may become due "under the terms of said contract"—i. e., under the terms of Lathrop's contract with this defendant; also that such "fees" are to be paid to Lathrop's assignee when "said contract has been properly [i. e., completely] fulfilled by me, according to the terms of said contract." Every word of the document manifests the intention to make the vitality of the assignment depend upon the fulfillment by Lathrop of his contract with the city. It must have been so understood by all the parties to the transaction. The assignment was made in the course of a written communication addressed by Lathrop to the president and members of the city's board of trustees, whereby the latter were requested to "accept" the assignment. Nothing could be clearer than that, by the language of the writing, the defendant's board of trustees "accepted" the assignment upon the understanding that it was to be restricted in its operation to such "fee" as would become due only upon a complete performance of all the promises made by Lathrop in his written contract with the city, and upon the happening of every contingency which that contract made a condition precedent to the payment of the fee. This being so, we are of the opinion that, as the assignee of Mrs. Stowell, plaintiff acquired no right other than the right to such "fee" as might become due to Lathrop under the terms of his express contract with defendant; and that, as Lathrop never became entitled to such fee, he having failed substantially to perform his contract, it follows that plaintiff cannot recover on a quantum meruit the reasonable value of Lathrop's partially performed services; the right thereto, if any there be, not having passed out of Lathrop under his assignment to Mrs. Stowell. For these reasons the judgment must be, and is, affirmed.

HINKLEY et al. v. WELLS, County Clerk.
(Civ. 4191.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 29, 1922.)

1. Statutes $\S$ 35 $\frac{1}{2}$ —County clerk or secretary of state may not refuse to file initiative petition because affidavit fails to state all qualifications of circulator if he makes satisfactory proof thereof.

Under Const. art. 4, § 1, neither the county clerk nor the secretary of state may refuse to file initiative petition merely because the affidavit fails to state all the qualifications of the circulator if he is in fact qualified and makes satisfactory proof of qualifications.

2. Statutes $\S$ 35 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Affidavit of qualifications of circulator of initiative petition is subject to amendment.

Affidavit as to qualifications of circulator of initiative petition is subject to amendment, and when so amended the affidavit dates back to the time of the filing of the original.

3. Statutes $\S$ 35 $\frac{1}{2}$ — Circulator of initiative petition filed with defective affidavit of qualifications held entitled to file new affidavit.

Circulator of initiative petition under Const. art. 4, § 1, whose original affidavit of qualifications as filed with the county clerk was defective in that it failed to state that the circulator was a qualified elector, held entitled to file a new affidavit supplying the omission as against county clerk's contention that filing of such affidavit would constitute the alteration or removing of public records in violation of Pen. Code, § 113; it being unnecessary that the affidavit be attached to the previously filed petition, or that the petition be delivered to petitioner for refileing.

4. Mandamus $\S$ 7—Writ not issued unless necessary to afford petitioner the relief to which he is entitled.

The issuance of a writ of mandamus is largely discretionary, and should be denied when not necessary to afford the relief to which he is entitled.

Application by A. Burton Hinkley and another for writ of mandamus against J. H. Wells, as County Clerk of the County of Contra Costa. Writ denied.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Archibald B. Tinning, Dist. Atty., of Martinez, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Petitioner Hinkley, as a registered elector of Contra Costa county, circulated in that county a petition proposing a new law in the form of an initiative measure to be submitted to the electors of the state under section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution. Petitioner Kurtz was one of the qualified electors of Contra Costa county, who signed one of such petitions. When the petition was filed with respondent as county clerk of Contra Costa county, a defective affidavit was attached—defective in that the circulator stated therein that he was a "resident" of said county, whereas the Constitution requires that the circulator should be a "qualified elector" of the county in which he obtains the signatures. Upon the filing of the petition the respondent, in accordance with the terms of the Constitution, examined the same, and certified to the secretary of state, as required, the number of qualified electors who had signed the same, first having been satisfied by an examination of the records of registration that the circulator of the petition was a duly qualified elector of the county, and that the petition was in due form. The respondent thereupon attached his certificate of such examination to a certified copy of the original petition, and transmitted the same to the secretary of state. Thereafter it was discovered that the affidavit attached to the original petition was defective in that it failed to state that the circulator was a "qualified elector" of the county. For that reason the secretary of state refused to recognize the certificate of respondent covering said petition.

Thereupon a new affidavit was made by the circulator of the petition, stating his qualifications in full as required, and this was tendered to the respondent, with a demand that he file the same, and attach it to the proper section of the petition, or that he permit the withdrawal of the petition from his files in order that the petitioner herein might attach the new affidavit thereto and refile the same. The respondent refused the demand, upon the ground that to permit the alteration or removal of the petition would be to violate section 113, Penal Code, which relates to the altering, mutilating, defacing or removing of public records. In his answer to the petition for a writ of mandate herein respondent admitted that the original initiative petition and affidavit were in his possession, and alleged that he had examined the signatures attached thereto, as well as the qualifications of the circulator, and had certified them to the secretary of state as in accordance with constitutional requirements. Respondent then alleged that the new affidavit which was offered for filing was identical with the original, except that the words "registered qualified elector" were inserted in place of the word "resident," and that he refused to attach said affidavit to the petition or to refile the petition, on the ground that to do so would be an alteration of the petition.

Technically the original affidavit complied with the requirements of the Constitution; it stated the qualifications of the affiant, but did so imperfectly. That is to say the constitutional requirements are that the circulator of each petition must file an affidavit "stating his own qualifications" among other things. In stating that he was a "resident" of Contra Costa county he stated the truth, because to be a qualified elector he must have been a resident. But a resident of the county is not necessarily a qualified elector thereof. The purpose of the constitutional requirement is to aid the county clerk in his examination of the petition. If, notwithstanding some imperfection in the affidavit, the county clerk finds, as here, that the circulator's qualifications meet the requirements, and upon examination duly certifies the petition to the secretary of state, we do not understand that that official has any other duty than to receive the petition so certified, and submit the proposition to the electors at the ensuing general election if the certificates show the required number of qualified signatures. The duty of the secretary of state is found in the second paragraph of section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution, which reads:

"Upon the presentation to the secretary of state of a petition certified as herein provided to have been signed by qualified electors, equal in number to eight per cent. of all the votes cast * * * the secretary of state shall submit the said proposed law or amendment * * * to the electors at the next succeeding general election."

There is nothing in the quoted language which gives to the secretary of state any power to reject a petition because of any defect in the affidavit of the circulator. In the arguments it is said that the secretary of state is satisfied to receive amended affidavits, and we are urged to issue this writ because the error has occurred in the petitions circulated throughout the state, and to circulate these petitions anew and obtain the necessary number of signatures in the short time allowed would be extremely burdensome and expensive to the proponents of the measure. These are considerations which are not easily denied, but, unless the law requires the respondent to perform the duty demanded, we are not authorized to require him to do so.

[1] In arriving at the legal duty of the respondent it should be observed that the original affidavit is not a nullity, but complies with the constitutional requirements as stating affiant's qualifications. Neither the county clerk nor the secretary of state may refuse to file the petition because the affidavit fails to state all the qualifications of the circulator if he is in fact qualified and makes satisfactory proof of those qualifications.

[2] The affidavit is subject to amendment like an affidavit on a bill of costs, on motion for change of place of trial, on attachment, justification of sureties, and similar proceedings. When so amended the affidavit dates back to the time of the filing of the original. Burnham v. Hays, 3 Cal. 115, 58 Am. Dec. 389; Palmer & Rey v. Barclay, 92 Cal. 199, 201, 28 Pac. 226; Nichols v. Davis, 168 Cal. 570, 143 Pac. 758; Bone v. Trafton, 31 Cal. App. 30, 32, 159 Pac. 819; Gardner v. Steadman, 31 Cal. App. 447, 450, 160 Pac. 834; Jaques v. Owens, 18 Cal. App. 114, 116, 122 Pac. 430; Pittman v. Carstenbrook, 11 Cal. App. 224, 229, 104 Pac. 699; Lundy v. Lettunich (Cal. App.) 195 Pac. 451.

[3] There is no essential difference between the requirement that the affidavit be filed with or at the time, or at the same time as the moving papers, as in the cases cited, and the requirement that it shall be attached to the papers, as in this case. The purpose of attaching the affidavit to the petition is to facilitate identification of the section of the petition. So long as the amended affidavit sufficiently identifies the section of the petition to which it relates, it is a paper which the affiant has a right to file with the county clerk as a part of the initiative proceedings. The method by which the affidavit is to be "attached" is not prescribed—whether by pin or clip, glue, or some other such method—but we are satisfied that, though the county clerk should receive and file the amended affidavit, and though he would not be amenable to any penal statute if he attached it to the original petition by some appropriate way, the law does not require him to either attach the amended affidavit to the petition or deliver the petition to petitioner for re-filing, and the writ should not issue for that purpose.

[4] Though we are satisfied that the petitioner is entitled to have respondent file the affidavit with the section of the initiative petition to which it relates, we do not understand that respondent has refused after demand to do so, but merely that he has refused to attach the affidavit to the petition or to permit the withdrawal and re-filing of the original with the amended affidavit attached. Assuming that the showing is sufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ to require respondent to file the new affidavit, the issuance of the writ is largely discretionary, and should be denied when not necessary to afford petitioner the relief to which he is entitled. Fawkes v. City of Burbank (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 675.

BRYANT v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 3693.)

Patents —203—Where naked reassignment of patent contained no assumption of obligations, no privity exists between patentee and assignees.

Where the owner of letters patent granted to B. and S. the right to use and manufacture the patent, and B. and S. assigned to W. a one-third interest in the agreement, and W. made a naked assignment to others of his entire interest, in an action by the owner against all the parties to recover installments, there being no privity of contract between the owners and assignees of W., Civ. Code, § 1589, has no application, and judgment of nonsuit in favor of all defendants except B. and S. was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Bryant against Herbert L. Smith and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Westall & Wallace and Joseph F. Westall, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. A. Jeffers and Sheran & Alvord, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit in favor of the defendants other than Josiah A. Briggs and Herbert L. Smith.

The appeal was submitted at the January term upon a typewritten record, no part of which was printed in appellant's brief as required by section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure. While in a supplement appellant has, pursuant to an order of court, printed certain documentary evidence from the record, to which no reference is made in his brief, it is wholly insufficient in illustrating the errors complained of. Nevertheless, in the absence of aid from appellant's counsel, we have examined the typewritten record in an effort to ascertain and determine the question presented to the trial court. Briefly stated, it appears therefrom that on June 28, 1918, plaintiff entered into a contract with Josiah A. Briggs and Herbert L. Smith whereby he, as the owner of letters patent

No. 1,258,530, covering machinery, devices, and a process for the manufacture of food products, granted to them, subject to revocation for breach of covenants, the right during the life of the patent to use the same in certain designated states, together with the right to manufacture, use and sell throughout the territory mentioned such machines, implements, and devices invented by plaintiff for the manufacture of such food products, for which Briggs and Smith were to pay a royalty of $2 per ton on all finished products manufactured under the provisions of said letters patent until such royalty amounted to $250,300. The contract further provided that its terms and conditions should apply, bind, and inure to personal representatives of the respective parties thereto, and for breach of the covenants made by Briggs and Smith, Byrant might at his option revoke the grant and terminate the contract. In consideration of the making of the agreement, Briggs and Smith promised to pay in monthly installments on the 7th day of each month certain sums, which in the aggregate amounted to $250.02, and which installments the complaint alleges were paid to March 7, 1920, but that the installments due on the 7th days of April, May, June, and July, 1920, amounting for each month to $250.02 have not been paid, and, for the recovery of which this action was instituted.

After the execution of the agreement, Briggs and Smith assigned to Owen A. Williams a one-third interest in said agreement, subject, however to a 1½ per cent. interest therein to W. H. Hodson and an 8 per cent. interest therein to Margaret A. Brown, after which, to wit, on June 5, 1919, Williams assigned to defendant Mansfield a 10 per cent. interest in said patent and stock and funds derived from the same, and on July 26, 1919, assigned to defendant Peck a 2½ per cent. interest in said patent and stock, and later, on September 30, 1919, assigned to defendant Chandler all his remaining interest in said patent and stock and an interest in 5,500 shares of the capital stock of the Cactus Food Products Company. The assignments from Williams to Chandler, Peck, Mansfield, and Hodson were mere naked assignments, and contained in terms no assumption on their part of any of the obligations imposed by the contract. We are directed to neither allegation nor evidence showing that any of such assignees ever utilized the subject of the patent in the manufacture of food products, or manufactured or sold any of the devices or machinery therefor. Nevertheless, and in the absence of any privity of contract between Bryant and the assignees of Williams, and notwithstanding the terms of the contract under which the monthly installments accrued were executory, appellant contends that, by virtue of the naked assignment of interest so transferred, the assignees and each of them became obligated to pay to plaintiff the monthly installments which Briggs and Smith agreed to pay for the right to use the patented process. In support of his contention appellant cites the cases of Robinson v. Rispin, 33 Cal. App. 536, 165 Pac. 979, and Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 Pac. 52, 10 L. R. A. 369, 21 Am. St. Rep. 63. Neither of these cases applies to the facts disclosed by the evidence herein. In the Rispin Case the contract was executory, and contemplated the boring of certain wells by Robinson for which Rispin agreed to pay him a stipulated price for each vertical foot drilled, after which Rispin transferred his interest in the lands upon which the wells were to be bored, together with the contract, to a corporation for which he, in acquiring the same, acted as agent, and the corporation accepted the assignment with full knowledge of the facts relating to the contract, and Robinson, at its request, fulfilled his part of the contract by drilling the wells. Upon these facts the assignee was held liable under the terms of the contract, for the reason that the contract was fully performed and the benefit inured solely to the assignee, which recognized the original contract as binding upon it and held itself out as personally liable thereon. In the case of Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange the action was brought by the assignor against the assignee, and it not only appears from the decision that the assignee assumed the obligation of its assignor, but an inspection of the record shows that the corporation defendant, by action of its board of directors, formally assumed the obligation of its assignor. Hence neither of these cases is applicable to the facts in the instant case. There was no privity of contract between plaintiff and the assignees of Williams, without which section 1589, Civil Code, cited by appellant, has no application. Chung Kee et al. v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100. In Lisenby v. Newton, 120 Cal. 571, 52 Pac. 813, 65 Am. St. Rep. 203, in discussing a similar question, it is said that—

If, upon the facts here involved, an assignee is liable for the covenants of his assignor. "It must be in consequence of the clause of the contract which in terms extends the obligations of the instrument to the assigns of the parties; but since the promise to pay was only the personal covenant of the promisor, the attempt to include in its force the assigns of the vendee is inoperative; it was not competent for the parties in this manner to create a contract for such assigns."

See, also, California Packing Corporation v. Emirzian (Cal. App.) 187 Pac. 77, and Beazley v. Embree, 41 Cal. App. 706, 183 Pac. 298. While defendants as assignees took the interest in the contract subject to all the conditions thereof, and hence could not enforce any right thereunder against plaintiff without showing performance of the obligations which it imposed upon Briggs and Smith, nevertheless, by the assignment no new contract was created as between plaintiff and such assignees, as to whom no personal liability was imposed in the performance of the covenant to pay the monthly installments, for the reason that there was no meeting of minds essential to the formation of a contract between them.

We are directed to no evidence sufficient to show the existence of a copartnership between the parties, and, even conceding such to have been the case, there is no merit in appellant's contention that the respondents, in favor of whom the judgment of nonsuit was granted, became personally liable upon the obligation assumed by Briggs and Smith.

The judgment is affirmed.

YARBROUGH v. HERBERT. (Civ. 2358.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 29, 1922.)

1. Joint adventures — 5(2)—Finding against in sending a jury back for further deliberations supported by evidence.

In an action based on the theory that defendant refused to account for one-third of the selling price of certain lands, finding against defendant on counterclaim held supported by evidence.

2. Appeal and error — 1011(1)—Judgment on conflicting evidence affirmed.

Judgment on conflicting evidence affirmed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by P. L. Yarbrough against F. W. Herbert. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles A. Bliss and Harry J. Gray, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

John R. Connelly, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1, 2] The action was based upon the theory that defendant refused to account to plaintiff for one-third of the selling price of certain lands in the state of North Dakota, the legal title to which was held by said defendant for "mutual benefit of the said plaintiff, P. L. Yarbrough, the said defendant, F. W. Herbert, and the said C. D. Ackerman in equal shares." The trial court found the existence of a contract among these three according to the claim of respondent; "that the defendants sold said land for the sum of $5,280; that the expenses of the sale and the money advanced by defendant was the sum of $559.88; that the defendant, after deducting the money advanced and the expenses of the sale of said land, had on the 1st day of May, 1918, the sum of $1,573.37 in his possession belonging to the plaintiff," and rendered judgment for respondent for that amount.

It is not disputed that the evidence supports the finding that such contract was entered into, and that the property was sold for said consideration, although some complaint is made of the action of the court in awarding a money judgment for the entire amount, since it appears that a part of the consideration in the hands of appellant is a note of the purchaser upon which is due about $700. But since the sale was made without any consultation with plaintiff, and thereafter the defendant refused to render any account or to recognize the claim of respondent, it was just for the court to treat said note as cash. Besides, it is not questioned that the note is fully worth its face value, and there was no contention at the trial that any loss would be suffered by defendant if it were considered as money.

In fact, the only controversy of any moment at the trial or herein on appeal relates to certain items of an asserted counterclaim or offset on the part of defendant, as follows: Four hundred and sixteen dollars for taxes, which it is claimed that plaintiff promised to pay; $250 collected as rent from Buchold & Hanreich; the sum of $500 collected from one Shelly on a lease; and the sum of $50 collected for pasturage from one Fuller—together with interest on these items. They all arose out of and were dependent upon the purchase of a certain tract of land near Lincoln, Cal., known as the Richard N. Fuller property. It is by virtue of his ownership of this land that appellant claims this credit against respondent. His title was based upon a deed dated August 24, 1917, but on September 28 following, he deeded it to the Auburn Creek Farms Company, a corporation; and there is evidence in the record from which a rational inference may be drawn that, if any indebtedness existed in reference to said items, it was due to said corporation instead of to appellant.

However, this feature may be disregarded, as the evidence amply supports the finding of the court:

"That none of the allegations of defendant's pleading designated a cross-complaint are true, nor is it true that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendant for the sum of $1,550, or any other sum or at all for money had and received by the plaintiff for the use and benefit of the defendant, or for any purpose or manner or at all, and the court finds in this connection that the plaintiff did not receive any money for the use, benefit, or account of defendant, or in any other manner or at all."

In reference thereto it may be mentioned that on September 15, 1917, appellant leased said premises to respondent for the term of one year with the additional provision that—

"In case first party [Herbert] decides to have land seeded the following year to crop, that second party [Yarbrough] shall have the refusal to seed same on the same terms as the first year as herein provided."

This lease remained in force until February 9, 1918, at which time it was replaced by a lease to respondent from the said Auburn Creek Farms Company, in which lease was this recital:

"Reference is hereby made to a certain other lease of even date herewith executed by said first party to Jerry F. Shelley of Roseville, Cal., and it is understood and agreed that the within contract is entered into as compensation to the said second party for services performed in handling the said described lands, by means of securing tenants for said first parties and other services performed in connection therewith."

As justly stated by respondent, each of the items claimed by appellant as credits, except the sum of $416 for taxes, arose under this lease, and according to the view we must take of the record, plaintiff was under no obligation to pay any of these several amounts to any one whomsoever.

As to the taxes, we may state that an agreement existed between appellant and respondent whereby the former agreed to pay the latter a commission of 5 per cent. for his services in the sale of said Fuller ranch, and it is the contention of Herbert—and he so testified—that Yarbrough agreed to pay said taxes out of said commission. But respondent testified directly to the contrary, and the trial court undoubtedly believed him, since it found in harmony with his testimony.

As to the item of $500, the testimony of plaintiff and Jerry F. Shelley was to the effect that said amount was paid to the former for his leasehold rights in said premises. The transaction took place on February 9, 1918, and no reason appears why plaintiff was not authorized to sell said interest, or why he should account to any one for the consideration.

In relation to the item of $50, it is sufficient to quote the following testimony of plaintiff:

"Q. With reference to the item of $50 claimed by Mr. Herbert to have been paid you by Mr. Fuller, I will ask you if you received the sum of $50 from Mr. Fuller. A. Richard Fuller; yes, sir. Q. When did you receive that? A. Soon after the 1st of January, 1918—some time in January I will say. Q. What was this for? A. I hired him pasture on the ranch in question for the month of January or until such time it got too muddy for the stock to run on. Q. You rented him this pasture? A. Yes * * * and by authority of that lease [the Herbert lease] I was renting the pasture."

Mr. Fuller also testified:

"Well, when I sold the ranch I had it put in the agreement that I should have pasturage on the place until January 1, 1918—after that I asked Mr. Yarbrough if I could not leave them there for a couple of weeks for a while—and paid him after that."

The evidence is equally clear as to the item of $250. There was a written agreement between Yarbrough as one party and M. Hanreich and Fred Buchold as the other, for the planting of certain summer crops on a part of said land, and in pursuance of this agreement, Hanreich and Buchold deposited with Yarbrough the sum of $250 as a guarantee "that they would cultivate, farms and grow" said crops. It was further agreed that Yarbrough might use as much of this money as was necessary "in order to accomplish the growing and harvesting of said crops * * * and shall not be required to return to said farmers [Hanreich and Buchold] any part of the said $250 on deposit."

It might be that Hanreich and Buchold could question the right of respondent to withhold this $250, but that question is not involved here. As between plaintiff and defendant, there can be no doubt that the view of the trial court as to said amount must be upheld.

Of course, as far as the judgment of this court is concerned, it can be of no avail that there was some testimony opposed to what we have set out.

At most, the case is one of conflicting evidence, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. QUON FOO et al. (Cr. 850.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 3, 1922.)

1. Witnesses $\Leftarrow$ 397—Jury had right to believe witnesses though testimony conflicted with that at coroner's inquest and preliminary examination.

The jury had the right to believe the testimony of witnesses, though they had given conflicting testimony at the coroner's inquest and at the preliminary examination.

2. Homicide $\Leftarrow$ 170—Testimony that defendant, when identified by other Chinamen, cursed in Chinese held admissible.

In prosecution for murder of a Chinaman, officer's testimony that at the time when he arrested defendant another Chinaman said to the officer, in the presence of defendant, "That was the man," and that defendant in reply cursed back in Chinese, using certain words to which the officer, who stated that he knew the meaning thereof, testified, held admissible.

3. Criminal law ⚡388—Testimony as to experiments with pistol not admissible, in absence of showing that shells were of kind used in the homicide.

In prosecution for murder, testimony as to experiments made by witness with certain pistol to ascertain how far a shell could be thrown at certain different distances from the ground, offered to show that certain empty shells afterwards found in the room where the killing occurred were about in the location they would have been if they were the shells from which the bullets which killed deceased were fired, held inadmissible, in the absence of showing that the shells found in the room were of a particular kind used in the experiments.

4. Criminal law ⚡479—Physician held qualified to express opinion as to character of bullet by which deceased was killed.

A physician, in the course of his practice as an autopsy surgeon, who had examined about 50 cases of gunshot wounds, held qualified to express an opinion that the bullet that killed deceased was a 32-caliber, high-powered cartridge.

5. Criminal law ⚡829(19)—Refusal to charge that a juror should not vote for conviction merely because of the opinion of other jurors held not error.

Where the instructions correctly and sufficiently advised the jury that a verdict of guilty must be found solely on the evidence and the law as declared by the court, the refusal to give defendant's requested instruction that defendant was entitled to the opinion of every member of the jury, and that a juror should not vote for conviction merely because of the opinion of the other jurors, held not error.

6. Criminal law ⚡829(16)—Instruction as to rule in ascertaining credibility of witnesses not necessary.

Where jury was correctly instructed as to rules to be followed in determining the credibility of the witnesses, it was not necessary to give a requested instruction, stating a particular rule to be followed in weighing the testimony of the defendants.

7. Criminal law ⚡829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by given instructions not error.

Refusal of instructions, the subject-matter of which is covered by other instructions given by the court, was not error.

8. Criminal law ⚡865(1)—Remarks of court in sending a jury back for further deliberation held not ground for reversal.

In homicide prosecution, in sending jury back for further deliberation after it had reported inability to agree and with a statement that he hoped they would be able to agree on some verdict, held not ground for reversal.

9. Criminal law ⚡730(7)—Prosecuting attorney's reference in argument to matter evidence of which had been excluded held not ground for reversal.

In murder prosecution, statement of prosecuting attorney, in argument to jury, as to purpose for which a policeman had searched the premises of one of the defendants, though evidence concerning the purpose of the search had been excluded, held not ground for reversal, in view of instructions to disregard the statements.

10. Criminal law ⚡730(7) — Statement of prosecuting attorney, not warranted by evidence, held not ground for reversal, in view of instruction charging jury to disregard it.

In prosecution of Chinaman for murder, prosecuting attorney's reference, in argument to jury to "tongs," though there was no testimony in the case with reference thereto, held not ground for reversal, in view of instruction charging the jury to disregard the statement.

11. Criminal law ⚡1169(1)—Testimony as to experiments held harmless.

In prosecution for murder, the admission of testimony as to experiments made with certain pistol to show how far a shell could be thrown at certain different distances from the ground, for the purpose of showing that certain empty shells which had been found were in the location where they would have been if they were shells from the bullet which killed the deceased, error because of absence of showing that the shells found were of the particular kind used in the experiments, held not a ground for reversal.

Paul W. Schenck, James E. Wadham, and Richard Kittrelle, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendants were convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life. They appeal from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] The evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. It is not necessary to state the testimony. The fact that some of the witnesses for the people had been witnesses at the coroner's inquest and at the preliminary examination, and had there given testimony conflicting with their testimony at the later trial, might have affected their credibility, but did not affect the right of the jury to believe their testimony at this trial. Upon that testimony, and the testimony of other witnesses, facts were established which point very strongly to the guilt of the defendants.

[2-4] It is claimed that sundry errors were committed in the rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence. Very little argument has been presented, and no authorities have been cited in support of these points. The court did not err in overruling objections to the testimony of the witness Chadwick, who stated that at the time he arrested the defendant Wong Loy, another Chinaman said to the witness, in the presence of the defendant, Wong Loy, "That was the man," and that in reply Wong Loy cursed back at him in Chinese, using certain words the meaning of which in English was stated by the witness, who testified that he knew the meaning of those Chinese words. The witness Chadwick was permitted to testify to certain experiments made by him with a 32-caliber Savage automatic pistol for the purpose of showing how far a shell will be thrown from the pistol at certain different distances from the ground when the shell is ejected. Objections were made, one in particular being that there was no showing that the ammunition was the same as that used in the killing of the deceased, Quon You. The apparent purpose of the questions was to show that certain empty shells, afterwards found in the room where the killing occurred, were about in the location where they would have been if they were the shells from which the bullets which killed the deceased were fired. So far as we have been able to discover, the record does not show whether the shells found in the store were of the particular kind used in the experiments of the witness. It was stated, and is not denied, that the distance to which ejected shells would be thrown varies with different kinds of ammunition. We think that the objection to this testimony should have been sustained. The court did not err in permitting Dr. John J. Shea to testify that the bullet that killed Quon You was a 32-caliber, high-powered cartridge. The witness, in the course of his practice as an autopsy surgeon, had examined about 50 cases of gunshot wounds. We think that he was qualified to express an opinion upon the question stated. The remaining exceptions to the court's rulings with relation to evidence offered are merely stated, without argument, and we have discovered no merit in these exceptions.

[5-7] On behalf of appellants, it is contended that the court erred in refusing certain instructions requested by appellants, and which are set out in their brief. The court did not err in refusing to give the offered instruction stating the duty of each individual juror, if he entertained a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, not to vote for a verdict of guilty for the single reason that the other jurors were in favor of a verdict of guilty. Where the instructions given to a jury correctly and sufficiently advise it that a verdict of guilty must be found solely on the evidence and the law as declared by the court, no error will be held to have been committed by the refusal to give the additional advice that the defendant is entitled to the opinion of every member of the jury, and that a juror should not vote for a conviction because of the opinion of the other jurors. People v. Perry, 144 Cal. 748, 754, 78 Pac. 284; People v. Plumeyer (Cal. App.) 202 Pac. 888, 890. The court did not err in refusing to give the requested instruction separately stating the rule to be followed in weighing the testimony of defendants. The jury having been instructed correctly upon the rules which should be followed in determining the credibility of witnesses, it was not necessary to state a particular rule concerning these witnesses because they happened to be the defendants. It has been held that justice would be more surely accomplished if such instructions, directed particularly to the testimony of a defendant, were not given. People v. Boren, 139 Cal. 210, 215, 72 Pac. 899; People v. Fritz (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 348, 350. Concerning the other instructions requested by defendant and refused by the court, a sufficient answer to the exceptions is that the subject-matter of those instructions was correctly covered by other instructions given by the court to the jury. While the language differs in some particulars, the defendants were not deprived of any substantial right in relation to the instructions requested.

[8] After the case had been submitted to the jury, and after they had been deliberating for some time, they returned to the courtroom and informed the court that they were not able to agree. The court replied:

"It is of course your exclusive province to judge of the facts in this case, but I wish to impress upon you the great advisability of coming to some conclusion and rendering your verdict. As you doubtless know, this case has taken a number of days to try, and of course the expense incident to the trial is no small sum, and I sincerely trust that with further consideration of this case you will be able to agree upon some form of verdict. You will retire to your room for further deliberation."

Some time later the verdict was returned. There was no error in the conduct of the court relating to this matter. People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 636, 638, 77 Pac. 666; People v. Cherry, 30 Cal. App. 285, 287, 158 Pac. 335; People v. Bruno (Cal. App.) 193 Pac. 511, 514.

[9, 10] There are three instances of alleged misconduct of the district attorney, in each of which the acts complained of were assigned as misconduct. Likewise, in each instance, the court instructed the jury to disregard the statements made by the district attorney. The first statement was of trifling importance, and probably was inadvertently made. The second statement was made in the course of the district attorney's argument to the jury, and was concerned with the purpose for which a policeman had searched the premises of one of the defendants. The statement was assigned as misconduct on the ground that the evidence offered concerning the reason for that search had been ruled out, and that this was an attempt to prejudice the minds of the jury upon an immaterial matter, to which the district attorney replied:

"I do not so remember it; if it is so, you need not pay any attention to it."

Thereupon the court instructed the jury to disregard any reference to the reasons for the policeman searching the premises, and the district attorney withdrew the statement. The third instance was in the district attorney's argument in reply to that of counsel for the defendants. The district attorney said:

"But they tell you another reason and that is because there is no evidence of a quarrel. Quarrels have nothing to do with the case. Tongs, if I understand them right—and we have had some expert testimony from my friend who just addressed you on the Tong proposition—that if they go out to kill it makes no difference who it is, they will get a human life in return for some fancied crime or some fancied offense."

Counsel for defendants assigned the making of that statement as misconduct. The court instructed the jury that there was no testimony before them with reference to any practice of any tongs, and that they should therefore entirely disregard said statement by the district attorney. Assuming, as we fairly may, that these were the only instances in which the district attorney stepped beyond the bounds of propriety in the course of the trial, it does not appear that there was any persistent or intentional effort on his part to disregard the rights of the defendants. Conceding that these particular assignments of misconduct should be sustained, and taking into consideration the instructions to the jury concerning them, we think that the defendants were not prejudiced thereby.

[11] The one instance of error in the rulings of the court, to which we have referred is not of such character in relation to the entire case that it would justify a reversal of the judgment. The defendants had the benefit of a fair trial. After an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that the record shows no error whereby a miscarriage of justice has occurred.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VUYACICH. (Cr. 1022.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 3, 1922.)

1. Criminal law §785(4)—Refusal of instruction as to caution in receiving testimony of peace officers held proper.

In a prosecution for murder, refusal of an instruction that, in weighing evidence of police officers, care should be used because of their natural and unavoidable tendency to procure and state evidence against the accused, was proper.

2. Criminal law §811(5)—Instructions singling out testimony of witnesses for comment improper.

Instructions which single out testimony of particular witnesses for comment and bear on the weight attached thereto should not be given.

3. Criminal law §742(1)—Credibility of witnesses a jury question.

The credibility of a witness in a criminal proceeding is a matter to be determined by the jury.

4. Criminal law §763, 764(19)—Instruction that a confession should be received with caution held error.

In a prosecution for murder, an instruction that a confession made by the accused should be received with caution was properly refused, since it was objectionable as a comment on the weight of the evidence.

5. Criminal law §535(1/2)—After establishment of corpus delicti, confession of a defendant is sufficient to warrant a conviction.

After proof of the corpus delicti, the confession of a defendant is sufficient to warrant a conviction.

6. Criminal law §538(1), 741(3) — Weight and credibility of confession as evidence for the jury; confession is not conclusive on accused.

The weight and credibility as evidence of a confession are to be determined by a jury on consideration of all the circumstances connected therewith, the confession not being conclusive on the accused.

7. Homicide §169(6)—Exclusion of evidence of what deceased did to defendant's child held proper.

In a prosecution for murder, exclusion of testimony as to the birth of one of defendant's children and what deceased, her husband, did to it the October previous to the homicide, which occurred in May, offered to show the state of defendant's mind, was proper, since the evidence related to matters too remote in time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Mary Vuyacich was convicted of manslaughter, and she appeals. Affirmed.

W. R. Biaggi, of San Jose, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was charged by information with the crime of murder and convicted of manslaughter.

Little need be said of the evidence, as it is not claimed that it is insufficient to sustain a conviction. Briefly stated, it is as follows:

The accused was the wife of one Steve Vuyacich, who was murdered on or about the 9th day of May, 1921. She had been carrying on illicit relations with one Nick Jaramoaz, and they had planned to elope, for the reason given by her that her husband was cruel and had choked one of their children to death. Early in the morning of the day following the commission of the crime here charged, defendant called on her neighbors and informed them that her husband had been murdered by robbers. Shortly thereafter her paramour was arrested and accused of having committed the deed. There is evidence to show that prior to the arrest of defendant for participation in the crime she talked over the matter of the killing of her husband with a woman acquaintance, and related to her the manner in which he had been killed. In this conversation she stated that she and her paramour had killed him and had for a long time intended to do so, that they wanted him to insure his life for $15,000 or $20,000 so that they might be able to go back to the old country. The same story, in substance, was related to the witness at a subsequent period. Thereafter defendant was accused by another acquaintance of having lied to the authorities concerning the manner in which her husband met his death, and was informed by such acquaintance that her paramour had confessed. Defendant then directed this witness to the place where the clothes of the murderer had been buried. She was thereupon arrested. Shortly thereafter she made a confession to the authorities in which she related the details of the murder. She admitted that Jaramoaz and herself had discussed the killing of her husband, and of their intention to return to the old country. She further admitted that according to a prearranged plan Jaramoaz, on the night of the murder, pretended to be a burglar and that he entered the house, threatened her, and demanded that she tie her husband's hands and blindfold him. This she did, and then, as directed, led her husband out of the house, told him to sit down and not be frightened; that she was with him. Deceased followed her directions, whereupon Jaramoaz struck him on the head with a hammer and then stabbed him to death. Defendant at the trial denied making the confession, and testified that on the night of the murder she and Jaramoaz had decided to elope, and that, according to the plans as she understood them, her husband was not to have been murdered but simply tied to a tree so that they could get away, but that after he was taken from the house by Jaramoaz she heard him call for help, and that she then ran to the door and saw Jaramoaz "working fast with a knife"; that thereafter Jaramoaz took off his clothes and they buried them.

[1-3] As before stated, no question is here raised as to the insufficiency of the evidence, but it is claimed that the judgment of conviction should be reversed for the reason that the trial court refused to give certain instructions, and for the further reason that it committed error in refusing to admit certain evidence during the progress of the trial. Defendant asked for and was refused an instruction to the effect that in weighing the testimony of peace officers care should be used because of the natural and unavoidable tendency of such persons to procure and state evidence against an accused. The instruction was properly refused. While in some jurisdictions the rule is to the effect that testimony of peace officers should be received with caution, it has never obtained here. Our courts have consistently held that instructions which single out the testimony of particular witnesses for comment, and instructions bearing on the weight to be attached thereto, should not be given. People v. Keith, 141 Cal. 686, 690, 75 Pac. 304; People v. Converse, 23 Cal. App. 687, 689, 153 Pac. 734; People v. Fritz (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 348. Instructions should be general. People v. Lonnen, 139 Cal. 634, 637, 73 Pac. 586. The credibility of a witness in a criminal proceeding is a matter to be determined by the jury in arriving at their verdict.

[4-6] Defendant further complains of failure of the trial court to instruct the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the defendant made a confession, such confession should be received with great caution, and unless supported by other proof in the case tending to convict her of the commission of the crime, it was insufficient to convict. It is established in this state that after proof of the corpus delicti the confession of a defendant is sufficient to warrant a conviction. People v. Richardson, 161 Cal. 552, 120 Pac. 20. This rule is conceded, but it is claimed that, as defendant denied that she made the confession, it has no application here. A confession is not conclusive against an accused. Its weight and credibility as evidence are to be determined by a jury upon the same principles that they determine the weight and credibility of any evidence; that is, upon the consideration of all the circumstances connected therewith. That portion of the instruction that her confession should be received with caution is a comment on the evidence and is objectionable for reasons heretofore given. The instruction was properly refused.

[7] The next refused instruction complained of relates to the presumption of innocence. The jury was fully and fairly instructed upon this subject. It is also urged that the court erred in sustaining objections to questions relating to the birth of one of defendant's children and what her husband did to it on October 2, 1920. The testimony was offered for the purpose of proving the state of mind of the defendant. The homicide, as heretofore stated, occurred on the 9th day of May, 1921, and the court refused to allow the question for the reason that it related to matters too remote. The objections were properly sustained.

No other questions are presented.

For the reasons given the judgment of conviction is affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

188 Cal. 663

In re WILLIAM'S ESTATE. (Sac. 3294.) (Supreme Court of California. May 2, 1922.) In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge. In the matter of the estate of Caroline William, deceased. Appeal from a judgment denying admission of a will to probate. Affirmed. E. H. Armstrong and W. B. White, both of Grass Valley, for appellant. Nilon & Nilon, of Nevada City, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] It is the opinion of the court that there is enough evidence in this case to uphold the finding of the trial court that at the time of the making of the will the testatrix was not competent to remember her affairs sufficiently to make a will or to remember her relatives and keep the matter in mind long enough to complete the task. Upon that ground the judgment of the court below is affirmed. The court expresses no opinion as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that the will was not properly executed. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NORVALL. (Cr. No. 602). (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 4, 1922). Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge. C. L. Norvall was convicted of violating the Medical Practice Act, and she appeals. Affirmed. Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The charging part of the information against defendant was as follows: "The said C. L. Norvall on or about the 25th day of April, A. D. 1921, at and in the county of Tehama, and state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, willfully and unlawfully did practice, attempt to practice, and advertise and hold herself out as practicing, a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted in this state, without having at the time of so doing, a valid unrevoked certificate from the board of medical examiners of the state of California." She was regularly tried and convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of $300, with the alternative of imprisonment in the county jail at the rate of one day's imprisonment for every $2 of said fine remaining unpaid. We find no error in the record. The proceedings seem to have been entirely regular and in accordance with the requirements of the law. The jury were correctly instructed by the learned trial judge. The evidence supports the verdict and no reason has been shown, nor does any occur to us, after an examination of the record, why there should be any interference with the judgment. No doubt, if counsel for appellant could have discovered any valid reason for calling in question the validity of the result reached in the court below, it would have been presented to this court. The failure to make any argument herein on behalf of appellant is not surprising, in view of the record. The judgment and order are affirmed.

KEENA v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 3951; S. F. 9563.)

1. Trial §296(4, 5)—Instructions held erroneous as ignoring contributory negligence notwithstanding other instructions.

In father's action against street railway for death of child, struck by street car, defended on the ground of contributory negligence of parents, instructions making railroad liable if guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to child's death, without requiring the parents to have been free from contributory negligence, held erroneous notwithstanding other instructions as to contributory negligence.

2. Street railroads §95(1)—Injury not actionable unless caused by negligence.

A street railroad is not liable for the death of a child struck by a street car if the motorman was not negligent.

3. Street railroads §101—Contributory negligence bars recovery.

Where negligence of injured person proximately contributed to the injuries by a street car, the railroad company is not liable, even though it was negligent.

4. Street railroads §118(15)—Instruction on last clear chance doctrine held justified.

In father's action for death of child struck by street car, in which there was conflicting evidence as to whether the car was stopped as soon as it could have been stopped after the gripman saw the child in a place of danger, an instruction on the last clear chance doctrine was proper.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Husband and wife §249—Proceeds of father's judgment for death of child community property.

In father's action under Code Civ. Proc. § 376, for death of infant child, in which the mother was not joined as a plaintiff, under section 378, the proceeds of the judgment in the father's favor become community property, under Civ. Code, §§ 163, 164, 197, 687.

6. Death §24—Negligence of mother imputable to father claiming damages for death of child.

In father's action for death of infant child, in which the mother is not joined as a plaintiff the contributory negligence of the mother was a good defense, not because of her interest in the community property of which the proceeds of a judgment in the father's favor will constitute a part, but because in caring for the child she represents and acts for the community and for the husband as the head of the community, and her negligence in caring for the child is the negligence of the husband.

7. Negligence — §141(1)—General definition of contributory negligence sufficient.

In father's action for death of a child struck by a street car, in which it was claimed that the mother was negligent in not watching the child, a general definition of negligence would be a sufficient guide to the jury in determining whether or not the mother was guilty of negligence under the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Michael T. Kenna against the United Railroads of San Francisco, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. M. Abbott and K. W. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Ivores R. Dains, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages for the death of his minor child, a boy of the age of four years and eight months, who was struck by a Castro street cable car on May 9, 1918, and from which wounds the child subsequently died. The plaintiff was awarded a judgment in the sum of $2,500, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] In his complaint the plaintiff alleged that the defendant's agent negligently operated the car, and by reason of such negligence the child was killed. The defendant answered denying the material allegations of the complaint and pleaded the contributory negligence of the child and also the contributory negligence of the child's parents. The points made by the appellant asking for a reversal will be discussed in the order of their presentation by the appellant. The first two points are so closely allied that they will be discussed together. The plaintiff requested, and the trial court gave two instructions, which the appellant assigns as erroneous. One of the instructions is as follows:

"If you find that, at the time and place in question, the gripman in charge of said car saw said child upon or near the tracks, and did not give any warning of its approach, and if you further find that he was negligent in not doing so, and that such negligence proximately contributed to the death of the plaintiff's child, then your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant."

The other instruction complained of is as follows:

"If you find at the time and place in question, the gripman operating said car drove the same at a dangerous rate of speed, then I charge you that he was guilty of negligence; and, if you find that such negligence proximately contributed to the death of plaintiff's child, your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff and against said defendant United Railroads of San Francisco."

The objection, made to each of the instructions, is that, if an instruction by its terms purports to settle the conditions necessary to the predication of a verdict, it must be correct in its entirety, and must not overlook pleaded defenses on which substantial evidence has been introduced. As the defendant had pleaded the contributory negligence of the child's parents, and as it had introduced substantial testimony in support of its plea, the defendant complains that the instructions were erroneous for, in legal effect, they directed a verdict even though the parents were guilty of contributory negligence. In support of its position the appellant cites and relies on Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700; Killelea v. California Horseshoe Co., 140 Cal. 602, 74 Pac. 157. The respondent attempts to justify the instructions by calling attention to the fact that each of the instructions contained the limitation, "That such negligence proximately contributed to the death." As we understand the respondent, he would argue therefrom that if a defendant is negligent, and the negligence proximately contributes to an injury, then, and in that event, the defendant is liable, notwithstanding that the plaintiff is negligent and the plaintiff's negligence proximately contributes to the injury.

[2, 3] However, we think it is settled law in this state that in such a case as the case before us a defendant is not liable if it is not negligent; again, if it is negligent, and the injured person is also negligent, and the negligence of the injured person proximately contributes to the injuries complained of, the defendant is not liable. The respondent also claims that, in other places, the court had fully instructed the jury on the defenses of contributory negligence and its importance as an element in the case. However, the same argument could have been made and was made in those cases in which the same error was complained of as is complained of in this case. Lemasters v. Southern Pacific Co., 131 Cal. 105, 108, 63 Pac. 128; Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 253, 107 Pac. 309; Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 184-187, 118 Pac. 700; Tognazzini v. Freeman, 18 Cal. App. 468, 472-473, 123 Pac. 540. As the Supreme Court said in Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. at page 253, 107 Pac. 311:

"Nor was the vice of the instruction cured by the general direction that plaintiff must establish every material allegation of the complaint by a preponderance of the testimony. This produced, at most, a hopeless conflict between the various instructions. The different declarations of the court were not capable of being harmonized. In such case it is impossible to determine which of the conflicting rules presented to them was followed by the jury and the error in any of the instructions must be deemed prejudicial. Estate of Cunningham, 52 Cal. 465; Sappenfield v. Main St. R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48 (27 Pac. 590)."

The respondent attempts to distinguish the Pierce Case by calling attention to the fact that there were two children involved. However, the most cursory examination of the case shows that the instruction complained of, and which was held to be prejudicially erroneous, was faulty, not because of the number that had been injured, but by reason of the fact that the instruction took from the jury material facts pertinent to the issues on trial. The respondent attempts to distinguish the Killelea Case by pointing out that in that case the court "recited the evidence and virtually told the jury that, if they found the evidence was true, 'then I charge you that the defendant is guilty of negligence and plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.'" True, but the instructions complained of in this case did the same thing. The trial court recited merely the evidence of the defendant's negligence, and the jury was directed that if they found that the defendant was so negligent that then, and in that event, it should return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and, in so doing, the case of the plaintiff on the issue of contributory negligence was entirely ignored.

In what we have said above we are not to be understood as holding that either instruction was a sound proposition of law in all other respects.

The appellant complains of another instruction which is as follows:

"If you find that the mother of said child permitted the child to go upon the street in front of the house and across the street therefrom, and that she made frequent trips to the window to watch said child, and if you find that she exercised reasonable care in that regard, and that during one of the intervals of time between the mother going to the window, the said child wandered away from where he had been playing, and that the interval of time was not longer than that which would be ordinarily permitted by an ordinarily prudent person under the same circumstances, then contributory negligence cannot be imputed to the parents."

The appellant says that said instruction violates section 19, art. 6, of the state Constitution, which provides that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, and that it took from the jury the question of ordinary care. The appellant also contends that the instruction states in effect that watching a child at intervals constitutes reasonable care. In reply to this criticism, the respondent claims that the instruction particularly defines the meaning of ordinary care, and instructs the jury that if they find that the parent, or parents, of the child, did use ordinary care, then, so far as the parents, or custodians, of the child are concerned, they cannot be held guilty of contributory negligence. We will not attempt to answer the objections made by the appellant. A brief reading of the instruction and of respondent's explanation thereof, both show that the instruction attempts to define ordinary care. Both show that the definition as tendered is to the effect that ordinary care is reasonable care. However, as reasonable and ordinary are interchangeable expressions, the definition does not carry us forward. We will not attempt to frame a full instruction on the subject, and are not to be understood as attempting to do so. However, we call attention at this time to the fact that as an instruction pertinent to the particular facts of this particular case the instruction omits many pertinent matters. It does not state the age of the deceased child, whether the child was allowed to go out of the house attended or unattended, whether the house is in a thickly populated neighborhood, or whether the street and adjacent streets are slightly traveled or busy thoroughfares, nor does it state what is meant by frequent trips to the window. Neither does it state whether the windows were opened or closed, and whether the mother was possessed of good hearing or was very deaf. It seems unnecessary for us to do more than to mention the foregoing as being elements that would enter into the mind of a reasonably careful mother as quieting her mind with reference to the welfare of her child. It is also quite clear that a material change or addition of any one of the foregoing elements might cause any jury to take a different view of the matter.

[4] The appellant complains because the court instructed the jury on the last clear chance doctrine. In this behalf the appellant quotes the testimony of the gripman to the effect that after he saw the child in a place of danger that then he stopped the car as quickly as he could. The respondent replies by pointing to the record and showing that the respondent called two experienced railroad men who testified that the car was not stopped as soon as it could have been. Under these circumstances, we think that the trial court did not err in instructing the jury on the doctrine of the last clear chance. There was a conflict in the evidence, and the jury were entitled to be advised as to the law and then to believe the plaintiff's witness, or witnesses, or to believe the defendant's witness.

The appellant asserts that the verdict of $2,500 was excessive. In view of what has been said above, we think it is unnecessary for us to pass on that point. A new trial must be had, and it should be left to the jury under appropriate instructions to determine the amount without being hampered in any respect by the opinion of this court.

After the above was written, the respondent filed a petition for a rehearing, and in that petition set forth that the father was in no manner responsible for the acts of omission on the part of the mother, and that therefore the instruction on the subject of the mother's contributory negligence was not pertinent because the father is maintaining this action. These matters had not been touched on theretofore by counsel, and, for the purpose of giving the question a full consideration, the court granted a rehearing. In this state a father may maintain an action for an injury to, or the death of, a minor child. Code Civ. Proc. § 376. The mother, having an interest in the subject of the action, and in obtaining the relief demanded, may be joined as a plaintiff. Code Civ. Proc. § 378. The proceeds of a favorable judgment in such an action become community property. Civ. Code, §§ 163, 164, and 687. The father and mother of a legitimate unmarried minor child are equally entitled to its custody, services, and earnings. Civ. Code, § 197. And, under the law of this state, when a right is created in favor of several persons, it is presumed to be joint and not several. This presumption in the case of a right can be overcome only by express words to the contrary. Civ. Code, § 1431. Such an action as the instant case did not exist at common law and is purely statutory. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 276, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50. If a judgment for damages is recovered, the proceeds do not belong to the estate of the decedent and are not liable for the decedent's debts. The recovery is for the injury inflicted upon the plaintiff personally and not for injuries inflicted upon the decedent. Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 277, 290, 42 Pac. 822, 1063. It would therefore appear to be the law of California that the proceeds of such a judgment passed to the surviving husband and wife, one moiety to each. It has been directly held that such is the rule in other jurisdictions. Toner's Adm'r v. South Covington & C. St. Ry. Co., 109 Ky. 41, 58 S. W. 439, 441. Actions for injuries to a child are commonly classified: (1) Action by the child; (2) action by the executor or administrator of the child; and (3) action by the parent. This case does not fall in class 1, nor in class 2, but does fall in class 3. In other jurisdictions it has been held that when the case falls in class 3, and where the statute vests a common joint interest in the award in both father and mother, as does the California statute, contributory negligence of the mother constitutes a defense in an action by the father for the death of a child of tender years. Vinnette v. Northern P. R. Co., 47 Wash. 320, 91 Pac. 975, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328; Nashville Lumber Co. v. Busbee, 100 Ark. 76, 139 S. W. 301, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 754; Darbrinsky v. Pennsylvania Co., 248 Pa. 503, 94 Atl. 269, L. R. A. 1915E, 781; Phillips v. Denver City Tramway Co., 53 Colo. 458, 128 Pac. 460, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 29; Kuchler v.

Milwaukee Elec. R., etc., Co., 157 Wis. 107, 146 N. W. 1133, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 891. In California the earnings of the wife and the earnings of the husband are both community property, and the contributory negligence of the husband may be set forth as a defense in an action by him to recover damages for an injury sustained by the wife. Basler v. Sacramento Gas & Elec. Co., 158 Cal. 514, 518, 111 Pac. 530, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642. The statute makes no distinction between the case last cited and the instant case, and we think that we are controlled by the doctrine declared in the Basler Case and for the reasons there stated. The respondent calls to our attention the case entitled Atlanta, etc., Ry. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 20 S. E. 550, 26 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145. That decision discloses that it was based on a special statute then in force in the state of Georgia. Respondent also relies on the case entitled Macdonald v. O'Reilly, 45 Or. 589, 78 Pac. 753. That case is not helpful. In the state of Oregon the father is the sole heir of a deceased minor child. B. & C. Ann. Codes, §§ 5577 and 5578. Such a suit as the instant case is provided by statute, but it must be maintained by the representative of the decedent and the proceeds become a part of and are administered upon the same as other personal property. B. & C. Ann. Codes, § 381. The Oregon court was therefore logical in holding that the father was not chargeable with the negligence of the mother.

The judgment is reversed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [5-7] We approve of that portion of the opinion holding that the proceeds of the judgment in favor of the father is community property, but we disapprove of that portion of the opinion to the effect that the proceeds of the judgment pass to the parents, one-half to each. The contributory negligence of the mother is a defense to the action on behalf of the community to recover for the death of the child, not because of her interest in the community property, but because in caring for the child she represents and acts for the community and for the husband as the head of the community, and her negligence in caring for the child is the negligence of the husband. We agree with the balance of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, but think that a general definition of negligence would be a sufficient guide to the jury in determining whether or not the mother was guilty of negligence under the evidence.

PFLUG v. BROWN. (Civ. 4249.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 11, 1922.)

Appeal and error ⚡347(2) — Appeal taken more than 30 days after entry of order denying new trial in minutes is too late.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, permitting appeal to be taken within 30 days after entry of the order determining a motion for a new trial, a notice of appeal filed more than 30 days after the entry of the order in the minutes of the court was too late, though within 30 days after the entry in the register of actions.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Pauline Pflug against Julius B. Brown. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Appeal dismissed.

Klein, Clarke & Gerlack, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. J. Hayes, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that it was not taken within the time prescribed by section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said motion is supported by a certificate of the clerk of the superior court, showing that a judgment herein was rendered in favor of plaintiff on November 10, 1921; that on November 17, 1921, defendant served and filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial; that on November 25, 1921, said defendant filed a bond on appeal in due form; that said motion for a new trial was heard on January 6, 1922, and denied; that the following entry appears in the minutes of said court under date of January 6, 1922:

"No. 113527. Pauline Pflug v. Julius B. Brown. In this action, the motion for a new trial came on regularly this day to be heard, and, after argument by counsel for respective parties, it is ordered that said motion be, and the same is hereby, denied."

The certificate of said clerk further states that on February 27, 1922, defendant filed a written notice of appeal from said judgment.

It is apparent from the foregoing recital of facts that the notice of appeal was filed too late, having been filed more than 30 days "after entry in the trial court of the order determining" the motion for a new trial.

Upon the hearing before this court of the motion to dismiss the appeal, appellant opposed the same urging that there was no showing made by respondent that the notice of appeal had been filed more than 30 days after the entry in the register of actions of the denial of said motion for a new trial. It was contended that section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure contemplates such an entry in the register of actions, and not in the minutes of the court. We are cited to no authorities in support of this position, and we think it is without merit.

Upon the face of the record presented to this court, the appeal was not taken in time.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

VIAU v. VIAU. (Civ. 4130, S. F. 9920.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 14, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 11, 1922.)

1. Pleading ⚡9—Unnecessary to allege in hæc verba that consideration of promise to be specifically enforced was adequate where facts are alleged.

It is unnecessary to allege in hæc verba that the consideration for the promise sought to be specifically enforced was adequate, and that the contract was just and equitable, where sufficient facts are alleged from which a court of equity can see that these elements exist.

2. Frauds, statute of ⚡129(3)—Working on farm in partial execution of contract not part performance.

The fact that the purchaser worked on the land in partial execution of an oral contract to convey did not furnish the part performance required to withdraw the case from the stringency of the rule requiring the contract to be in writing; the purchaser never having been given possession.

3. Limitation of actions ⚡36(4)—Delay in suit for specific performance within statute.

Where the complaint in an action for specific performance alleged that defendant repudiated the contract and refused to perform in March, 1916, and the action was not brought until February, 1920, under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, the action was barred.

4. Trusts ⚡95—Fraudulently procuring services in consideration of oral contract to convey held not to create trust in land.

In view of Civ. Code, § 847, providing that the only trusts in relation to real property are those enumerated under title 4 and section 2217, declaring that an involuntary trust is one which is created by operation of law, and section 2224, providing that one who gains a thing by fraud, etc., the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act, is, unless he has some other or better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained for the person who otherwise would have had it, the fact that oral promises by defendant to convey land were made in bad faith and were false and were to deceive plaintiff and to receive the fruits of his labor through fraud did not create a trust, as the thing gained by the alleged fraud was plaintiff's labor, and not title to the land.

5. Trusts ⇨17, 18(3), 33—Defendant not made a trustee of an express trust by her declarations.

The contention that the owner by telling plaintiff to take the land, but she would never give him a deed to it, created a trust, was without merit, Civ. Code, § 852, requiring such trust to be in writing, and section 2222 requiring, in order to create, as to the trustee, a voluntary trust, that the trustee must have used such language in writing as would indicate with certainty her acceptance of the trust made upon sufficient consideration of its existence.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

6. Specific performance ⇨49(2)—Inadequacy of consideration not made good by love and affection.

In suits for specific performance, inadequacy of consideration shown by the evidence cannot be made good by consideration of love and affection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action to compel specific performance by Will Viau against Benjamin H. Viau, administrator of the estate of Mary H. Viau, deceased. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edgar S. Van Meter, C. K. Bonestell, C. M. Ozias, and George Cosgrave, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Gallagher & Simpson, Ray W. Hays, and Ben H. Johnson, all of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant, as administrator of the estate of Mary H. Viau, deceased, from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, who was the son of said deceased.

The complaint alleges on January 2, 1903, Mary Viau, now deceased, acquired title to lots 14 and 15, according to the plat of Orangedale, county of Fresno, Cal., and at said time said property was wholly unimproved except 9 acres planted to young vines; that Mary Viau was the mother of plaintiff, Will Viau, and at the time she acquired title to said property and on other occasions thereafter she promised that, if the plaintiff would remain with her and assist in the planting and improvement of said property and other property then owned by said Mary Viau, she would give said plaintiff the north 20 acres of lots 14 and 15; that plaintiff went on said property in January, 1903, and remained there continuously, supervising and managing and planting and improving said property and working on said land until April, 1918; that frequently during said time he had opportunities to engage in other business undertakings, but was dissuaded from so doing by his mother's promise that, when the property was improved, he should have the said 20 acres of land; that from January, 1903, to April, 1918, the plaintiff, having confidence in the representations and promises of the said Mary Viau and relying upon the same, and solely and only by reason thereof, devoted his entire time and attention to the improvement of the property above described, and other property owned by said Mary Viau, and during all of said time worked his own horses on the said property for the improvement thereof, and for the benefit and improvement of other property owned and possessed by defendant; and the promises made by said Mary Viau were made in bad faith and were false, and were made with intent to deceive and did deceive said plaintiff; that said land was completely planted and improved by March, 1915; that plaintiff then demanded of his mother a good and sufficient deed to said 20 acres, but said Mary Viau at that time refused to give a deed to plaintiff; that Mary Viau now claims to own the whole of said 20 acres and repudiates said trust and denies that plaintiff has any interest in said property; that said property is of the value of $20,000.

Plaintiff prayed for a decree adjudging him to be the owner of said 20 acres of land and directing Mary Viau to convey the same to him.

The action was originally commenced against Mary Viau during her lifetime, and during its pendency she died, and the administrator of her estate was substituted in her place and stead. Mary Viau answered the complaint. She denied ever making the alleged promise to plaintiff; denied that he ever remained continuously on the property or that he supervised, managed, or improved any portion thereof; denied that plaintiff was ever dissuaded by her from entering into any business undertaking whatsoever or that any promises were made by her to him regarding the land. Defendant also alleged that plaintiff had done certain work upon the land in common with his three brothers, and that such work was done by him in consideration of his being cared for and partially supported by defendant; denied that plaintiff at any time by reason of any promise or representation of hers devoted any portion of his time or attention to the improvement of the land described, or ever worked any horses belonging to himself or did any other work upon the property.

The trial court found that the allegations of the complaint were true, and that said Mary Viau did, during her lifetime, claim to own the whole of the 20 acres described in the complaint, and did repudiate the trust set forth in said complaint, and did deny that plaintiff had any interest in said property; that the allegations of the answer were untrue; that plaintiff was deprived of the use and occupation of the premises for the years 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919; that the value of said use and occupation for said period of time was $8,900. The judgment decreed that the plaintiff was the owner of said 20 acres and directed the administrator to convey the same to him and gave judgment for plaintiff for $8,900.

The record reveals that the Viau family consisted of the mother, father, and seven children, four of whom were boys. At the time the alleged promise was made to plaintiff in 1903, he was of the age of 23 years, and was living at the family home with his brothers and sisters. Three of the brothers worked on the property, more or less, during these years, and it certainly cannot be said from a reading of the entire record that the plaintiff contributed more of his time and labor than did the other brothers. He was the eldest son, and, naturally, assumed some of the responsibility about the property, especially as his mother and father separated after the property was acquired, and this forced the mother to look more to her sons. However, a detailed discussion of the evidence in the present case is entirely futile, as the appeal presents to this court merely questions of law.

It is contended by the appellant that the elements necessary to support a decree of specific performance of an oral contract for the conveyance of land are neither pleaded nor proven, and therefore the complaint does not state a cause of action nor the proof warrant the judgment entered.

The complaint is totally lacking in any allegation that the consideration received by the defendant was adequate or that the contract as to her was just and equitable. Reliance is placed upon the case of O'Hara v. Wattson, 172 Cal. 525, 157 Pac. 608, wherein it is said:

"The cross-complaint will be scanned in vain to discover therein any allegation of the adequacy of the consideration moving from defendant to plaintiff's intestate or of the justness and reasonableness of the contract. Yet from the early case of Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 346, consistently down it has been uniformly held that such averments are essential to a good pleading in equity for specific performance. Only a few of these cases need be cited: Civ. Code, § 3391; Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 170, 66 Pac. 231; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 616, 87 Pac. 193; Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 788, 96 Pac. 806; Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 234, 236, 142 Pac. 67; Young v. Mathew Turner Co., 168 Cal. 671, 143 Pac. 1029."

[1] While it is true that it is unnecessary to allege in hæc verba that the consideration for the promise sought to be specifically enforced was adequate, and that the contract was just and equitable, where sufficient facts are alleged from which a court of equity can see that these elements exist (Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 170, 66 Pac. 231; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 616, 87 Pac. 193), in the present case the complaint does not show facts from which the court could make such deductions. It alleges that the property is worth $20,000. What the value of farm labor was during the years from 1903 to 1915 is not alleged and is not in evidence; and it is also clear from the evidence that the plaintiff did not work on the ranch continuously during these years, but it appears that he was away on several occasions, that he was ill part of the time, and that he did engage in other business enterprises during part of the time he was at the property. The trial court did not find that the consideration for the alleged promise of Mary H. Viau was adequate, or that the contract was, as to her, just and equitable. Inadequacy of consideration shown by the evidence cannot be made good by considerations of love and affection. O'Hara v. Wattson, 172 Cal. at page 537, 157 Pac. 610. In the last-cited case the meaning of section 3391 of our Civil Code was carefully discussed, and it was decided that it is "beyond the reach of successful argument that the laws of the state of California declare to its courts of equity that they shall deny the equitable relief of specific performance when they find an inadequacy of price standing alone. Such has been the universal rule of decision in this state. * * *" Respondent contends, however, that the present case falls within the rule of Fleischman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 256, 67 Pac. 276, and that the court will not attempt to place a money value upon the personal services of the respondent, but will presume that a breach of an agreement to transfer real property cannot be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation. However that may be in the present case, we are not called upon to decide the question, because, if the action is to be regarded as one for specific performance of an oral contract to convey land, it would seem that there is not only the objection to the pleadings and proof above discussed, but also the further objection that such a contract as is here sought to be enforced is within the purview of the statute of frauds.

[2] The fact that plaintiff worked upon the land in partial execution of the oral contract does not furnish the part performance required to withdraw the case from the stringency of the rule requiring such a contract to be in writing. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 131, 132, 113 Pac. 147; Woerner v. Woerner, 171 Cal. 298, 300, 152 Pac. 919. The plaintiff was never given possession of the land. Mary H. Viau held possession of the same until after the filing of the present action, and plaintiff resided with her in her home, together with her other children.

[3] It is also contended by appellant—and this we think is a decisive attack upon the judgment—that the trial court should have sustained the demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations applicable thereto. Section 339, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc.; Lowell v. Kier, 50 Cal. 646. The complaint alleged that Mary Viau repudiated the contract and refused to perform the same in March, 1916, and this action was not brought until February, 1920. This objection is fatal to the judgment if the action be considered as one for specific performance. However, respondent meets it and the other contentions of appellant by contending that the action is one to enforce a trust, and that, under the findings of the court, the property was charged with a constructive trust in favor of plaintiff, and that constructive trusts fastened upon the conscience of a party are not within the statute of frauds. Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 631, 69 Pac. 428; Hayne v. Hermann, 97 Cal. 259, 32 Pac. 171. It is stated in the supplemental brief of respondent that the case is in no sense an action for specific performance, and it is tacitly admitted that, unless the facts create a trust in the property for the benefit of plaintiff, the judgment must be reversed, as the objections to the showing made for specific performance of an oral contract for the conveyance of land are insuperable.

[4] We are therefore brought to a consideration of this last question as the only real one upon this appeal. Section 847 of the Civil Code provides that the only trusts in relation to real property in this state are those which are enumerated under title 4 of said Code. See, also, McCurdy v. Otto, 140 Cal. 48, 51, 73 Pac. 748. Respondent relies upon sections 2217 and 2224 of the Civil Code. Section 2217 declares that "an involuntary trust is one which is created by operation of law," and section 2224, Civil Code, provides that "one who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act, is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it." It is his contention that, as the trial court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, and as the complaint alleged that the promises made by Mary Viau were made in bad faith and were false and were made with intent on the part of said Mary Viau to deceive the plaintiff, therefore Mary Viau received the fruits of the labor of plaintiff through fraud. Respondent then contends that this constitutes her a trustee for him in respect to the land on which the labor was expended. Such a contention is not warranted by the language of the Code section above referred to, which provides that the thing gained by fraud (in this case plaintiff's labor, and not the title to the land) shall be charged with a trust in favor of the person from whom it was thus fraudulently obtained. The cases cited by respondent in support of his contention are cases where the real property to which the trust was held to attach had been acquired by the legal holder by his or her own fraud or undue influence. The situation in the present case does not create a constructive trust attaching to the legal title of this land under our Civil Code or the decisions of our courts.

[5] Upon the oral argument of this cause there was a contention made by respondent that Mary Viau had made herself the trustee of an express trust by her declarations, testified to by plaintiff and denied by Mary Viau, that "she told me to take the 20 acres, but she would never give me a deed to it." This contention is also without merit. There are two objections to it. In the first place, the trust contended for by respondent would be a voluntary trust, as distinguished from an involuntary trust created by operation of law. Such a trust, relating to real property, is required by section 852 of our Civil Code to be in writing. Second, in order to create, as to the trustee, a voluntary trust with relation to real property, the trustee must have used such language (in writing) as would "Indicate with reasonable certainty his acceptance of the trust, or his acknowledgment, made upon sufficient consideration, of its existence." Section 2222, Civ. Code. The above-quoted language which plaintiff testified was used by his mother indicates no such acceptance or acknowledgment with reasonable or any certainty.

We are unable to see that the facts of this case raise either a voluntary or involuntary trust with relation to real property under the law of this state. The situation is not within sections 2216, 2222, 2223, or 2224 of the Civil Code, and, as stated before, there are no trusts recognized in this state except those provided for in the Civil Code.

The conclusion is unescapable that this judgment cannot be justified if we view the action as one for specific performance of an oral contract for the conveyance of real property, and assuredly it cannot be justified in an action to enforce the execution of a trust, because the facts do not establish a trust. If Mary Viau breached any contract with the plaintiff, he has an adequate remedy at law, or he would have had such a remedy had he pursued it in time, and, if he has lost it by his own laches, that does not afford a reason for according him a remedy not secured to him by the laws of this state.

The judgment is reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 27, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 25, 1922.)

1. Judgment $\Leftarrow$ 249—Form of pleading or failure to ask appropriate relief will not foreclose a plaintiff disclosing facts entitling to some relief.

The form of the pleading or failure to ask appropriate relief will not foreclose a plaintiff, if, upon the facts disclosed, the plaintiff is entitled to some relief.

2. Fraudulent conveyances $\Leftarrow$ 226, 263(1)—Action by judgment creditor to set aside conveyance held to lie; complaint held not sufficient to warrant setting aside conveyances as fraudulent.

Where a daughter obtained a judgment against her father for her maintenance and support, she is entitled, by reason thereof, to maintain an action to set aside a conveyance by her father to defraud her and to subject such property to the judgment lien; but mere allegations of transfers to her stepmother by way of gift, and of the father's ownership of lots at date of judgment sued on, and stepmother's purchase of home residence, without alleging fraudulent transfer, is insufficient as against the stepmother.

3. Appeal and error $\Leftarrow$ 195—Sustaining demurrer to complaint without leave to amend cannot be reviewed unless plaintiff asked permission to amend.

To review an assignment that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without permission to amend, plaintiff must have applied for permission to amend.

Action by Lula Mignon Murphy against S. S. Murphy and wife. From a judgment of dismissal in favor of the wife, Alice K. Murphy, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Cronin, of Stockton, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. A general demurrer to the complaint was interposed by the defendants, and it was sustained without leave to amend as to Alice K. Murphy and overruled as to S. S. Murphy. From the judgment of dismissal in favor of said Alice K. Murphy, following the order sustaining her demurrer, the appeal has been taken. From the complaint it appears that plaintiff is the daughter of S. S. Murphy by a former marriage; that on April 26, 1911, she obtained a judgment against him for her maintenance and support in the sum of $15 per month, and that the amount due under said judgment is $930, as principal, and $179.91 interest. The complaint then proceeds:

"That at the time of the filing of the action in said case No. 9896 as per Exhibit A hereto attached, there stood, upon the official records of the above county, recorded in the name of said defendant S. S. Murphy, ten acres of almonds in the Acampo Orchard and nine lots in the town of Lodi, all of which said property is located in the above county.

"That at said time of filing said case No. 9896, said S. S. Murphy received a United States pension of $12 per month. That since said time said pension has been increased to $40 per month.

"That at said time of filing said case No. 9896 there stood recorded in the name of the wife of said S. S. Murphy, the above Alice K. Murphy, ten acres of prunes only.

"That after the filing of the said action in case No. 9896, the said almond orchard was recorded by deed of gift into the name of the above Alice K. Murphy, and lots Nos. 4 and 17, block 7, East Lodi addition, were recorded sold.

"That upon January 5, 1912, the time from which said judgment in said case No. 9896 was made final, there stood recorded in the name of the said and above S. S. Murphy lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 15, 16, 23, and 24 in block 7, East Lodi addition, town of Lodi, as per Book A, vol. 198, p. 431, of the official records of the above county.

"That since said time said lots have been sold and that no other properties have been purchased and recorded in the name of S. S. Murphy.

"That since said time January 5, 1912, there has been purchased in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy the home residence of the above defendants—February 26, 1913, as per Book A, vol. 225, p. 298, of the records of the above county.

"And also ten additional acres of prunes—lot 37 North Acampo Orchard recorded July 30, 1912, in Book A, vol. 218, p. 393. That since said time—January 5, 1912—there has been recorded in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy a mortgage for $500 against lots 23 and 24, block 7, East Lodi addition, recorded

March 9, 1915, in Book B of Mortgages, No. 124, p. 135, official records of above county.

"That as the husband of the above Alice K. Murphy the said above S. S. Murphy is entitled to and enjoys a community share and interest in the income from all of the above properties which now stand in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy. And that said community interest in said income is subject to the lien of the judgment in the said case No. 9896, Lulu Mignon Murphy v. S. S. Murphy.

"That the properties above described which have been purchased in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy since the date whence the final judgment in the said case No. 9896 commenced, that is, January 5, 1912, and the above mortgage recorded since said time in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy, are incumbered with the lien of said judgment.

"That said above properties are incumbered with the lien of said judgment up to the full valuation of all of the properties sold or conveyed, as above described, out of the name of the above S. S. Murphy since said January 5, 1912, from which said time above plaintiff holds final judgment against the above S. S. Murphy."

The prayer was for judgment against each of the defendants for the amount due in said case No. 9896, and that—

"Said properties and said interest in the income as above set forth be found subject to the lien of the above amounts due under said judgment, * * * for attorney's fees, for costs of court and for $15 per month pendente lite."

[1] No doubt appellant is right in the contention that—

"The form of the pleading or failure to ask for appropriate relief will not foreclose a plaintiff if, upon the facts disclosed, the plaintiff is entitled to some relief." Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 Pac. 673; Zellner v. Wassman et al., 184 Cal. 80, 193 Pac. 84.

[2] It is true, also, that plaintiff, by reason of said judgment, is entitled to maintain an action to set aside a conveyance made by her father to defraud her of the fruits of her judgment and to subject to the lien of said judgment the property thus fraudulently conveyed. This is a fair inference from the following cases cited by her: Jenner v. Murphy, 6 Cal. App. 434, 92 Pac. 405; Sheppard v. Sheppard, 15 Cal. App. 617, 115 Pac. 751; Murray v. Murray, 115 Cal. 266, 47 Pac. 37; Tully v. Tully, 137 Cal. 65, 69 Pac. 700; Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 121 Pac. 720. Many other decisions are to the same effect. But there is no allegation in the complaint to bring this case within the operation of such principle. It does not appear that any conveyance was made with intent to defraud any one or to deprive appellant of the opportunity to enforce her judgment. Nor is any fact alleged from which it can be inferred that any transfer to said Alice K. Murphy was fraudulent. As to the almond orchard there is no allegation, indeed, of the time when the conveyance was made. It does appear that the deed was recorded after the filing of said action in case No. 9896, but that is unimportant in the absence of other allegations. If it may be said that the averment, "the said almond orchard was recorded by deed of gift into the name of the above Alice K. Murphy," may be construed as an affirmation that said orchard was conveyed to said Alice K. Murphy by deed of gift, there is no allegation of any fraudulent intent or that it was executed in contemplation of insolvency or while the grantor was insolvent.

The succeeding allegation as to lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 15, 16, 23, and 24 in block 7, East Lodi addition, etc., is not connected in any way with Alice K. Murphy. It does not appear to whom they were sold, but it must be assumed that they were not sold to her or else the pleader would have alleged it. Of course, if said lots were owned by S. S. Murphy at the time said judgment was docketed and they were not exempt from execution, they would be subject to the lien of said judgment for the statutory period of five years (section 671, Code Civ. Proc.); but the complaint herein was filed some seven years after the judgment became final, and there is nothing in the complaint to show why Alice K. Murphy should be brought into the case in connection with them.

As to the home residence and the ten additional acres of prunes purchased "in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy," no fraud is shown, nor does it appear that they were purchased with community funds. We must assume that the purchase was made with her separate estate, and in good faith from a third party. If the allegation "that as the husband of the above Alice K. Murphy the said above S. S. Murphy is entitled to and enjoys a community share and interest in the income from all of the above properties which now stand in the name of the above Alice K. Murphy" by any possibility could be considered as sufficient to show that said property was community estate and subject to execution, nevertheless, for the reason already stated, the lien of said judgment had ceased to be operative, and upon that theory the complaint utterly fails.

[3] Appellant complains that the court abused its discretion in sustaining the demurrer without permission to amend.

But the decisions in this state are uniform that, to make that a subject of review by an appellate court, it must appear that the party against whom the ruling was made has applied to the lower court for permission to amend. Buckley v. Howe, 86 Cal. 596, 25 Pac. 132; Durrell v. Dooner, 119 Cal. 411, 51 Pac. 628; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 Pac. 689; Williamson v. Joyce, 140 Cal. 669, 74 Pac. 290.

No such showing was made, and it cannot be said that the trial court abused its discretion.

The judgment is affirmed.

57 Cal. App. 346

Ex parte CANTUA. (Cr. 1054.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 13, 1922.)

Habeas corpus $\S$ 85(1)—Evidence held sufficient to support an order holding accused to answer charge of embezzlement.

On application for a writ of habeas corpus, evidence held sufficient to support an order holding the accused to answer a charge of embezzlement.

In the matter of the application of A. R. Cantua for a writ of habeas corpus. Application for writ of habeas corpus to the Sheriff of Alameda County to secure the release of petitioner, A. R. Cantua, from custody on a charge of embezzlement. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Louis Glickman, of Oakland, for petitioner.
Charles Wade Snook, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a writ of habeas corpus. The sole question raised by petitioner is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the order holding the petitioner to answer the charge of embezzlement before the superior court.

The record discloses that the petitioner received a piano from the Heine Piano Company under the terms of a written contract. Certain contentions are made by petitioner regarding the legal effect of this contract, but, after a careful reading of the same, we are satisfied that not only in legal effect, but expressly, it consigns all property to be delivered thereunder to the petitioner for the purpose of sale, the title to said property, and to the proceeds thereof to remain in the consignor. The petitioner sold the piano in question, which he had received under this contract, and accepted a cash payment from the purchaser. A demand for the proceeds of the sale, due to the consignor, was made by said consignor. The petitioner failed to pay over said proceeds and admitted that he had converted said money to his own use.

This evidence is sufficient to support the order holding petitioner to answer to the charge before the superior court. The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

57 Cal. App. 218

CADY v. SANFORD. (Civ. 3670.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 30, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 907(2)—Where appeal contains only documents on motion to enter judgment for defendant on facts found, evidence presumed to sustain findings denying the motion.

Where appeal from an order denying motion to enter judgment in defendant's favor on facts found by trial court comes on bill of exceptions containing nothing but the pleadings, the findings, the judgment, and notice of the motion, it must be presumed that the evidence sustained the trial court's finding.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 931(1)—Finding construed to uphold judgment.

The findings must receive such a construction as will uphold the judgment.

3. Highways $\S$ 184(6)—Details and circumstances of accident presented by findings not inconsistent with general finding of last clear chance and negligence.

Details and circumstances of an accident as presented by the court's findings held not inconsistent with the general finding that defendant had the last clear chance to avoid a collision but negligently failed to do so.

4. Negligence $\S$ 83—Doctrine of last clear chance inapplicable in case of contemporaneous fault.

The doctrine of the last clear chance does not govern, where the negligence of the plaintiff continues to the moment of the accident and both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault at the instant of the injury.

5. Highways $\S$ 175(1)—Neglect of driver at point of collision, discovering peril and able to extricate himself, held to prevent recovery, though other party could have stopped in time.

If the driver of an automobile when he reaches the point of collision and discovers his peril is still in a situation to help himself, and by the use of his faculties is able to extricate himself and avoid injury, his neglect to do so will prevent his recovery, notwithstanding the other party could have stopped in time to avoid the accident.

6. Highways $\S$ 175(1)—Circumstances as stated under which negligence of injured driver in a collision not proximate cause so as to preclude recovery.

Where an injured automobile driver, because of his heedlessness, has reached a point where he can no longer escape injury by the exercise of any reasonably prudent measures which he may adopt and his peril is discovered by the other driver in season to avoid injury, the negligence of the injured driver in reaching his position of peril becomes the condition and not the proximate cause of the injury and will not preclude recovery.

7. Negligence — 83—Doctrine of "last clear chance" stated.

The doctrine of the last clear chance presupposes negligence on the part of the injured party and proceeds upon the theory that, notwithstanding the question of negligence, if the other party, being cognizant of the negligence and the peril in which the party had placed himself, fails to take the necessary precautions to avoid the injury, he is liable on the theory that he had a fair chance to avoid the catastrophe by the use of ordinary care.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by William H. Cady against G. A. Sanford. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Kirk and Wally Vogel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for injuries received in a collision between two automobiles, one of which was being driven by plaintiff and the other by defendant. The case was tried by the court without a jury. Besides denying the material allegations of the complaint, defendant's answer alleges contributory negligence on plaintiff's part. The trial court found that plaintiff was negligent at the crossing where the accident happened, but that defendant had the last clear chance to avoid the collision, and upon that ground gave judgment for plaintiff. Defendant, proceeding under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, moved to set aside the judgment and to enter in lieu thereof a judgment in his favor, on the ground that the conclusions of law are inconsistent with and not supported by the findings of fact. The motion was denied. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion. The sole point made by appellant is that the doctrine of the last clear chance is not applicable to the facts as found by the trial court.

[1, 2] None of the evidence is before us. The appeal from the judgment is on the judgment roll alone. The appeal from the order denying defendant's motion to enter a judgment in his favor on the facts found by the trial court comes here on a bill of exceptions containing nothing but the documents upon which the motion was made, i. e., the pleadings, the findings, the judgment, and the notice of motion. This being the state of the record here, it must be presumed that the evidence before the trial court was ample to sustain the findings. If appellant would question its sufficiency for that purpose, or would claim that the evidence, if brought up, would have impaired the correctness of the findings, he should have presented it to us in a bill of exceptions or by the reporter's transcript. Not having done so, the facts as found by the trial court must be regarded as fully supported by the evidence. Moreover, the findings must receive such a construction, if possible, as will uphold rather than defeat the judgment. Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 Pac. 659.

Coming now to a consideration of the lower court's findings: That court found the facts to be substantially as follows: The accident occurred on January 16, 1920, at about 6 o'clock p. m., at the crossing formed by the intersection of Washington boulevard with Del Rey road, two public highways in the county of Los Angeles, one of which, Washington boulevard, runs in a general northeasterly and southwesterly direction and is intersected at a point between Culver City and the city of Venice by the other highway, Del Rey road, which runs in a general northwesterly and southeasterly direction. On the evening in question, while plaintiff was driving easterly toward the city of Los Angeles along Washington boulevard and on the right-hand or south side thereof, he approached the crossing formed by the intersection of these two highways. At the same time defendant, driving his automobile, was approaching the crossing from the opposite direction, that is, he was traveling westerly along Washington boulevard on the right-hand or northerly side thereof. It was dark when the accident occurred and the headlights of each automobile were lighted.

When defendant reached a point on Washington boulevard about 60 feet easterly of the intersection, he slackened his speed and by raising his arm gave the signal that he intended turning to the left and south into Del Rey road at its intersection with Washington boulevard. At the same time he sounded his horn. Plaintiff did not see the signal nor hear the horn. Defendant continued his course until he came to a full stop immediately before reaching the intersection, when he shifted into low gear and proceeded into the intersection. As defendant started forward from the full stop to which he had come just before reaching the intersection, he saw plaintiff's car approaching from the west and knew that it was traveling at a speed much greater than his own. Defendant's car at this time was traveling at a rate not to exceed 5 miles an hour, while plaintiff's car was approaching the intersection at a speed of about 20 miles per hour. Defendant's car, proceeding into and across the intersection in low gear at a rate of speed not to exceed 5 miles per hour, reached a point about opposite the center of the intersection, when defendant turned his car to the left and proceeded on a curve southerly, intending to enter Del Rey road. From the time that he started forward from the full stop just prior to reaching the intersection, defendant saw and kept his eyes on plaintiff's car, which, proceeding easterly along Washington boulevard, continued to approach the intersection. When defendant started from the place where he had come to the full stop, plaintiff's car was about 350 feet westerly from the intersection. Upon reaching the place where he commenced to turn to the left, which was about 40 feet from the point where he had come to the full stop, defendant continued on a curve to his left for about 30 feet towards and into the path of plaintiff's car, which, approaching from the west, was struck by defendant's car on its left-hand side, at a point about midway between the motor and windshield.

Immediately before the collision and when defendant was about to cross the pathway of plaintiff's car, plaintiff first observed defendant's car. Thereupon plaintiff turned his car toward the right-hand side of Washington boulevard and slackened his speed to about 18 miles per hour.

The two automobiles approached the place of the collision in such a manner that when defendant's car, while making the turning movement to the left proceeded forward across the path of plaintiff's car, a collision was inevitable unless one or the other of the two cars should come to a stop or otherwise yield the right of way or so alter its course as to avoid a collision. At all times subsequent to the time when defendant's car came to a full stop immediately before reaching the intersection, and up to the moment of the collision, defendant had complete control over the movements of his own car, which, proceeding at a rate of not to exceed 5 miles an hour, could have been stopped almost instantly, or within a distance of a very few feet. Defendant saw plaintiff's car approaching the intersection at a higher rate of speed than his own, and knew that plaintiff's car was in danger of collision with his own if he continued his turn to the left and crossed the intersection ahead and in front of plaintiff's car. Plaintiff did not perceive such danger and was not aware thereof until defendant's car had begun to make the turn to the left across the intersection, directly in front of plaintiff's car. At that moment, owing to the close proximity of the two cars and the greater speed at which plaintiff's car was traveling, there was neither time nor opportunity for plaintiff to come to a stop or so to alter his course as to avoid the collision, and defendant then and there had the last clear chance to avoid the accident, but negligently failed to avail himself thereof.

Plaintiff, so the lower court found, was negligent in that he entered the intersection and crossed it as far as the place where the impact occurred at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour. The trial court also found that plaintiff was negligent in that he did not yield the right of way to defendant, whose automobile was nearer the point of intersection of the paths of the two vehicles than was plaintiff's car. But this, notwithstanding plaintiff's negligence, so the lower court found, was not the proximate and direct cause of the accident. The direct and proximate cause, according to the findings, was the defendant's negligence in failing to stop his car before the collision, for he saw plaintiff's car prior to the accident, knew that plaintiff was in a situation of danger, and had the opportunity, by the exercise of proper care, to stop his own slowly moving car and avoid the collision and the consequent injury to plaintiff and his automobile.

[3] Such are the facts as found by the lower court. Are the details and circumstances of the accident, as thus presented by the court's findings, inconsistent with the general finding that appellant had the last clear chance to avoid the collision, but negligently failed to avail himself of the opportunity? That is the sole question presented for our determination. To sustain the contention that the doctrine of the last clear chance is inapplicable, it is claimed: (1) That appellant did not know or have the means of knowing that respondent's automobile could not have been slowed down in time to permit appellant to make his turn in safety, and that therefore he never knew that respondent was in a position of peril; (2) that, if appellant was negligent in any particular, his negligence and that of the respondent were contemporaneous and continued actively up to the very moment of the collision, and that therefore the case is governed by those decisions which hold that the last clear chance doctrine does not obtain where both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault up to the very instant of the accident.

We fail to find any merit in either ground for the asserted inapplicability of the last clear chance doctrine. In support of the first ground it is argued that, because appellant was strictly within his legal rights in attempting to make the turn, he had the right to assume that respondent would decrease his speed and would slow down in time to avoid a collision, and that therefore appellant did not know or have the means of knowing that respondent ever was in a position of peril. This contention is negated by the facts as found by the trial court. It is expressly found that, from the time when he started forward from the place where he had come to a full stop, appellant "saw and kept his eyes on plaintiff's car * * * until the time of the collision," and that—

"At all of said times defendant saw plaintiff's car approaching said intersection at a higher rate of speed than his own, * * * and knew that plaintiff's car was in a situation of danger if defendant should proceed to turn to his left in crossing said intersection ahead and in front of plaintiff's car."

Also that—

"Before the collision defendant saw plaintiff's car and knew that plaintiff was in a situation of danger,"

We need not pause to inquire how or why it was that appellant knew that respondent's car was in a situation of danger while the former was making his turning movement into Del Rey road. It is sufficient that the court has so found. Unless the finding that defendant "knew that plaintiff was in a situation of danger" appears to be inherently impossible when considered in the light of the particular circumstances found by the trial court, we are bound to assume that the finding is fully supported by the evidence; for, since the evidence is not before us, we must assume that, if it had been brought up, it would have sufficed to support each and every finding, unless there be some general finding that is directly contradicted by the special circumstances of the accident as disclosed by the more particular findings of the trial court. The question, therefore, to which we must address ourselves, is this: Is the finding to the effect that defendant had knowledge of plaintiff's peril in time to avert the accident inconsistent with all the circumstances as found by the lower court?

According to the findings, appellant not only observed respondent approaching the danger zone, but discovered respondent's position of peril after the latter was actually in the danger zone, i. e., discovered respondent's peril when it no longer was possible for the latter to extricate himself by the exercise of ordinary care on his part, but while it still was possible for appellant to avoid the accident by adopting reasonable means to that end, as, for example, by using all reasonable efforts to bring his own slowly moving car to a stop. We find nothing inherently impossible in this finding, nor any inconsistency between it and the details of the accident as disclosed by the other findings. At some appreciable time prior to the crash plaintiff was in a position of peril. He was in a position of peril at the very instant that he arrived at that point where he no longer could avoid an accident by exercising ordinary care. Then, and not until then, was the last clear chance doctrine applicable. "The last clear chance doctrine," says our Supreme Court in Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 380, 190 Pac. 40, "was not applicable until he arrived at such a point as to be in peril, and this was the point where he could no longer escape injury by exercising ordinary care." It will be recalled that in one of its findings the trial court finds that respondent, just prior to the collision, slightly decreased his speed and turned to the right; and yet, notwithstanding this attempt to avoid the accident, a point had been reached by respondent where it was too late to extricate himself from the peril of a collision with appellant's car. Meanwhile appellant, according to the court's findings, had observed respondent approaching toward and into the intersection. It is quite possible that if the evidence had been brought up it would show appellant to be an experienced automobile driver, whose trained eye can gauge with great accuracy the speed and the distances from him of other automobiles, and whose experience has taught him much about the idiosyncrasies of other drivers. When we bethink ourselves of all the possible facts which may have been disclosed by the evidence, and which would naturally tend to support the findings, we are unable to say that it was not possible for appellant to have discovered that respondent had heedlessly rushed into a position of peril where he was too late to save himself by any reasonable measures that he might adopt, but where it still was possible for appellant to avert a collision by the exercise of reasonable care on his part.

Until respondent arrived at the point where ordinary care on his part could not extricate him from the danger of a collision, appellant had the right to rely upon the presumption that respondent would observe appellant's turning movement and would take reasonable precautions to avoid being struck by appellant's car. But when respondent reached that point where an ordinarily prudent and careful driver, situated as appellant was, and with a knowledge of the circumstances that were known to appellant, would naturally question respondent's ability to avert the collision by the vigilant use of his faculties and strength, it then became appellant's duty to stop his car or to take whatever appropriate measures were reasonably available to avoid running into respondent's car. It was not necessary that appellant should actually know that an accident was inevitable if he failed to exercise care. It is enough if the circumstances of which he had knowledge were such as to convey to the mind of a reasonably prudent man a question as to whether respondent would be able to escape a collision. In Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 523, 74 Pac. 18, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, the court says:

"It is, of course, true, as urged by defendant, that it is essential to such liability that the defendant did actually know of the danger, and that there is no such liability where he does not know of the peril of the injured party, but would have discovered the same but for remissness on his part. Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227. This, however, does not mean, as seems to be contended, that defendant must know that injury is inevitable if he fails to exercise care, and the decisions indicate no such requirement. It is enough that the circumstances of which the defendant has knowledge are such as to convey to the mind of a reasonable man a question as to whether the other party will be able to escape the threatened injury. One in such a situation is in a dangerous position."

We think it quite within the bounds of reason that, under all the circumstances of the case as disclosed by the court's findings, a point was reached by respondent's automobile where, while there still was time for appellant to avert a collision by stopping his slowly moving car, there was conveyed to appellant's mind, while he was observing respondent's automobile, a question as to whether respondent could escape injury by the exercise of ordinary care on his part. If so, appellant had knowledge of respondent's peril and had the last fair chance to avoid the accident by taking all reasonable measures to stop his car before it crashed into respondent's automobile; and his failure to do so was, as the court found, the direct and proximate cause of the injury.

[4] Equally devoid of merit is the claim that, if appellant was negligent, his negligence and that of the respondent were contemporaneous and actively concurrent as the proximate cause of the injury up to the very moment of the catastrophe. Without doubt, the doctrine of the last clear chance does not govern where the negligence of the plaintiff continues to the moment of the accident, and both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault at the very instant of the injury. But it cannot be said that the facts as found by the trial court in the present case show that the negligence of the plaintiff continued to the moment of the accident, and that both parties were contemporaneously and actively in fault at the time thereof. Respondent unquestionably discovered his dangerous situation just prior to the collision. Upon making that discovery he immediately attempted to save himself as best he could, but it was then too late. The fact that he decreased his speed somewhat and made a turn to the right immediately before the crash, apparently in an effort to avoid the collision, fully justifies the conclusion that he used all reasonable care and made all practicable efforts to save himself as soon as he became alive to his peril, and that therefore he did not continue actively in fault up to the very instant of the injury. His previous negligence ceased when, upon realizing his peril and in an endeavor to avoid the imminent collision, he decreased the speed of his car and turned it toward the right and away from the direction of appellant's approaching automobile. See Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., supra, 140 Cal. 524, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85.

Moreover, this is not a case where the defendant negligently fails to discover the plaintiff's peril in time to avert the injury. In this case, according to the court's findings, appellant actually discovered the situation and realized the danger while it yet was possible to avert the collision by the use of ordinary care on his part. The case, therefore, is not one where the negligence of the defendant consists merely of an omission of a duty before the discovery of the peril. Here the negligence of the defendant consisted of the omission of a duty after his discovery of the plaintiff's peril. Under the findings we are bound to assume that while he was making his turning movement, meanwhile observing respondent, there arose in appellant's mind, shortly before the impact, a question as to whether respondent could escape the threatened injury. During this interval, short though it may have been, appellant had the power to prevent the accident by simply bringing his slowly moving automobile to a stop before it crashed into respondent's car. Since he saw and knew respondent's position of peril as the latter came heedlessly into the crossing, and could have prevented the collision if he had brought his own car to a stop as soon as he became aware that respondent had entered the zone of danger, appellant ought to have anticipated the accident. He failed to do so, and the legal responsibility is his. His negligence, if not his willfulness and wantonness, continued up to the moment of the impact. Such being the case, appellant, who knew the danger, but, in reckless disregard thereof, continued making his turn toward the south, can find no refuge in the fact that respondent, who was not aware of the danger until it was too late for him to avoid it would have known of his peril had he used reasonable care to ascertain it. "In such a case he who knows of the danger and can avoid it, as against one who does not in fact know thereof, has the last clear opportunity to avoid the accident." Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., supra, 140 Cal. 526, 74 Pac. 19, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85.

[5-7] If the driver of an automobile, when he reaches the point of collision and discovers his peril, is still in a situation to help himself, and, by the vigilant use of his ears, eyes, and physical strength, is able to extricate himself and avoid injury, his neglect to do so will prevent a recovery notwithstanding the other party could have stopped in time to avoid the accident; and his failure to make such vigilant use of his faculties when he reaches the point of collision is negligence on his part at the very instant of the accident, and constitutes such contemporaneous negligence at the moment of injury as is spoken of in the cases. But where, as in the instant case, the injured driver, because of his own heedlessness, has reached a point where he no longer can escape the injury by the exercise of any reasonably prudent measures that he may adopt, and his perilous position is discovered by the other driver in season to avoid the injury by the exercise of ordinary care on his part, the negligence of the injured driver in reaching his position of peril becomes the condition, and not the proximate cause of the injury, and will not preclude recovery. In such a case the failure of the injured driver to discover his perilous situation in time to avoid the collision is a precedent negligence, and the failure of the other party, who is aware of the peril, to exercise ordinary care to prevent the injury, is a new and independent negligence and the proximate cause of the injury. This, in substance, is the rule as stated in French v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 76 Vt. 441, 58 Atl. 722, quoted by our Supreme Court in the Young Case, 182 Cal. 369, 190 Pac. 360. The doctrine of the last clear chance presupposes negligence on the part of the injured party, and proceeds upon the theory that, notwithstanding this negligence, if the other party, being cognizant of that negligence and of the peril in which the party had placed himself, fails to take the necessary precautions to avoid the injury, he is liable on the theory that he had a fair chance to avoid the catastrophe by the use of ordinary care; and his failure to exercise it is, under such circumstances, the proximate cause of the injury. In such cases, the defendant's neglect to use ordinary care to avoid the injury, after discovering the plaintiff's peril, is a negligence that differs in every essential from the mere continuation of the plaintiff's original negligence, and is the negligence for which the defendant is held liable.

The authorities cited by appellant present the case where neither party discovered the plaintiff's position of peril until it was too late to avert the injury, or where the plaintiff had a better opportunity than the defendant to anticipate the accident. But that is not the case presented by the findings before us here. In the instant case defendant was negligent in failing to take proper precautions after he discovered plaintiff's position of peril. The following quotation from Brugeman v. Illinois C. R. Co., 147 Iowa, 187, 123 N. W. 1007, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 876, is a correct statement of the rule that obtains in those cases where, as here, the defendant has neglected to avail himself of reasonable precautionary means to avert the accident after he has discovered plaintiff's peril:

"It is one thing to hold that the continuing negligence of a plaintiff will prevent a recovery for a negligent omission of defendant to discover his peril, and quite another to hold that plaintiff's continuing negligence will prevent a recovery for the negligence of the defendant in failing to take proper care to avert the accident after the plaintiff's danger had been discovered and ought to have been appreciated.

If each party is negligent in failing to discover the danger, then the negligence is ordinarily concurring, and the doctrine of last fair chance does not apply. But if defendant discovered plaintiff's negligence and his peril in time to have avoided the injury, and did not take the necessary means to do so, then the doctrine does apply in full force; for in such cases the defendant has the last opportunity of avoiding the collision."

See, also, Wilson v. Illinois C. R. Co., 150 Iowa, 33, 129 N. W. 340, and note thereto in 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687.

The same idea is expressed by our own Supreme Court in the following:

"This doctrine [the last clear chance doctrine] applies where the injured party by his own negligence has placed himself in a position of danger from which he cannot extricate himself, or of which he is obviously unconscious, and the defendant, seeing or knowing his peril or seeing or knowing facts from which a reasonable man would believe him to be in peril, and being able by the use of ordinary care to avoid injuring the plaintiff in his perilous position, fails to use such care and thereby causes the injury." Arnold v. San Francisco, etc., Rys., 175 Cal. 4, 164 Pac. 798.

ERICKSON MOTOR CO. v. RUSSELL.
(Civ. 4087.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 10, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 8, 1922.)

Subrogation — Assignor of contract guaranteeing payment was subrogated to assignee's rights upon payment.

Under Civ. Code, § 2788, plaintiff seller, assigning a contract of sale calling for payment in installments and guaranteeing payment, upon subsequently paying the amount due, became subrogated to the assignee's rights, and was entitled to reimbursement from defendant buyer; and hence, where plaintiff alleged such facts, plaintiff's further allegation that "it is now the owner and holder" of the contract was not a mere conclusion of law rendering the complaint demurrable, but the complaint, as a whole, sufficiently alleged ownership.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by the Erickson Motor Company against A. S. Russell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. R. Cunyngham and H. H. McPike, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment in an action by plaintiff, a guarantor, against the defendant, its principal, for reimbursement, and is taken upon the judgment roll after a trial upon the merits. The sole question to be decided is whether or not the court erred in overruling defendant's general demurrer to the complaint.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff and defendant entered into a conditional contract for the purchase by defendant from plaintiff of a certain Moon automobile, by the terms of which portions of the purchase price were to be paid monthly; that said contract also provided that, if the purchaser failed to perform any of its terms or conditions, the seller might declare the entire purchase price to be due and payable; that subsequent to the making of said contract it was assigned by the plaintiff to the Merchants' Security Company, the former guaranteeing the prompt payments by defendant of the sums due thereunder; that defendant paid to said assignee six of the monthly installments due under the contract, but has failed and refused to pay those later falling due; that thereafter upon demand the plaintiff paid to the Merchants' Security Company the balance due; and that "it is now the owner and holder of the aforesaid contract of conditional sale."

It is to this last allegation quoted from the complaint that the defendant's objection runs, he contending that it is but the statement of a conclusion of law, and does not amount to an allegation that the contract was reassigned to plaintiff, and that therefore the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, for where an action is brought upon an assigned contract such assignment must be alleged. Sutherland, Code Pleading, § 3274.

The point would appear to be well taken if this were the only allegation in the complaint upon the subject of the plaintiff's ownership of the chose in action sued upon (Curtin v. Kowalsky, 145 Cal. 433, 78 Pac. 962), but it is also alleged therein that upon assigning the contract to the Merchants' Security Company the plaintiff guaranteed its prompt payment, and that, the defendant having failed to make certain of the payments provided for, the plaintiff upon demand did so. It is clear that when plaintiff, the guarantor, paid to the Merchants' Security Company, the guarantee, the amount due, it became subrogated to the rights of the latter, and to reimbursement of the amount so paid. "When a guarantor pays his principal's matured debt he at once has a right of action against him to be reimbursed for the amount so paid, whether there is an express agreement by the principal to indemnify him or not." 20 Cyc. 1495. "A person may become guarantor even without the knowledge or consent of the principal." Civ. Code, § 2788. This allegation of payment by plaintiff, the guarantor, taken in connection with the averment that plaintiff is the owner and holder of the contract, was sufficient to show ownership by plaintiff of the outstanding rights thereunder. It was entitled therefore to maintain this action for the recovery from the defendant of the money paid by it to the Merchants' Security Company as a consequence of the defendant's default. Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 Pac. 873.

The judgment is affirmed.

WALLACE v. OSWALD (LEE, Intervener).
(Civ. 4164.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 12, 1922.)

1. Evidence — 354(22)—Book entries by decedent admissible against executor, though not made at time of transaction.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1853, and section 1870, subd. 2, entries made by a decedent in account books were admissible against his executor and successors in interest, though not made at or near the time of the transaction; section 1946, requiring entries to be made at or near the time of the transaction, applying only to entries by strangers.

2. Appeal and error — 1056(4)—Exclusion of evidence prejudicial when nonsuit granted.

The exclusion of evidence offered by plaintiff, consisting of book entries made by defendant's testator, was prejudicial where a nonsuit was subsequently granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Anna T. Wallace against Edmund F. Oswald, as executor of Van Alstine Wallace, deceased, in which Evelyn Jane Lee intervened. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. M. Free and F. H. Bloomingdale, both of San Jose, for appellant.

Rodgers & Smith and Frederick Schneider, all of Palo Alto, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant as executor of the last will and testament of Van Alstine Wallace, deceased, to recover the sum of $1,929.76 alleged to be due from the deceased upon an open, mutual, and current account.

The complaint sets forth an itemized statement of the account, charging deceased with certain items of rents collected and received by him from properties of plaintiff during the period from 1911 to 1919, and crediting him with expenses incurred by him for repairs upon plaintiff's said properties, together with taxes and insurance premiums and various remittances made by him to plaintiff during said period. The answer of the defendant consists in general of a denial upon information and belief of the allegations of the complaint, and sets forth a counterclaim upon a mutual, open, and current account between said decedent and plaintiff for services of decedent in caring for the properties, and for commissions on collection of rents during the period set forth in the complaint. The intervener, Evelyn Jane Lee, filed a complaint in intervention, setting forth substantially the same matters of defense against plaintiff's claim as are contained in said answer. Upon the trial of the cause plaintiff offered in evidence certain entries made by the deceased in account books kept by him in his own handwriting, showing items of rents received by him from properties of the plaintiff. None of these entries were made at or near the time of the transaction, many of them having been made five or six months, and some as late as two years, after the transactions which they purported to record, and upon objection by the defendant the court excluded them upon this ground. The respondents justify this ruling of the trial court by citing the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 1946 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The section in its entirety reads as follows:

"The entries and other writings of a decedent, made at or near the time of the transaction, and in a position to know the facts stated therein, may be read as prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, in the following cases:

"1. When the entry was made against the interest of the person making it.

"2. When it was made in a professional capacity and in the ordinary course of professional conduct.

"3. When it was made in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by law."

[1] In excluding the offered entries the trial court, we think, committed error. When a party litigant seeks to establish his case by the introduction in evidence of his own books of account, he must lay the usual foundation, showing, among other things, that the entries sought to be introduced were made at the time of the transactions recorded. But the entries here in question constituted admissions or declarations of the decedent against his interest, and as such were admissible against the defendant independently of the provisions of the section of the Code above quoted, the effect of which is to broaden rather than to narrow the availability as evidence of writings of the character described. When a party to a civil action has made admissions of facts material to the issue, they are as a rule admissible against him. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2. Entries in account books tending to establish a liability are, like other admissions, evidence against the party making them. Jones on Evidence, § 236. Section 1853 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"The declaration, act, or omission of a decedent, having sufficient knowledge of the subject, against his pecuniary interest, is also admissible as evidence to that extent against his successor in interest."

The defendant in his capacity as executor and the intervener are successors in interest of the deceased. Stoddard v. Newhall, 1 Cal. App. 113, 81 Pac. 666. The provisions of section 1946 of the Code of Civil Procedure are inapplicable to the facts of this case. That section is an adoption in part of the well-established rule by which admissions, declarations, and entries made by strangers to the litigation who are since deceased may under certain conditions be admitted in evidence therein. We have no doubt that under that rule and under the provisions of this section entries in books of account made by a person since deceased may be received in evidence in an action between other parties, if it appear that the person making the entry had knowledge of the facts declared and that the entry was against his interest. Zimmerman v. Bloom, 43 Minn. 163, 45 N. W. 10; Corp. Jur. p. 892, § 1089. The principle is thus stated by Mr. Jones in his work on the law of Evidence (section 323 [2d Ed.]):

"Declarations of Deceased Persons Against Interest—In General.—In several of the preceding sections the discussion has related to the admissibility of declarations or entries made in the regular course of business and as part of the res gestæ. In another chapter we discussed the admissibility of declarations of parties and those identified in interest with parties—that is, admissions. We now come to the consideration of an entirely different class of declarations which should not be confused with those already mentioned, namely, declarations made by strangers, that is, by persons not in privity with the parties to the suit; declarations which are not necessarily made in the regular course of business, but which are received on the ground that they were against the interest of such stranger and irrespective of the fact whether any privity exists between the person who made them and the party against whom they are offered. It has long been settled as one of the exceptions to the general rule excluding hearsay that the declarations of persons since deceased are admissible in evidence, provided the declarant had peculiar means of knowing the matter stated, if he had no interest to misrepresent it and if it was opposed to his pecuniary or proprietary interest. Thus in a leading case on the subject an entry of a charge for services made in a ledger on a certain day by a man midwife for attendance upon a woman when she was delivered of a child was admitted to show the age of such child. It is a fair presumption that men will neither falsify accounts nor commit mistakes, when such falsehoods or mistakes would be prejudicial to their own pecuniary interests. This consideration, together with the facts that the declaration is not admissible during the lifetime of the author, that any fraudulent motive for making the entry may be shown, and that such declarations are frequently the only mode of proof available, are deemed of sufficient force to justify the admission of such declarations, although, the sanction of an oath and the test of cross-examination are wanting."

[2] This quotation from the work of Mr. Jones and section 1946 of our Code of Civil Procedure evidently refer to the same rule of evidence, and make it apparent that the admissibility in evidence of the book entries rejected by the trial court is not governed by such rule, but must be referred rather to the rule stated in section 1853 of the Code of Civil Procedure above set forth. In refusing to admit such entries, therefore, the trial court committed error; and, as it subsequently granted the defendant's motion for nonsuit, it is evident that the exclusion of this evidence was prejudicial to the appellant.

The judgment should therefore be reversed; and it is so ordered.

MORGAN v. CITY OF LONG BEACH.
(Civ. 3711; L. A. 7306.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 20, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 18, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations §220(1) — Employee who rendered services without confirmation of appointment as required by city charter could not recover therefor.

Where city charter requires appointment of employee by a commissioner to be confirmed by other commissioners, an employee whose appointment by such commissioner was not confirmed by other commissioners could not recover for services rendered.

2. Municipal corporations §120—In absence of facts showing urgency, city council's declaration of urgency not sufficient to render ordinance immediately operative.

In the absence of facts showing urgency the mere declaration of urgency by city council will not render an ordinance immediately operative.

3. Municipal corporations §122(2) — City council's declaration of urgency prima facie evidence of existence of emergency.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the court will presume that the city council in making declaration of urgency acted upon sufficient inquiry as to whether or not an emergency existed; the declaration of urgency being prima facie evidence of the existence of an emergency.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Appeal and error §1178(8) — Defendant permitted to amend answer on new trial following reversal of judgment.

Where judgment for defendant is reversed because of defendant's failure to prove certain facts, and a new trial is necessary, the defendant should be permitted to amend its answer and to prove such facts.

5. Municipal corporations §244(1)—If declaration of urgency was unfounded, contract pursuant to ordinance made within 30 days after its passage would be unauthorized, but is valid if made after 30 days.

If there was no foundation for city council's declaration of urgency, so that ordinance did not take effect until 30 days after its passage, a contract made within the 30 days would be unauthorized; but any contract, whether express or implied, made thereafter, would be valid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Cora M. Morgan against the City of Long Beach. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Cora M. Morgan, in pro. per.

George L. Hoodenpyl, of Los Angeles, and Bruce Mason and Charles F. Cook, both of Long Beach, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint herein contains two counts. In the first thereof plaintiff alleged that on the 7th day of July, 1915, she was employed by defendant to perform services for it and on its behalf to install a filing system, to do stenographic, secretarial, and general office work, and to provide for installing and carrying on the clerical work of the department of public affairs for the city of Long Beach, at a compensation of $300, to be paid plaintiff by defendant for the term of said employment, commencing on July 7, 1915, and ending on the 2d day of November, 1915, and that pursuant to said agreement of employment plaintiff did during the whole of said term perform such services for and on behalf of defendant. In the second count it is alleged that on the 9th day of February, 1916, defendant employed plaintiff to perform services for it and on its behalf as a laborer in the charity department of said city at an agreed price of $2 per day for each and every day of such labor performed, and that pursuant to said employment plaintiff herein, between February 9, 1916, and March 22, 1917, performed 288½ days' labor at $2 per day, aggregating the sum of $576.50. These allegations as to the employment of plaintiff by defendant were denied in the answer, and as to both thereof the court found adversely to plaintiff, who appeals from the judgment entered thereon in favor of defendant.

The sole question presented is whether or not such findings are supported by the evidence. It appears that at the times in question the city of Long Beach was a municipal corporation operating under a freeholders' charter which provided for a commission form of government, under which the legislative department of the city consisted of five commissioners. Section 15 of article 4 of the charter provides that—

"The legislative body may from time to time, by a majority vote, create or discontinue offices and municipal employments and prescribe and alter the compensation of any officer or employee of the city, except the elective officers."

Pursuant thereto the commissioners, on July 6, 1915, adopted an ordinance designated as No. B-1, whereby the office of secretary to the commissioner of public affairs of the city was created, the duties of which officer were declared to be those of a private secretary, stenographer and clerk, together with such other duties as might be required by the commissioner of public affairs, and fixing the salary of such official at $75 per month. Under said section 15 of the charter, such commissioner is empowered to nominate persons to fill all offices created therein, which nominations, in order to be effective, as provided by section 16 of the charter, "must be confirmed by the votes of at least three commissioners. Said appointees so elected by the commissioners shall hold office for a period of two years, and subject to removal at any time by a vote of four-fifths of all the commissioners, except those under civil service." It further appears that Frank M. Cates was commissioner of public affairs, and that as such commissioner he, on July 6, 1915, appointed plaintiff to fill the office of secretary, stenographer, and clerk in his department, which office was created by ordinance No. B-1. It further appears that Commissioner Cates and plaintiff sought to have her appointment as such subordinate official confirmed by the board of commissioners, but they steadfastly refused to confirm the appointment, and informed both Cates and plaintiff that they would not confirm the same, notwithstanding which fact plaintiff performed the duties of the office for the term named. It conclusively appears that the position held by plaintiff under Commissioner Cates and the duties performed by her were those of the office created by ordinance No. B-1, to which, by reason of the refusal of the commissioners to confirm the nomination, she was never legally appointed.

[1] It follows that, since the employment was unauthorized, she is not entitled to recover from defendant for the services rendered under the purported appointment made by Cates as commissioner. To uphold plaintiff's asserted right to recover, under the circumstances, would be tantamount to a disregard of the clear provisions of the city charter. The purported appointment was a nullity and, in contemplation of law, plaintiff was not in the employ of the city. Santa Cruz R. P. Co. v. Broderick, 113 Cal. 628, 45 Pac. 863; Times Publishing Co. v. Weatherby, 139 Cal. 618, 73 Pac. 465. We therefore conclude the evidence justifies the finding attacked to the effect that plaintiff was not employed by defendant to perform service for it as alleged in the first count of the complaint.

As to the second count, it appears that Frank M. Cates, as commissioner of public affairs, had charge of the department of public charities of the municipality; that in such capacity he, on February 9, 1916, employed plaintiff for an indefinite period to perform services in connection with and incidental to the business thereof, at the rate of $2 per day; and that between February 9, 1916, and March 22, 1917, she performed 288¼ days' service, amounting to $576.50. It is the contention of plaintiff that authority for the act of Cates as such commissioner in employing her is found in ordinance No. B-100, adopted on January 28, 1916, and declared by the legislative body to be an emergency measure. Section 5 of this ordinance provided:

"That the commissioner of public affairs is hereby authorized to employ ten laborers, for such work as may be required in the department of public charities, or for any work that the commissioner of public affairs may deem necessary for the carrying on of the work of the charity department. * * * at a compensation not to exceed $2.00 per day each."

That the services performed by plaintiff under this employment were those specified in section 5 of the ordinance is clearly shown. Nevertheless, respondent insists that, though the ordinance was adopted on January 28th and contained a declaration of its urgency, by reason whereof under the provisions of section 3 of article 22 of the charter it became immediately effective, it did not in fact become operative until thirty days after its passage, as provided in cases where ordinances are adopted without a declaration of urgency. Its contention is that at the time of the adoption of the ordinance no facts existed showing that it was necessary for "the immediate preservation of the public peace, health and safety"; and hence the mere declaration of urgency by the commissioners, when there was no urgency, is insufficient to render such an ordinance immediately operative.

[2, 3] We quite agree with respondent that, in the absence of facts showing urgency, the mere declaration of a city council so declaring in an ordinance will not render it immediately operative. In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114, 99 Pac. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75; Wheeler v. Chubbuck, 16 Ill. 361. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, however, we must assume that the council acted upon sufficient inquiry as to whether or not an emergency existed. The declaration is prima facie evidence of such fact. In the instant case, other than the fact that at the time of the adoption of ordinance No. B-100 there existed an ordinance relating to the charity department of the city, which was repealed by the later ordinance, no evidence whatever is presented tending to show that no facts existed constituting a reason for the declaration of the commissioners as to the declared urgency. Under the old ordinance, No. B-8, a department of public charities was created, in which provision was made for the appointment of a secretary of charities, who, under the supervision and direction of the commissioner of public affairs, had charge of charities, and whose salary was fixed at $50 per month. The new ordinance enlarged the functions of the department, provided for the disposition of charity donations received and the disbursement thereof, and authorized the commissioner of public affairs to employ such persons, not exceeding ten, as he might deem necessary in conducting the work of the department. The nature of the conditions in Long Beach at the time of the adoption of the ordinance might have been such as to render it immediately expedient to adopt these measures, and particularly to provide for an increase in the number of employees in conducting the affairs of the department. We cannot say by a mere comparison of the two ordinances that no facts existed which were sufficient to warrant the act of the municipal legislative body in declaring the urgency measure. However this may be, and assuming, as claimed by respondent, that no facts existed justifying the declaration of urgency contained in the ordinance, it was not void by reason of such fact, but, at most, its operative effect was postponed until thirty days had elapsed, to wit, until February 28th. Michelson v. City of Sacramento, 173 Cal. 108, 159 Pac. 431. Hence, since under the ordinance the commissioner of public affairs was authorized to employ plaintiff in the department of charities at $2 per day, and did employ her, she would in any event be entitled to recover compensation for the services rendered at the per diem specified, based upon the number of days' work performed after the ordinance became operative, and this right would be unaffected by the fact (if it be a fact) that at the time she entered upon the employment the ordinance was not in effect. As stated, the employment was for an indefinite period at $2 per day, and conceding the ordinance did not go into effect until February 28th, her continuance in the work thence on, with the knowledge and consent of the commissioner of public affairs, who at such time was, by a valid ordinance, authorized to employ her, entitled her to recover for the services rendered.

Our conclusion is that the finding of the court upon the issue presented by the second count of the complaint is not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing in this court is denied.

[4, 5] The judgment being reversed and a new trial in the court below being necessary, the defendant should have leave to amend its answer, and should be allowed to prove such facts as may exist tending to show that there was no foundation in fact for the statement in the ordinance of January 28, 1916, that the ordinance "is urgently required for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health and safety." If the court should find that there was no such foundation, the declaration would be ineffectual to bring about the immediate taking effect of the ordinance, and it would not take effect for 30 days after its passage, in which event any contract made within the 30 days would be unauthorized. Any contract, whether express or implied, made thereafter in pursuance of the ordinance, would be valid.

SMITH v. ROSS et al. (Civ. 3653.)

1. Costs $\S$ 199—As affecting claim for costs judgment is not rendered until entered in clerk's minute book.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1063, providing that a successful party claiming costs must deliver to the court and serve on the adverse party within five days after the verdict or notice of the decision of the court a memorandum of items of his costs and necessary disbursements, where findings of fact were waived, the entry of the court's decision in the clerk's regular minute book—not in the courtroom clerk's so-called rough minutes—constituted the rendition of the judgment.

2. Costs $\S$ 199—"Decision" as used in statute relating to memorandum of costs defined.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1033, providing that a party in whose favor a judgment is rendered in claiming costs must deliver to the court and serve upon the adverse party within five days after the verdict or notice of the decision of the court a memorandum of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements, and defining the "decision of the court" to mean the signing and filing of the findings of fact and conclusions of law, where written findings have not been waived, the "decision" referred to means the signing and filing of the findings of fact and conclusions of law, but where findings are waived, as permitted by section 634, a minute order, directing judgment for one of the parties, constitutes the "decision."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Decision.]

3. Costs — 199—Party not required to file cost bill until five days after notice of minute entry of clerk.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1033, requiring a party in whose favor a judgment is rendered to serve or file his memorandum of costs "within five days after * * * notice of the decision" in a case in which findings were waived, as permitted by section 634, there was no decision until the clerk made his minute entry, and the winning party was not required to serve and file a cost bill before receiving notice of the minute entry.

4. Costs — 199—Memorandum of costs held filed in time.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1033, providing that a party in whose favor a judgment is rendered must serve or file his memorandum of costs within five days after notice of the decision, in a case in which findings were waived, as permitted by section 634, though the trial court orally announced from the bench "that in its opinion judgment should be for plaintiff," there was no entry of judgment until an order directing judgment was entered in the minute book, and though this was under date of November 30th, the day of the statement by the trial court, where plaintiff did not receive a notice of the entry of judgment on the clerk's minute book until December 20th, a memorandum of costs, served December 21st and filed December 22d, was within five days after notice of the decision, as required by section 1033.

Action by Hazel Smith against James Ross and others. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order striking out plaintiff's memorandum of costs, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Preisker, Preisker & Goble, of Santa Maria, for appellant.

C. U. Armstrong and Fred A. Shaeffer, both of Santa Maria, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order striking out plaintiff's memorandum of costs. The sole question is: Was the memorandum served and filed in time?

The action was brought to recover possession of an automobile. It appears from the bill of exceptions that at the conclusion of the trial on November 30, 1920, "the court announced that in its opinion judgment should be for the plaintiff for the return of said property or the value thereof, found to be $750, and for costs of suit." It further appears that findings were waived by defendant. Thereafter, but how soon does not appear, the clerk made an entry in the minute book, under date of November 30, 1920, which, after reciting that the cause had been tried, argued, and submitted, and that the court had duly considered the evidence, states that—

The court "now renders its decision from the bench and orders that judgment be entered herein in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the recovery of the possession of the automobile described in the complaint or $750 in lieu thereof, and for costs of suit. Findings waived in open court. Let judgment be entered accordingly."

The entry mentioned in the final sentence of this minute entry refers, of course, to an entry of the judgment in the judgment book. The formal judgment which was signed by the trial judge, was filed on December 4, 1920, and was entered in the judgment book on December 6, 1920. Plaintiff's memorandum of costs, in due form, was served on December 21, 1920, and was filed December 22, 1920. Within five days thereafter defendants served and filed a notice of motion to strike the memorandum of costs from the files on the ground that it was not filed within the time allowed by law. From an affidavit filed by one of plaintiff's counsel it appears, without contradiction, that not until December 20, 1920, did plaintiff or her counsel have any knowledge of the minute entry of the order directing that a judgment be entered in favor of plaintiff.

Respondents contend that appellant had notice of the "decision" when the court, in the presence of appellant's counsel, orally announced from the bench "that in its opinion judgment should be for plaintiff." For appellant it is claimed that, because findings were duly waived in open court, no judgment was "rendered" and no "decision" was made until the clerk had made his minute entry of the order, directing that a judgment be entered in the judgment book in favor of plaintiff; also that she had no notice of the "decision" until December 20, 1920, when, for the first time, her counsel learned of the entry of the minute order directing that judgment be entered in her favor. This information came to appellant's counsel within five days prior to the time when her cost bill was served and filed. We think appellant's contention must be sustained.

Section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The party in whose favor the judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, must deliver to the clerk, and serve upon the adverse party, within five days after the verdict, or notice of the decision of the court * * * a memorandum of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements. * * * By the decision of the court * * * is meant the signing and filing of the findings of fact and conclusions of law."

It will be noted that, according to the wording of this Code section, it is only the party in whose favor "the judgment is rendered" who is entitled to costs; also that one so entitled, if the case be tried without a jury, is not required to serve or file his cost bill until "after * * * notice of the decision of the court."

[1] Where, as in the present case, findings are waived, the entry of the court's decision in the clerk's minutes constitutes the rendition of the judgment. Until the minute order is entered in the clerk's regular minute book—not in the courtroom clerk's so-called "rough minutes"—no judgment is "rendered." Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 488, 26 Pac. 1076, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 109 Pac. 91. In Crim v. Kessing, the court said:

"* * * Under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, whenever findings are required there can be no 'rendition of the judgment' until they are made and filed with the clerk. Findings of fact, however, are required only 'upon the trial of a question of fact,' and they may in all instances be waived. Whenever they are waived or are not required, the entry of its decision in the minutes of the court constitutes the 'rendition of the judgment' in the same manner as it did under the former system."

[2] So, also, with respect to the "decision." Where written findings have not been waived, the "decision" referred to in section 1033 means the signing and filing of the findings of fact and conclusions of law. But findings may be waived (section 634, Code Civ. Proc.); and where they are waived, as they were in the present instance, a minute order, directing judgment for one or the other of the parties, constitutes the "decision." Until such entry has been made in the minute book there is no "decision," as that word is employed in section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Collins v. Belland, 37 Cal. App. 139, 173 Pac. 601.

[3, 4] Since section 1033 does not require the party in whose favor the judgment is rendered to serve or file his memorandum of costs until "within five days after * * * notice of the decision," and since in this case there was no "decision" until the clerk had made his minute entry, it follows that plaintiff was not required to serve and file her cost bill until she had received notice of that minute entry. It does not follow that plaintiff's counsel had notice of the "decision" simply because they were present when the court orally announced from the bench that "in its opinion judgment should be for the plaintiff." No findings being required (they having been waived), and the court having merely made an oral statement that it was its opinion that judgment should be for the plaintiff, it might have changed its opinion at any time before the clerk's entry in the minute book of the order directing judgment for plaintiff. Until such entry, the oral order or announcement from the bench was in the breast of the court and subject to change. Brownell v. Superior Court, supra.

It is possible that some days may have elapsed between the time when the court orally announced that it was of the opinion that judgment should pass for plaintiff and the time when the clerk entered in his minute book the order directing that a judgment for plaintiff be entered in the judgment book. Such lapse of time is possible notwithstanding the fact that the minute entry bears date as of the day of the court's oral announcement—November 30, 1920. It required some time for the clerk to record the day's proceedings in his minute book. So that, assuming, for the purpose of this decision only, that plaintiff would have been charged with notice of the "decision" if her counsel had been present when the clerk made his minute entry and had actually seen it entered, still there is nothing here to indicate that plaintiff or any of her counsel had any knowledge or notice of the minute entry until, as stated in the affidavit of one of her attorneys, the latter received a copy of the formal judgment from a court attaché on December 20, 1920, which was less than five days before the cost bill was served and filed. For these reasons we think appellant's memorandum of costs was served and filed in time, and that the order striking it from the files should be reversed. It is so ordered.

MESSICK v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY. (Civ. 2460.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 12, 1922.)

1. Indictment and Information ☞110(34)—Sufficient to charge destruction or injury of fence in language of statute.

Pen. Code, § 602, subd. 8, as amended by St. 1917, p. 319, making it a misdemeanor to willfully open, tear down, or otherwise destroy any fence on the inclosed land of another, states every material element of the crime, and a complaint following its language is sufficient, notwithstanding the word "malicious" in the headnote to the section.

2. Indictment and Information ☞110(34)—Complaint in language of statute held to sufficiently charge opening and destruction of fence was malicious; "malice."

In view of Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 4, defining "malice" as an intent to do a wrongful act, a complaint charging, in the language of Pen. Code, § 602, subd. 8, as amended by St. 1917, p. 319, that defendant did willfully and unlawfully open, tear down, and destroy a fence sufficiently charged malice if a material element of the charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Malice.]

Chester W. Messick was convicted of an offense, and the judgment was affirmed by the Superior Court of California in and for San Joaquin County, and he applies for a writ of certiorari. Alternative writ discharged, and peremptory writ denied.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for petitioner.

Edward Van Vranken, of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Petitioner was convicted in the justice court of Douglas township, county of San Joaquin, of the offense charged in a complaint as follows:

"The said Chester W. Messick did, at and in the county and state aforesaid, willfully and unlawfully open, tear down and destroy a fence on the inclosed land of another, to wit, a line fence between the lands of Chester W. Messick and one Edward J. Hughes, situate, lying, and being in the northwest one-quarter of section 3, township 2 north, range 8 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian."

[1] He was sentenced to pay a fine of $50, and, in case of default in the payment, to be imprisoned in the county jail until the fine should be satisfied at the rate of $2 per day. He appealed upon questions of law alone to the superior court of said county wherein the judgment was affirmed. Thereafter he petitioned this court for a writ of certiorari, claiming that no offense was stated in said complaint by reason of the failure to allege that the act was done maliciously. It is to be observed that the charge is in the language of subdivision 8 of section 602 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 319), but it is the claim of petitioner that the "headnote to the section (malicious injury to freehold) must be deemed a part of the substance of the act, and accorded the same effect as though written into the body of the law." This is a rule of general application recognized by the authorities, and ordinarily there is no question about its pertinency in order to determine the intention of the Legislature, but herein there are nine subdivisions of said section embracing various acts, some of which are not injuries to the freehold at all; and it may be doubted whether the said headnote was intended to be anything more than an arbitrary generalization of the scope of the section. It is not unreasonable to say that what the Legislature meant is that the various acts enumerated should be deemed equivalent to a "malicious injury" to the freehold, and to charge said offense it would be sufficient to follow the language of the particular subdivision under which the case should fall. Some of these acts, indeed, were assuredly intended to be penalized although not done maliciously, such as "entering any inclosure belonging to, or occupied by another, for the purpose of hunting, shooting, killing, or destroying any kind of game within such inclosure, without having first obtained permission from the owner of such inclosure." It is proper to observe also, that in only one of these various subdivisions is the term "maliciously" employed to characterize the offense, and from this, under a familiar rule of construction, it might be plausibly argued that it was not intended as a qualification of the other acts.

The true situation seems to be that every material element of the crime committed by petitioner is comprehended by this expressive language of said section: "Every person who willfully commits any trespass by * * * willfully opening, tearing down, or otherwise destroying any fence on the inclosed land of another * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor"—and it is sufficient by appropriate allegations in the complaint to set forth that condition.

[2] This was assuredly done, but, if it be conceded that malice is a material element in the charge, then such requirement is satisfied by the terms that were employed in the complaint. The word malice implies "an intent to do a wrongful act." Subdivision 4, § 7, Pen. Code; People v. Ah Toon, 68 Cal. 326. The expressions "willfully and unlawfully" used in the complaint are equivalent to an allegation that the act was done with such intent. It was so expressly held in the matter of Application of Ahart, 172 Cal. 762, 159 Pac. 160, wherein it is said:

"Turning next to the complaint: It alleges that the defendant 'willfully and unlawfully' transported the intoxicants. 'Willfully,' of course, imports no more than a design to do the specific act. But the charge is also that the act of transportation was unlawfully performed. This employment of the word is not merely epithetical but is sufficient to charge the defendant with the performance of this act with a wrongful intent, and is thus sufficient to justify his being placed upon trial."

In Bise v. United States, 144 Fed. 374, 74 C. C. A. 1, 7 Ann. Cas. 165, it was declared by the Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, that the words, "unlawfully and feloniously" mean "that the act which they characterize proceeded from a criminal intent and evil purpose and thus exclude all color of right and excuse for the act," citing cases.

Petitioner refers to certain decisions from other jurisdictions apparently in conflict with the foregoing, but they are not controlling herein. As the question was directly decided by the highest court of this state in the Ahart matter it is unnecessary to discuss the subject further.

The alternative writ is discharged, and the peremptory writ denied.

GROFF et ux. v. DU BOIS et al. (Civ. 4205.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 13, 1922.)

Limitation of actions — Action for miscarriage resulting from attempted eviction is barred in one year.

An action by a tenant and his wife to recover damages for miscarriage of the wife, resulting from an attempt by the landlord to evict the tenants from the premises, in which no physical violence was employed toward the wife, is an action for personal injury caused by the wrongful act of another, which is barred if not commenced in one year by Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by W. C. Groff and wife against E. B. Du Bois and others, to recover damages for personal injuries growing out of an alleged trespass. Judgment for plaintiffs, and named defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. V. Keeling, of Lakeport, and Edgar D. Peixotto, of San Francisco (Cleveland R. Wright, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

W. H. Hazell, of Lakeport, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action was one brought to recover damages for injuries growing out of an alleged trespass on the part of defendants. The complaint was filed on the 13th day of March, 1920, and it alleges that about the 1st day of August, 1917, and while plaintiffs were in lawful and peaceful possession of certain real property, defendants unlawfully, and in a malicious and offensive manner, attempted to evict them therefrom, together with their personal belongings. The complaint contains an allegation that at such time plaintiff Helen E. Groff was in a delicate physical condition, and that such act on the part of defendants caused her to suffer a miscarriage. No actual damage was alleged, but plaintiffs claimed exemplary damages in the sum of $5,000. A demurrer was interposed pleading the statute of limitations. It was claimed that, the action being one for injury caused by wrongful act of another, it should have been commenced within one year as prescribed by subsection 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was overruled, and defendants, answering, denied plaintiffs' allegations, and alleged that the defendant Du Bois was the owner of the premises, and that he and the other defendants lawfully entered thereon, and that the plaintiff Helen E. Groff without cause or reason threatened to shoot them unless they departed. Denial is made that plaintiffs suffered any damage, and it was prayed that they take nothing by their action. Trial was had by jury.

From the evidence it appears that defendant Du Bois was the owner of a fruit ranch in Lake county, and that plaintiff W. C. Groff and his family were located thereon under a working arrangement. On the 1st day of August, 1917, defendant Du Bois, in company with the other defendants, went upon the premises and removed certain personal property out of a shed and from the porch of the house occupied by plaintiffs. Helen E. Groff, the wife of plaintiff, came out of the door with a shotgun and ordered defendants to refrain from removing any of the property. Defendants desisted, and they then left the premises. Subsequently, on August 13, 1917, Helen E. Groff suffered a miscarriage. It further appeared that defendants were civil and respectful upon the occasion, and that no force or violence whatever was used by them. As before stated, no actual damage was prayed for, and none was proven. At the conclusion of the trial a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiffs for $100 actual and $2,500 exemplary damages. Defendant Du Bois moved for a new trial. The motion was denied in the following language:

"It appearing to the court that the judgment in the case is excessive, but the plaintiff having offered to remit $1,686.60 of the amount of the verdict rendered and the judgment entered for plaintiff herein, and the defendant having failed to accept such offer, it is ordered that the defendant's motion for a new trial herein be, and the same is hereby, denied."

Defendant appeals from the judgment. As grounds for reversal it is alleged: (1) That plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations; (2) that plaintiff was not entitled to recover exemplary damages, for the reason that the acts of defendant were not malicious or wanton, and because of the fact that no actual damages were pleaded or proven; (3) that the court believing the verdict excessive, it was its duty to grant a new trial.

We are of the opinion that appellant's first contention disposes of the case. The action is clearly one brought for injury to the person caused by wrongful act, and exemplary damages are prayed for by reason of this alleged injury. The only evidence upon the subject is that plaintiff Helen E. Groff suffered a miscarriage. There is no evidence in the record to show that the acts of defendant caused such injury. Even if we assumed that the miscarriage was brought about through the acts complained of, it is clearly a case within the purview of subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring such actions to be brought within one year. Defendants by demurrer and answer interpose the statute as a shield. These pleadings should have been sustained.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss the other questions raised. The judgment is reversed.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ASSUR. CORPORATION, LIMITED, OF LONDON, ENGLAND, et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 4080.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 5, 1922. Rehearing Denied May 3, 1922.)

Master and servant — 419—Disability held "new and further disability" within Compensation Act, and not continuing illness.

Where, as a result of an employee's efforts to work following his disability, for which he had received compensation, new complications in his physical condition, traceable to the original injury set in, and his nervous system was broken down so that he was incapacitated for his duties, his condition constituted a "new and further disability," within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11c, and not a mere "continuing illness."

Application by the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited, of London, England, and the C. N. Whitmore Company for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries to J. T. Souza. Award affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding to review and annul an award of $267.81 granted by the Industrial Accident Commission to J. F. Souza on account of injuries sustained by him while in the course of his employment. The issue presented is whether or not Souza's claim is barred by the period of limitation prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended by St. 1917, p. 831), and the determination of that question depends upon whether or not the disability for which the claim is presented was a "new and further disability" within the meaning of that term as it is used in said act.

On September 10, 1920, Souza fell from a wagon and sustained a fractured skull. Medical and hospital treatment were supplied by the insurance carrier, and on November 22, 1920, Souza returned to work for his former employer at apparently as good wages as he had previously received, but, on account of a still weakened condition, he was assigned to lighter work. On November 26, 1920, a payment of compensation was made to Souza by the insurance carrier in the sum of $44.27. About January 1, 1921, Souza complained to his employer that he was unable to continue the work, and was thereupon, by the direction of the physician who had previously treated him, placed in the hospital for 10 days. He was incapacitated for work this second time on account of his injury until about the end of March, 1921.

On June 4, 1921, Souza filed this application for an award, which was granted, in the sum of $267.81, upon the ground, as respondent contends, that the original injury to Souza had caused "new and further disability."

Section 11 (c) of said Workmen's Compensation Act provides, among other things, that an injured employee "may institute proceedings for the collection of compensation within 245 weeks after the date of the injury upon the grounds that the original injury has caused new and further disability," but in said section it is further provided that "proceedings * * * must be commenced within six months from the date of the injury * * * or * * * six months from the date of the * * * last payment of * * * compensation." If, therefore, on January 1, 1921, at the time Souza was again compelled to quit his employment, he was suffering from a "new and further disability" resulting from the original injury, his claim was filed within 6 months of date of the new disability, and consequently is not barred.

We are entirely satisfied, after examining the record before us, that Souza's case comes within the "new and further disability" clause above mentioned. When Souza was discharged from the hospital the first time he was released and required to resume his work too soon after the injury. He was subject to spells of dizziness. In this respect his physician testified:

"As a matter of fact he never had done his full quota of work since he had been out of the hospital, from his first injury, and I will say, in justice to the man, that I turned him loose too soon. I think I had him report back to work too soon. Mr. Whitmore is a good man to work for and I didn't want to put the insurance company to any more expense than possible, and Mr. Whitmore has favored him or did favor him in his work, but Mr. Whitmore has told me since that he wasn't able to do his full quota of work."

The evidence may be further fairly summarized as showing that after Souza was sent back to work his dizziness increased to such an extent that his nervous system was finally broken down and he virtually suffered a relapse. His physician further testified that, on January 1, 1921, the trouble with Souza was dizziness, and that "he was inclined to have an autointoxication, fill up with toxins, poisons"; that "his nervous system was pretty badly shot to pieces at that time, too," and that such a condition very often follows a fracture of the skull or concussion of the brain; that "you get these traumatic conditions, and it shocks the nervous system, upsets the nervous system very much."

The petitioners contend that Souza's case merely shows a "continuing illness," from which it is argued that no "new and further disability," is shown. In this respect we think the petitioners are confusing the meaning of the word "illness" with the word "disability." The purpose of the Compensation Act is to give compensation for "disability" proximately caused by injury. Under the provisions of section 9 (b) of said act, compensation is not due for temporary disability after an employee returns to work at full wages, and it follows that when Souza returned to work at full wages there was no "compensable disability." As a result of his efforts to work from November 22, 1920, to January 1, 1921, new complications in his physical condition set in, his nervous system was broken down, and he was finally compelled to quit work. These facts are apparent from the testimony of the physician as hereinabove quoted.

Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the situation here presented fully and fairly comes within the intent and meaning of the "new and further disability" clause of said Workmen's Compensation Act, and for that reason the award is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1922.)

Landlord and tenant §86(2)—Option to renew if notice "within" 90 days prior to expiration is given requires 90 days' notice.

In a provision of a lease giving the lessee the option to renew if notice of intention to exercise the option was given within 90 days prior to the expiration of the term, the use of the word "within" does not entitle the lessee to give the notice at any time less than 90 days before the term expired, as it might if the provision read "within 90 days of the expiration," since the word "within," when used in connection with the word "before" or "prior" can be construed as meaning not later than, or at any time not less than.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by the Royal Grocery Company against Lillie F. Oliver, as executrix of D. Franklin Oliver, deceased, for specific performance of a contract. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

O. G. Foelker, of Oakland, for appellant. Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, and J. F. Shuman, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, without granting leave to amend, in an action brought for specific performance growing out of an option for the renewal of a lease of real property.

On January 15, 1919, the defendant, as lessor, entered into a lease with plaintiff, as lessee, whereby defendant leased to plaintiff a store in the city of Oakland, for the term of two years commencing on February 1, 1919, and ending on January 31, 1921. The lease gave the lessee an option to renew the same, with changed rentals, for a further period of three years, the new term to commence on January 31, 1921, but with respect to this renewal the lease provided:

"It is further agreed and understood, however, that, in the event the lessee herein shall fail to give the lessor herein a written notice of its election to exercise this option for a 3-year renewal of this lease within 90 days prior to the expiration of this lease, this option for a 3-year renewal shall thereafter be and become null and void, and of no further force and effect, without notice from the lessor."

Notice of the exercise of the option to renew the lease was given to the lessor on November 13, 1920, which was 79 days before the lease expired.

The controversy between the parties arises over the construction which shall be given to the term "within 90 days prior to the expiration of this lease." Appellant's contention is that it had the right at any time during the 90 days next preceding the expiration of the lease to serve the notice of the exercise of the option. Respondent's claim is that said notice should have been served at least 90 days prior to the expiration of the lease.

Viewing the option in the light of other options such as are customarily used in leases, we can arrive at no other conclusion than that it was the intention of the parties here that the lessee should give the lessor at least 90 days' notice of its intention to continue the tenancy. To hold otherwise would, in our opinion, be giving the option an unreasonable and unjust interpretation.

The usual purpose of requiring the lessee in any case to give notice of the exercise of an option to renew the lease is that the lessor may not be compelled to wait until the last day of the term of the lease before he may know whether or not the lessee desires to continue to occupy the premises for a further term, and thereby take the risk of having his premises remain idle for an indefinite period in the event that said option to renew the lease is not exercised. If appellant's contention be sustained, it would mean that appellant was not permitted to notify the landlord at any time during the year and nine months it occupied the premises that it desired to and would continue its tenancy after the original term fixed in the lease, but that it was required to wait until 90 days of the expiration of the lease before it could serve such notice. Such a limitation would obviously be to the disadvantage of both parties to the lease, and there appears to be no reason in law or fact why such a provision should have been made. If the option had read "within 90 days of the expiration of the lease," then there would be some force in appellant's contention; but the presence of the words "prior to" clearly indicates, we believe, that it was the clear intention of the parties that the notice should be served at least 90 days prior to the date on which the lease expired.

The question of such a pleonasm as appears in this option has been before the courts of other jurisdictions in a few cases, and the rule of those cases is that the word "within," when used in connection with the word "before," should be construed as meaning "not later than" or "at any time not less than." United States v. Sena, 15 N. M. 187, 106 Pac. 384; Hammond v. Connolly, 63 Tex. 62; Colonial Trust Co. v. Wallace (C. C.) 183 Fed. 897. We are of the opinion that such a construction must be adopted here.

HIGHFIELD v. BOZIO et al. (S. F. 10244.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1922.)

Executors and administrators — 97—Executor not bound to employ attorney designated in will.

Amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, providing that an attorney for an administrator or executor on notice to the interested parties may apply for and obtain an order that his compensation be paid by the executor or administrator out of the estate in his hands, does not prevent the executor of an estate from employing an attorney other than the one designated in the will, since the executor is liable for acts of the attorney.

In Bank.

Application by Frank Highfield for a writ of mandamus to compel the Superior Court of San Francisco County to direct the executor of the estate of Orlando E. Bozio, Sr., to employ the petitioner as attorney in the business of the estate. Writ denied.

Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

SHAW, C. J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate, to compel the superior court to direct the executor of the estate of Orlando Bozio, Sr., to employ the petitioner as attorney for the said executor, in the administration of the said estate.

The petition is based on the fact that the will of the decedent, which has been admitted to probate, contained the following specific provision:

"I direct and specially request that my friend of many years Frank Highfield be the attorney of record and for the estate in the matter of the probating of my estate."

A similar provision was considered by this court in the case of Estate of Ogier, 101 Cal. 381, 35 Pac. 900, 40 Am. St. Rep. 61. In that case the executor, after his appointment, employed other attorneys, and the attorney designated in the will applied to the court for a revocation of the appointment and for an order that he be entered as attorney of record in the place of the other attorneys. The court below denied the application. This court affirmed this ruling and held that the direction in the will—

"did not constitute a selection which was binding on the executor but was simply an advisory provision which she could disregard if she chose to do so."

Among the reasons for this conclusion, the court said that—

"if the attorney employed should be derelict in his duty, and should receive and misappropriate funds of the estate, the executor would be liable therefor to the legatees under the will. This being so, it would seem to be neither reasonable nor right to hold that the executor of a will must necessarily accept the services of an attorney selected by the testator."

This decision is conclusive as to the right of the petitioner to the writ of mandate petitioned for, unless the rule is changed by reason of an amendment to section 1616 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which has been enacted since the decision in the Ogier Case. One of the reasons given in the Ogier Case for the conclusion of the court in that case was that, although the executor would be allowed as a part of his expenses the reasonable fees paid to the attorney and approved by the court, "still such allowance can be made only to him, and not to the attorney." The amendment to section 1616 provides that the attorney for the executor or administrator, upon notice to the interested parties, may apply for and obtain an order that his compensation be paid by the executor or administrator out of the estate in his hands. The petitioner claims that this removes the reasons given in the Estate of Ogier for this decision. We do not agree with this contention.

The amendment does not purport to take away the authority or power of the executor or administrator to select and employ an attorney to advise and assist him in the administration of the estate, nor does it purport to regulate, or affect in any manner, the exercise of that authority or power. It does not affect the principal reasons upon which the decision in the Ogier Case was predicated, nor change the sound policy on which it rests. It still remains true that the executor is responsible for the misconduct, negligence, or want of skill of the attorney. Hence the executor, notwithstanding that amendment, should be allowed to make his own selection of attorney, and should not be bound by any direction contained in the will of the testator.

The petition for a writ of mandate is denied.

(Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1922.)

1. Street railroads ☞ 117(10)—Negligence in failing to ring bell held for jury.

In an action for injuries to the driver of a wagon, struck by a street car at a street intersection, an instruction that the motorman's failure to ring the bell, was negligence in and of itself held erroneous, the question of negligence, under the circumstances, being for the jury.

2. Street railroads ☞ 85(3), 117(5)—Care required; negligence for jury.

The duty owed by a street railroad and persons otherwise using the streets is mutual, and each is held only to the exercise of ordinary care, and the question whether each performed his duty, under the circumstances presented, is ordinarily one for the jury.

3. Negligence ☞ 136(14)—Question for jury.

It is within the province of the trial court to declare that a certain state of facts constitutes negligence per se, only when the sole conclusion that can be drawn is that there was negligence on the part of one or both of the parties.

4. Street railroads ☞ 81(5)—Failure to ring bell not excused by excessive speed.

An emergency created by the negligence of a motorman, such as the operation of a car at an excessive rate of speed, does not excuse him from ringing the bell.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by John Neff against the United Railroads of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, and Kingsley Cannon, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jay Monroe Latimer, of San Francisco (J. E. Pemberton and Frank M. Ayer, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The defendant, United Railroads of San Francisco, appeals from a judgment in the sum of $1,000 against it and in favor of plaintiff, John Neff, in an action tried by jury for damages for personal injuries, resulting from a collision between a bakery wagon, which Neff, as an employee of Langendorff Baking Company, was driving, and a street car of the defendant, which collision is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant in the operation of the car. Defendant denied the allegations of negligence on its part, and, in turn, alleged plaintiff to have been guilty of contributory negligence.

The accident, out of which the action arose, occurred at the intersection of Baker and Sutter streets, in San Francisco, on February 11, 1918. At this point Baker street is practically level, and Sutter street slopes toward the east. Respondent was driving north on the east side of Baker street, in a covered wagon drawn by a team of horses. Upon arriving at the Sutter street junction, he stopped the wagon to allow a west-bound Sutter street car to pass. At that time the horses' heads were about even with the southerly property line of Sutter street. Just before starting the team, after the west-bound car had passed, respondent looked to the west for approaching east-bound cars. His view in that direction was obstructed by a building on the southwest corner of the intersection, and was limited to about half a block. He saw no cars approaching and heard no bell or other warning, so he started north across Sutter street, driving his team at a walk or slow trot. When the team and wagon were upon the tracks, he discovered an oncoming east-bound car. He attempted to avert the collision by increasing the gait of the team, but was unsuccessful, and the car struck the left wheel of the wagon, upsetting it, and throwing the horses to the ground. Respondent sustained injuries from the impact and from being kicked by the horses.

There was evidence that the car was going 30 or 35 miles an hour, although the motorman testified it was not exceeding 8. The estimates of witnesses as to how far the car went after the collision before it could be stopped varied from 60 feet to half a block.

Appellant contends the trial court erred in refusing to direct a verdict in its favor, upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to establish negligence on its part, but conclusively established contributory negligence on the part of respondent; in instructing the jury on the subject of "last clear chance," which doctrine, according to appellant, is not applicable to this case, and in giving an erroneous instruction on the subject of appellant's negligence, which it is insisted constituted a charge on a question of fact.

[1] We are of the opinion that the charge on the subject of appellant's negligence was erroneous. The instruction complained of is as follows:

"The jury are instructed that if, from the evidence in this case, the jury believe that the defendant company, through its motorman or employee operating its street car, which collided with the bakery wagon driven by the plaintiff, Neff, as testified to in this case, operated its said street car on Sutter street when approaching and close to Baker street and about to cross said street, without ringing or sounding the bell or gong of said car, such a failure to ring or sound the bell or gong would be negligence in and of itself."

[2, 3] The duty owed by a street railway company and persons otherwise using the streets is mutual, and each is held only to the exercise of ordinary care, and, as in other cases, the question whether each performed his duty under the circumstances presented, is ordinarily one for the jury. It is within the province of the trial court to declare that a certain state of facts constitutes negligence per se, only when the sole conclusion that can be drawn is that there was negligence on the part of one or both of the parties. Appellant earnestly contends that the accident occurred so suddenly that it constituted such an emergency as would justify the motorman in devoting his entire energy and attention to stopping the car, and that, even if it were found the bell was not rung, such a failure would be excused under the circumstances.

The evidence as to the conduct of the motorman and the respondent at the time of the accident presents a sharp conflict. One of respondent's witnesses stated that the car was going 30, another 30 to 35 miles an hour, and a third that it was "coming at a most terrific rate of speed." These three witnesses and respondent stated they heard no warning from the car. On the other hand, the motorman testified the car was not traveling over 8 miles an hour, and that he rang the bell while the car was coming down the hill, the latter statement being corroborated by the testimony of one of the passengers on the car. The motorman also testified he discovered the team just before the car arrived at the crossing; that respondent's appearance indicated he intended to stop and let the car pass; that the motorman supposed he would do so, and that, when respondent, apparently oblivious of the car's approach, drove on the track, the motorman did all he could to stop the car.

From this state of the evidence, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that the motorman either was or was not negligent, or that any one act on his part, such as failing to ring the bell, constituted negligence per se. The case is therefore clearly one where the jury should have been allowed, from all the evidence, to find whether or not appellant was negligent. It may have been, as argued by appellant, that an emergency existed in which the exercise of ordinary care demanded an immediate stopping of the car, and not the sounding of a warning. The jury might have so found, if they concluded respondent was free from negligence, in determining whether any act of the motorman, which was a contributing cause of the injury, constituted negligence. Such a situation might also have been found to have existed, assuming, as claimed by appellant, that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, in deciding whether or not the motorman exercised ordinary care to avail himself of a possible last clear chance to avoid the accident. In neither case was the jury given an opportunity to determine whether such an emergency existed, for they were in effect told by this instruction that, no matter what the circumstances were, a failure to ring the bell was in and of itself negligence. It was therefore a charge on a question of fact. Inasmuch as the jury may have relied on this instruction in reaching the verdict, it cannot be said appellant was not prejudiced by it.

[4] Since there must be a new trial of the action it may be well to call attention to certain other matters. No attempt was made to prove any local ordinances covering either the lawful rate of speed or of the ringing of the bell on street cars. As the evidentiary situation may be different upon the retrial, it will not be necessary to pass upon the contentions of appellant that the trial court erred in refusing to direct a verdict in its favor, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, and in charging the jury on the doctrine of the last clear chance. Appellant argues that, because of the emergency of the situation with which the motorman was confronted, he was excused from ringing the bell. But this would have no force if it was found the emergency was created by the negligence of the motorman, such, for instance, as the operation of the car at an excessive rate of speed. Davis v. Durham Traction Co., 141 N. C. 134, 53 S. E. 677, 53 S. E. 617.

Ex parte Y. AKADO. (Cr. 2443.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1922.)

1. Aliens ⇐13—Treaty held not to permit acquisition of agricultural land by foreign-born Japanese.

Under Initiative Alien Land Act 1920, §§ 1, 2, declaring that no alien who is not eligible to citizenship may acquire real property except as provided by the treaty between the United States and the country of which such alien is a citizen, and the treaty between the United States and Japan providing that citizens of Japan residing in the United States may lease land for residential and commercial purposes only, but containing no provisions authorizing an alien to lease or acquire land for agricultural purposes, a native-born subject of Japan cannot acquire agricultural land in the state.

2. Conspiracy ⇐23—An agreement that, if carried out, would effect a transfer in violation of Alien Land Act is a conspiracy.

An agreement between two persons which, if it were valid, and if it were carried out, would effect a transfer of land in violation of the provisions of Initiative Alien Land Act 1920, § 10, would be a conspiracy, and would be a violation of the act.

3. Conspiracy ⇐23—That Alien Land Act did not punish acquisition of land by alien immaterial in prosecution for conspiracy to effect transfer.

The acquisition of land by an alien ineligible to citizenship being forbidden by Initiative Alien Land Act, 1920, it is immaterial, in a prosecution for conspiracy forbidden by section 10, that each acquisition was not made a punishable offense, it being reasonable and proper to provide that an act to make a transfer or an agreement to conspire to do so should be punishable as a crime, regardless of the question whether the transfer would be valid or effective if the intention of the persons were actually carried to the point of execution by a conveyance.

4. Conspiracy ⇐23 — In indictment under Alien Land Act, immaterial that arrangement for alien's use of land would create an unenforceable trust.

The purpose of Initiative Alien Land Act 1920, § 10, prohibiting conspiracies to violate the act, was to prevent attempts to create relations between ineligible aliens and other persons whereby the title to land would be taken by any other person and the use enjoyed by the alien; and, in a prosecution under such section, it was immaterial that the agreement on which the indictment was based created a trust in favor of the alien which could not be enforced.

5. Aliens ⇐10—States can forbid holding of land by aliens ineligible to citizenship.

Const. art. 1, § 17, leaves to the Legislature the power to forbid the taking or holding of property by aliens ineligible to citizenship within the state's limits; and Initiative Alien Land Act 1920, in terms allowing aliens to take and hold agricultural land to the extent that such taking or holding is prescribed by treaty with the country of which the alien is subject, is valid.

6. Conspiracy ⇐23—Alien Land Act declares a public offense enforceable in the courts.

Initiative Alien Land Act 1920, § 10, punishing conspiracy to violate other sections of the act, declares a public offense which may be enforced by the courts.

In Bank.

Original application of Y. Akado, also known as S. Ikada, for writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Sonoma County. Writ denied.

Algernon Crofton, of San Francisco, Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., of Marysville, and J. C. Meyerstein and Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. W. Hoyle and Ross Campbell, both of Santa Rosa, and U. S. Webb and Frank English, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The petitioner is in custody upon a warrant of arrest issued upon an indictment charging him with a violation of section 10 of the act adopted by initiative at the November election of 1920 (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii), forbidding the acquisition of agricultural lands in this state by any alien who is not eligible to become a citizen of the United States. Claiming that section 10 of the act is invalid, and that the indictment states no public offense, he seeks release by a writ of habeas corpus.

Section 1 of the act provides that all aliens eligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States may acquire real property in the same manner as citizens of the United States.

Section 2 provides that all aliens other than those mentioned in section 1 may acquire, possess, enjoy and transfer real property "in the manner and to the extent and for the purpose prescribed by any treaty now existing between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject, and not otherwise."

[1] This, in effect, declares that no alien who is not eligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States may acquire real property, except as provided by the treaty existing between the United States and the country of which such alien is a citizen or subject. 37 Stat. 1504. Persons of the Japanese race who are native-born subjects of Japan cannot become citizens of the United States. The result is that the acquisition by such an alien of land situated in this state is unlawful, unless the treaty between his government and the United States allows such acquisition. The treaty between the United States and Japan provides that citizens of Japan residing in the United States may lease land for residential and commercial purposes, but it contains no provision authorizing an alien of the Japanese race to lease or acquire land for agricultural purposes. Consequently the Initiative Alien Law aforesaid prohibits the acquisition by such alien of any agricultural land situated in this state.

[2] Section 10 of the act is as follows:

"If two or more persons conspire to effect a transfer of real property, or of an interest therein, in violation of the provisions hereof, they are punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state penitentiary not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both."

The indictment charges that on September 19, 1921, in Sonoma county, Cal., the petitioner and one W. A. Cockrill did "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously conspire together to effect a transfer of agricultural and farming real estate, land and property, in the county of Sonoma, state of California, and an interest therein, and did so willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take and enter into an agreement to purchase certain agricultural and farming real estate, land and property, from Bartholomeu C. Souza and Mary C. Souza, in the name of said defendant, W. A. Cockrill, for the use, benefit, enjoyment, possession, occupation and control of said Y. Akado, also known as S. Ikada, and paid thereon, on the purchase price thereof, the sum of $150," which said money was paid by said Akado, who was then and there an alien subject of Japan and not eligible to citizenship in the United States, and that said land was and is not acquired in the enforcement or satisfaction of any lien thereon, and said agreement to purchase the same was taken in the name of Cockrill for the use of Akado with the intent and purpose to prevent, evade and avoid the escheating of said land to the state of California, said Cockrill not having then and there any interest in said lands in fee or otherwise.

It is clear that the indictment charges an agreement between the two persons charged, which, if it were valid, and if it were carried out, would effect a transfer of land in violation of the provisions of the Alien Land Act. Such an agreement would be a conspiracy and would be a violation of section 10 aforesaid.

[3] The petitioner contends that, because of the fact that no provision of the Alien Land Law makes it a crime or public offense for any person to transfer land to an alien ineligible to citizenship, therefore, for some reason, the cogency of which we are not able to perceive, the section declaring it to be a crime for two or more persons to conspire to bring about such a transfer is ineffective for any purpose. This result would not follow. The act forbids such transfer, and this makes it impossible for any person to convey land to an alien ineligible to citizenship by any transfer that would be valid as against the state of California, although it might be valid with respect to all other persons. We must assume that the people in adopting this statute believed that the state of California could protect itself against the alien who had received a conveyance of such land whenever its officers became advised of the fact, without any provision making the execution of the conveyance itself a crime. But it is entirely reasonable to suppose that in many cases the state might not obtain information of such fact. Furthermore, it is to the interest of the state that all persons owning land should be effectively deterred from attempting to evade or frustrate the provisions of the act forbidding the acquisition of such land by such alien, by means of colorable conveyances and unrecorded trusts. It was therefore reasonable and proper to provide that the attempt to make such transfer, or an agreement or conspiracy to do so, should be punishable as a crime, regardless of the question whether the transfer would be valid or effective if the intention of such persons were actually carried to the point of execution by a conveyance. We can perceive nothing in the conditions which would make such penal statute ineffective. The acquisition of such land by an alien ineligible to citizenship is positively forbidden by the act. It is immaterial that such acquisition is not made a punishable offense. The framers of the act deemed it a sufficient protection to the state to make it a public offense for any person to conspire to effect such a transfer. The fact that the act creates no other crime does not affect the validity of the section which defines the offense charged against the petitioner.

[4] For like reasons it is immaterial whether the arrangement between Akado and Cockrill that the price should be paid by Akado and that the title should be taken by Cockrill would operate to create a valid trust in Cockrill in favor of Akado with respect to the land and the use thereof or not. The purpose of the section was to prevent any attempts to create relations between such aliens and other persons whereby the title to land would be taken by any other person and the use thereof would be enjoyed by the alien. Such purpose is sufficient to uphold the penal statute, and the fact that the trust could not be enforced is not material to the effectiveness of the provision forbidding a conspiracy to make a formal attempt to create such invalid trust.

[5] It is not claimed that the Alien Land Act is contrary to the state or federal Constitution in respect to the provision forbidding the acquisition of agricultural land. It is well settled that, in the absence of a treaty to the contrary, a state may forbid the taking or holding of property within its limits by aliens. Blythe v. Hinckley, 127 Cal. 436, 59 Pac. 787. Our Constitution leaves to the Legislature this power with regard to all aliens ineligible to citizenship. Article 1, § 17. The provisions of the act in terms allow such aliens to take and hold agricultural land to the extent that such taking or holding is prescribed by any treaty with the country of which such alien is subject. The treaty with Japan does not prescribe or secure to its citizens the right to take or hold agricultural land situated in this state. Hence the act does not violate the treaty in that respect. In the recent case of Estate of Yano (Cal. Sup.) 206 Pac. 995, the court held that the provision of the law preventing the appointment of such aliens as guardians of their minor children born in this country was not a violation of the treaty, but that it was discriminative, and therefore violative of the Constitutions of this state and of the United States. That case is not at all inconsistent with the case at bar. There the child was born here, and is a citizen of this country, with the same right to take and hold property that any other citizen possesses. Here the persons forbidden to take and hold property are aliens who have not become citizens, and who are ineligible to become such. Since the statute makes it unlawful for such aliens to acquire agricultural land within this state, it is clear that there is also power to make it a crime to conspire to bring about such acquisition.

[6] We are therefore of the opinion that section 10 of the act declares a public offense which may be enforced by our courts, and that the indictment sufficiently states the offense described in that section.

The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

WEILER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN
AND FOR SAN MATEO COUNTY et al.

KAVANAUGH et al. v. SAME.

(S. F. 10182, 10195.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1922.)

4. Eminent domain §70 — Constitution providing for compensation on taking private property must be strictly followed.

Const. art. 1, § 14, providing for compensation for property taken, must be strictly followed.

2. Eminent domain §76—Deposits for damages for taking highway by county must secure owners separately.

While Code Civ. Proc. § 1244, subd. 5, provides that all parcels of land sought to be condemned for public use may be included in the same action, under Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that a county may take immediate possession of rights of way for public use by first commencing eminent domain proceedings, and thereupon giving security for adequate compensation to the owners and incidental damages, an order for a separate deposit for each owner must be made.

In Bank.

Applications of Jacob Weiler and another and of Moses F. X. Kavanaugh and another, each against the Superior Court in and for the County of San Mateo and George H. Buck, Judge thereof, for writs of certiorari to review orders of the Superior Court condemning certain land for highway purposes. Order annulled.

Tum Suden & Tum Suden, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Franklin Swart and John H. Machado, both of Redwood City, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. Each cause above entitled is a proceeding by the plaintiffs therein to review and annul an order of the superior court of San Mateo county on the ground that it is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court.

The two proceedings involve the same order and the same proposition of law. The order affects the respective rights of the parties in the same manner. They will therefore be considered together.

On November 14, 1921, the county of San Mateo began an action in said court to condemn for a highway a strip of land through and over three separate tracts of land in said county, belonging to different parties. The first tract belonged to William Weiler and Jacob Weiler, the plaintiffs in case S. F. No. 10182, and the third tract belonged to the plaintiffs in case S. F. No. 10195. The second tract is owned by Madaline Zanone and six other persons as tenants in common, none of whom is a party to either of these two proceedings.

Thereafter, on February 8, 1922, and prior to the service of any summons on any of the parties to these two proceedings, the affidavit of Joseph J. Phillips was filed in said action, wherein he states that he is acting as agent to secure rights of way for the proposed highway; that he is familiar with the property sought to be acquired in said action, and "is informed as to the value thereof, and as to the extent of the damage that will accrue to the defendants by reason of such condemnation and taking," and that "in his judgment the total value of all the property sought to be acquired, together with all the damage by reason of the severance thereof, and all other damage of whatsoever kind and nature, to accrue to all of the defendants herein will not exceed $1,720."

Thereupon, on the same day, and without notice of any kind to any party to said action, or the taking of any evidence other than said affidavit, and in the absence of said parties, the court made the following order:

"It appearing to the satisfaction of the court that plaintiff herein, County of San Mateo, a political subdivision of the state of California, has filed an action in eminent domain:

"It is therefore ordered that the plaintiff take immediate possession and use of the property sought to be condemned, and that the sum of $1,720 be, and is hereby, fixed as the amount reasonably adequate to secure to the owners of the property sought to be condemned immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of an adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property as soon as the same can be ascertained; that such possession be taken upon deposit by said plaintiff with the clerk of this court of said sum."

The defendant herein claims that such order is authorized by the provisions of section 14, art. 1, of the Constitution, as amended on November 5, 1918.

The material provisions of the section, as amended, are as follows:

"Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner, and no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation, except a municipal corporation or a county, until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefits from any improvement proposed by such corporation.
* * * Provided, that in an action in eminent domain brought by the state, or a county, or a municipal corporation, or a drainage, irrigation, levee, or reclamation district, the aforesaid state or political subdivision thereof or district may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use, whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposits as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of an adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property, as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law. The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings."

The plaintiffs herein claim that this amendment is in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law. Article 14, § 1.

[1] We do not find it necessary to consider this proposition, for we are of the opinion that the order in question does not conform to the requirements of the aforesaid amendment to section 14 of article 1 of our Constitution. Inasmuch as the provision authorizes an invasion of private property—that is, the taking possession thereof without the consent of the owner—it is obvious that the general principle that such provisions in a statute or Constitution must be strictly followed applies to and governs its interpretation and effect.

[2] The plaintiffs urge that by the order attacked in this case they do not receive the protection against injury which the first clause of section 14 entitles them to. We think this must be admitted. The language of the section with respect to the security to be given, and with respect to the owner thereof, is in the singular number throughout with one significant exception. The court may make the order in question provided the political subdivision which is maintaining the condemnation suit shall give such security in the way of money deposits as the court may direct, "and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incidental thereto." Also, that, "upon motion of any party" to the cause, and "after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe," the court may "alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings." In a case such as the present, where the property sought to be condemned consists of a highway running through many parcels of land belonging to different persons, the damages and the value of their respective parcels of property sought to be taken may, and often will, differ widely. The damage to one will in no particular depend upon the damage to the others. Neither party will be interested in any allowance for damages except his own. The Code provides that all the parcels of land sought to be condemned and required for the same public use may be included in the same action at the option of the plaintiff, and that the court may consolidate or separate them to suit the convenience of the parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 1244, subd. 5. The action with respect to each party is of the same character as if he was the sole defendant.

The constitutional provision recognizes the separate interests of the several parties, and therefore declares that the "money deposits" shall be "in such amounts" as may be found adequate "to secure to the owner" payment of his compensation and damages. The word

"amounts" is in the plural, and the word "owner" in the singular, thus implying that a different amount may be necessary for each owner. It is also significant that the provision for a subsequent change of amount runs to "any party," and provides that the court, on his motion, may "alter the amount"; the words being in the singular number. This implies the fixing of a separate amount for the security of each party. We think, under these circumstances, the true construction of the amendment of the Constitution is that, where several parcels of land belonging to different owners are sought to be condemned in the action, the security to the owner of the property to be required to be given to authorize an order for the taking of immediate possession thereof must consist of a separate and distinct sum of money deposited for the security of each owner. If this were not the case, it is easy to perceive that the development of the case might have the effect of depriving some of the parties of any security whatever. The method pursued in this action is a good illustration of this proposition. The order was made on the affidavit of one person stating that in his judgment $1,720 will be sufficient security for the total damage that may accrue to all the parties. Upon the deposit of this sum the plaintiff in the action, under the order, will be entitled to immediate possession, and the defendants will thereupon, and at that moment, be deprived of all future use of their property. In effect the property is then taken from them if the action proceeds to a successful conclusion. Opinions in regard to values vary more, perhaps, than upon any other subject. Each party is entitled to a trial by jury. The court may in the subsequent progress of the case order that separate trials be had with respect to each party, or some of them. It is not improbable that the total damage may far exceed the estimate of the single witness who fixed the amount without a hearing or notice to either of the parties. It may happen that the damage to the person whose case is first tried may exceed that amount. In any case, whenever the amount deposited is exceeded by any verdict, and the person who obtains such verdict receives his damage out of the deposit, as he has the right to do, the other parties to the action will have no security whatever. In view of these circumstances it is our opinion that the deposit of a single sum of money as security for each separate owner of property sought to be condemned is a condition precedent to the authority and power of the court to make any order for the delivery of immediate possession, and that an order made without such separate security is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and void.

The order of the court above set forth is annulled. This order shall be made in each of said proceedings.

Ex parte DREW. (Cr. 2470.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 13, 1922.)

1. Habeas corpus ☞92(1)—Inquiry is limited to question of jurisdiction.

The scope of inquiry upon habeas corpus is precisely the same as upon a writ of review, and cannot go beyond the question of jurisdiction.

2. Habeas corpus ☞94—Decision on writ of review court had jurisdiction to commit for contempt is conclusive.

A decision on writ of review that the court had jurisdiction to commit for contempt is an adjudication of a question of jurisdiction which is conclusive in habeas corpus.

3. Execution ☞393—Court can appoint non-resident referee for hearing in supplementary proceedings.

Code of Civ. Proc. §§ 714, 715, providing that in proceedings supplementary to execution the debtor cannot be required to attend before a referee out of the county in which he resides, creates an exception to section 640, providing for the appointment of referees generally, and requiring them to reside in the county in which the action is triable, so that in supplementary proceedings the court could appoint a referee who resided in another county in which county the debtor also resided.

4. Habeas corpus ☞3—Decision as to jurisdiction on former writ of review is conclusive as to objections which might have been raised.

A decision on writ of review that the court had jurisdiction to commit for contempt is conclusive in subsequent proceedings for habeas corpus against objections to the jurisdiction which might have been raised, but were not, on writ of review.

The petitioner applies for a writ of habeas corpus to discharge him from custody under an order of arrest issued by the superior court of Mendocino county upon a judgment of that court declaring him guilty of contempt of court, and imposing a penalty of five days' imprisonment and $500 fine.

The judgment of contempt was based on an affidavit showing that in an action entitled Phil Lobree v. L. E. White Lumber Co. et al. (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 821, judgment had been duly rendered and entered against said lumber company; that thereupon proceedings supplementary to execution had been duly instituted and an examination had been ordered before one Ornbaum, who was appointed referee for that purpose; that Drew had been ordered to appear before said Ornbaum in the city and county of San Francisco, at a specified time and place, for the purpose of being examined in pursuance of said proceeding, and that he had failed to appear in obedience of the order of the court. The judgment of contempt recites the facts upon which it was based.

In his present petition for a writ of habeas corpus the petitioner claims that there are many technical defects in the affidavit and proceedings upon which he was adjudged guilty of contempt and in the proceeding supplementary to execution upon the judgment aforesaid. None of these, except those hereinafter mentioned, is of any consequence, as they do not go to the jurisdiction of the court to institute the proceedings in contempt and render the judgment thereon. The main points of the petition are: (1) That the order of examination before the referee was void because the examination was to be held in San Francisco, and the judgment was rendered in Mendocino county, and also because the referee, Ornbaum, resided in San Francisco county, that not being the county in which the judgment was rendered; (2) because prior to the beginning of the action in which the judgment against the L. E. White Lumber Company was rendered the said lumber company had ceased to exist as a corporation by reason of its having failed to pay its annual license tax as required by law, and that in consequence of that fact no valid judgment could be rendered against it.

This matter has been before the courts many times. The order of commitment for contempt was made on January 9, 1920. Up to this time the petitioner has succeeded in avoiding the imprisonment adjudged. Prior to the proceeding in contempt here attacked the petitioner had been adjudged guilty of contempt for refusing to obey a previous order of the court directing him to appear for examination in a previous proceeding supplementary to execution. In May, 1919, he applied to this court for a writ of certiorari to review and annul said order. The application was duly heard, and this court on July 8, 1919, duly rendered its judgment, declaring that the petitioner was in contempt of court for refusing to obey the order, and affirming the judgment punishing him for contempt. Drew v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 711, 182 Pac. 417. In that proceeding he did not claim that the defendant corporation had ceased to exist before the action was begun. Thereafter another supplementary proceeding was begun in the same action, and in that proceeding the judgment of imprisonment here attacked was made. An order of examination was duly made therein, and again the petitioner refused to appear for examination. He was again cited to appear upon a charge of contempt for such refusal, whereupon, before the hearing, he applied to the District Court of Appeal of the Third District for a writ of prohibition on the general grounds that the superior court had no jurisdiction to hear and decide the charge of contempt. The cause was decided against him by the District Court of Appeal on October 18, 1919, and upon petition to this court a rehearing was denied. Drew v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 651, 185 Pac. 680. In his petition he made some claim that the judgment in the main case was void by reason of some extrinsic circumstances, but the opinion of the district court does not show the precise ground. The contempt proceeding in the superior court of Mendocino county then proceeded to a hearing, and on January 9, 1920, the judgment in contempt here involved was made. Thereupon the petitioner herein filed his petition in the District Court of Appeal of the Third District for a writ of review to annul said judgment of contempt. One of the grounds of this petition was that the judgment against the L. E. White Lumber Company upon which the proceedings supplementary and in contempt were based was void, because of the fact that prior to the beginning of said action said corporation had ceased to exist because of the forfeiture of its charter aforesaid. Thus the same contention which he makes now to this court was presented to that court for adjudication, and the record of the judgment was presented to that court for review. It was there held on April 19, 1920, that the judgment was valid; that the finding therein that the corporation was in existence is final and conclusive and not open to attack in a proceeding in certiorari. Drew v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 374. Its existence was not legally impossible, for it may have been a corporation de facto, or it may have had its corporate charter restored as provided in section 14 of the act. Stats. 1915, p. 427. A petition to the Supreme Court for rehearing was denied, and that judgment thereupon became final. It declared, in effect, that the judgment on the charge of contempt was valid.

[1, 2] The scope of inquiry upon a writ of review extends only to the question of the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment sought to be reviewed. The scope of inquiry on habeas corpus is precisely the same. It cannot go beyond the question of jurisdiction. The decision of the district court in that case was therefore an adjudication by that court, and also by this court on petition for rehearing, of the precise matter upon which the petitioner here claims that the contempt judgment is void. Even if we were of the opinion that the decision in that case was erroneous, it would now be conclusive. It follows that there is no merit in the contention that the contempt judgment is void because of the alleged nonexistence of the L. E. White Lumber Company as a corporation.

[3] Upon the second point, section 714 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in a proceeding supplementary to execution the judgment debtor cannot be required to attend before a judge or referee out of the county in which he resides or in which he has a place of business. There is no other provision of the Code limiting the power of the court to appoint a referee in supplementary proceedings. Section 640, providing for the appointment of referees generally, provides that if the parties fail to agree the judge must appoint one or more referees "who reside in the county in which the action or proceeding is triable." We think the provision of section 714 must be considered as an enlargement of the power, if section 640 may be considered as requiring the appointment of a referee residing in the county in which the cause is tried. Section 714 authorizes the court to appoint a referee in supplementary proceeding, and at the same time does not authorize the party to be examined except in the county where he resides or has a place of business. This necessarily implies that where the party resides in another county the examination may be held in that county, since otherwise there could be no examination of such party. Section 715 authorizes an examination before a referee "at a specified time and place." It does not limit the place at which the examination may be had in proceeding under that section. It appears from the record that the petitioner was the president of the L. E. White Lumber Company; that he resided in San Francisco and had a place of business there, and that the said company also had its place of business there. In view of these provisions of the statutes we are of the opinion that the court had power to order an examination in San Francisco.

[4] We are also of the opinion that the point that the referee was not a resident of Mendocino county, and therefore, as it is claimed, not eligible to appointment as referee, does not affect the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore that it is not a ground for habeas corpus, certiorari, or prohibition, but that if it is material to any right of the party and is well taken, it must be presented on appeal. Furthermore, it may be said that this point also has been adjudicated against the petitioner. He sought to review the order before the District Court of Appeal, and if he had other reasons for alleging the want of jurisdiction by the court he should have presented it there. The petitioner cannot be allowed to present his reasons against the validity of the judgment against him piecemeal by successive proceedings for the same general purpose. He has not only had his day in court to attack the validity of this judgment, but has had several such days, on each of which he could have urged this objection, but did not do so, and he is therefore barred as to that and all other objections to its validity. The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

MARIN MUNICIPAL WATER DIST. v.
CHENU, Chief of Division of Motor Vehicles. (S. F. 10210.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1922.)

1. Licenses — License fees for automobiles are in nature of tax.

Moneys collected under provisions of Motor Vehicle Act, § 3, and sections 7, 8, as amended by St. 1919, pp. 198, 199, are to be used for public purposes, and the license fees for automobiles therein provided are in the nature of a tax.

2. Licenses — (1) — Statute providing for payment of fees not applicable to state agencies, unless such intent expressed.

Words in a statute providing for the payment of fees are not deemed to apply to public agencies unless such intent is clearly expressed.

3. Statutes — Exceptions in statute imposing burdens liberally construed in favor of public.

Exceptions in a statute imposing burdens are to be liberally construed in favor of the public.

4. Licenses — (1) — Motor vehicle used by municipal water district not subject to license as "engaged in business."

Motor vehicle used by municipal water district in collecting and distributing water to the public without profit is not subject to license as being "engaged in business," under Motor Vehicle Act, § 2; the term being used therein in the narrower meaning applicable to occupations or employment for livelihood or gain, and to mercantile or commercial enterprises.

Application of the Marin Municipal Water District for writ of mandate directed to Charles J. Chenu, as Chief of the Division of Motor Vehicles, requiring the issuance to petitioner of automobile plates and certificates without payment of the fees. Writ granted.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The plaintiff applies to this court for a writ of mandate directing the defendant as chief of the division of motor vehicles of the department of finance of the state of California to issue to the plaintiff certain license plates, with the accompanying certificates, such license plates to be attached to certain automobiles owned by the plaintiff, as required by the Motor Vehicle Act. The plaintiff is a municipal water district, organized under the act of May 1, 1911, and amendments thereto. Stats. 1911, p. 1290; Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 92. By the act of April 16, 1915, the organization of said district was declared valid, and it was declared to be duly created as a public corporation. Stats. 1915, p. 84. The plaintiff has constructed and completed a large water collecting, storing, and distributing system, and is operating the same in accordance with said act by collecting, selling, and distributing water to the inhabitants of the district and others. In carrying out its public duties and obligations under the act, as required, it is necessary for it to use 13 motor vehicles, all of which are used exclusively by it in the discharge of its public duties. It applied to the defendant for the necessary licenses certificates, and license plates, as required by the Motor Vehicle Act from persons operating and owning motor vehicles. The defendant refused to issue the licenses, certificates, or plates except upon the payment of the license fees prescribed by the Motor Vehicle Act, amounting to $133.60, whereupon the plaintiff began this proceeding in mandamus.

[1] Section 3 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1915, p. 400) provides that "every owner of a motor vehicle which shall be operated or driven upon the public highways shall" cause the same to be registered with the motor vehicle department and shall deposit with his application for a certificate "the proper registration fee as provided in section 7 of this act." Section 7 of the act as amended (Stats. 1919, p. 198) specifies the fees to be paid to the motor vehicle department upon the registration of such motor vehicle. It is conceded that the amount demanded by the defendant was the proper amount for the vehicles belonging to the plaintiff if the plaintiff is liable therefor. The section also provides that a number plate shall be given to the person registering the vehicle upon the payment of such fees. Section 8 as amended (Stats. 1919, p. 199) provides that a certificate of registration shall also be issued by the motor vehicle department showing the name of the registered owner and other particulars.

The act further provides that all moneys received by the department from such license fees shall be paid into the state treasury to the credit of a fund designated as the motor vehicle fund; that one-half of such fund shall be paid to the counties from which the moneys were received, as determined by the residence of the persons paying the same, for the benefit of the road funds of such counties; that the other one-half, after deducting certain moneys for the expenses of the department, shall be expended by the state department of engineering for the maintenance of roads, highways, and parks in this state. It will be seen, therefore, that the moneys are to be used for public purposes, and that the license fees are in the nature of a tax. Madera v. Black, 181 Cal. 310, 184 Pac. 397.

[2] The claim of the plaintiff is that it is a public corporation, municipal in character, established and organized for the purpose of carrying on within the district the public service of furnishing water to the public; that it is a state agency for that purpose, and that, under the well-established rule that words in a statute providing for the payment of fees or imposing burdens on property shall not be deemed to apply to public agencies or public property, unless such intent is clearly expressed, the language of this act providing for the payment of license fees cannot be considered as having been intended to include or apply to water districts organized under the act first referred to. This doctrine has been frequently expounded and applied in this state (Balthasar v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co. [Cal. Sup.] 202 Pac. 37), where it was held that the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act did not apply to or include motor vehicles belonging to the fire and police departments of municipalities of the state. Other illustrations of the rule are found in the citations and quotations made in that case.

[3, 4] The defendant claims that the rule is inapplicable in this case because of the provisions of section 2 of the Motor Vehicle Act. This section provides that:

"All motor vehicles owned and used in the transaction of official business by the representatives of foreign powers or by officers, boards or departments of the government of the United States, and all motor vehicles owned by and used in the operative work of such corporations as are taxed solely for state purposes under the provisions of the Constitution of this state, and such self-propelling vehicles as are used neither for the conveyance of persons for hire, pleasure, or business, nor for the transportation of freight, are hereby exempted from the payment of the fees in this act prescribed. The department shall furnish, free of charge, distinguishing plates for motor vehicles thus exempt."

The claim is that by this specification of vehicles which are to be exempt the statute evinces an intention to exclude all other vehicles and persons from the exemption.

We think that section 2, instead of justifying the position of the defendant, is positive evidence against the same. It excludes specifically all motor vehicles that are not used for the conveyance of persons for hire, for pleasure, or for business. There is a companion rule of construction to that above mentioned, to the effect that exceptions in a statute imposing burdens are to be liberally construed in favor of the public. Even without the aid of this rule, however, we think a motor vehicle owned and used by a municipal water district organized under the law for the purpose of collecting and distributing water to the public, and for the management of its works and system in discharging its public duties, is not used in "business" as that term is used in section 2 aforesaid. The municipal water district is not a commercial corporation. It does not operate for profit. It is not intended that it shall earn any money in excess of the necessary operating expenses of the plant devoted to the public use and for the acquisition of property necessary thereto. While the operations of such a public corporation are sometimes referred to as its "business," it is nevertheless true that the context indicates that the word was used in a narrower meaning in this section. The general definition of the word is "that which busies, or engages time, attention, or labor, as a principal serious concern or interest," but the word has a narrower meaning applicable to occupation or employment for livelihood or gain, and to mercantile or commercial enterprises or transactions. It is not to be presumed that the Legislature undertook to place public corporations of this character in the same class as private corporations engaged in ordinary business. The rule of construction we have already referred to forbids it. The passage evidently refers to ordinary business, and not to the operations of the public corporations of the state. The phrase "for the conveyance of persons for hire, pleasure, or business, nor for the transportation of freight," clearly indicates an intention to describe ordinary occupations engaged in by private persons or private corporations, either for business or pleasure, and, so far as it refers to business it would include private business, and not public business. If the word "business" was given the broader meaning contended for by the defendant, it would require the imposition of the license fees upon every municipality in the state, and even the state itself, as a condition precedent to the issuance of license plates and certificates for the operation of all the motor vehicles used by any of them in the public business of the state.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the motor vehicle department must issue these license plates and certificates to the petitioner for the motor vehicles in question without charging the statutory fee therefor.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

TOWN OF MILL VALLEY v. MASSACHUSETTS BONDING & INS. CO.
(S. F. 10213.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1922.)

On Rehearing.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 621(1)—Statute limiting time for relief from judgments inapplicable to delay in preparing transcript.

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, authorizing courts to relieve parties from judgments, etc., taken through mistake, inadvertence, etc., provided application is made within six months, has no application to delay in the preparation of the transcript on appeal under section 953a, so as to prevent filing of the transcript more than six months after the expiration of twenty days from the filing of notice therefor.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 627(2)—Diligence in preparing transcript is matter for lower court, and not for Supreme Court, on motion to dismiss.

Under Supreme Court rule 2 (176 Pac. vii), providing that, when a notice for a transcript under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, is filed, the time for filing the transcript shall not run until the transcript is approved and certified, or the proceeding to obtain it has been dismissed, or otherwise terminated, the proceeding may be dismissed for lack of diligence in preparing the transcript, but this is a matter for investigation and determination in the superior court, and not in the Supreme Court, on motion to dismiss.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 622—Time for filing transcript does not run until approved and certified if appellant diligent and proceeding not terminated below.

Under Supreme Court rule 2 (176 Pac. vii), where the record shows no lack of diligence by appellant in procuring a transcript, and no termination below of the proceeding to procure it, the time for filing does not run, so far as a motion to dismiss the appeal is concerned, until the transcript is approved and certified by the judge of the lower court.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 627(2)—Question on motion to dismiss for failure to file transcript is one of diligence as to which court has large discretion.

The primary question on a motion to dismiss for failure to file transcript within the time prescribed by a rule of the Supreme Court is whether the appeal has been diligently prosecuted, and in the decision of such question the court has a very large discretion.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. S. Koford, Judge.

Action by the Town of Mill Valley against the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, and Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. C. Symonds, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The respondent has applied for a rehearing of the order denying its motion to dismiss the appeal in this case. The rehearing is asked on the ground that the default of the appellant occurred on October 2, 1921, which was the expiration of 20 days after he had filed his notice under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, requesting a transcript of the record and proceedings in the cause for use on appeal; that the transcript was not filed in pursuance of said notice until April 27, 1922; that no extensions of time had been granted by the court; and that after April 2, 1922, no relief from such default could be granted under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. The facts shown by the affidavit of the appellant are that the delay was caused by the extreme length of the transcript, which made it impossible for the reporter, although diligently at work thereon, to complete its preparation until April 27, 1922. This was not the default of the appellant, even if it had been shown that the official reporter was negligent in the preparation of the transcript.

[1] When proceeding under section 953a the appellant must rely on the official conduct of the officers of the court. Their delay or default is not his delay or default. It is not a case for the application of section 473.

[2] There is no provision of the Code which fixes the time, after the taking of an appeal, within which the transcript must be filed. That matter is regulated by the rules of this court. Rule 2 (176 Pac. vii) requires a transcript to be filed within 40 days after the appeal is perfected—that is, after the filing of notice of appeal—except among other things, that when a notice requesting a transcript under section 953a is filed, the time to file a transcript in the Supreme Court shall not begin to run “until such transcript is approved and certified as required by law,” or until the proceeding to obtain it “has been terminated in the court below by dismissal or otherwise.” If there is lack of diligence on the part of the officers of the lower court in preparing the transcript, the respondent may obtain a dismissal of that proceeding, where it is proper to do so, by applying to that court. It is not the theory upon which rule 2 was adopted that the matter of such diligence in the preparation of the record on appeal should ordinarily be subject to investigation and determination in this court on a motion to dismiss the appeal. Such matters can more properly be adjudicated in the superior court. There has been no termination of the proceeding to obtain a typewritten transcript in the court below, by dismissal or otherwise. The transcript was not filed with the clerk as required by section 953a until April 27, 1922, and the time for settlement thereof was then fixed for May 2, 1922, of which notice was duly given.

[3] Hence, for the purposes of the consideration of this court on a motion to dismiss, where the record shows no lack of diligence by appellant on his own part and no termination below, the time for filing the transcript will not begin to run until such transcript is approved and certified by the judge of the court below. At the time of the hearing, therefore, the time for filing a transcript had not yet begun to run. The motion was denied for these reasons.

[4] The primary subject of investigation upon a motion to dismiss for failure to file a transcript within the time prescribed by our rule, whatever the technical aspect of the case may be, is always the question whether the appeal has been diligently prosecuted. In the decision of that question the court has a very large discretion. It is seldom that the facts of any case will form a precedent for the determination of another upon a question of that character.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. (Cr. 613.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 7, 1922.)

1. Burglary — 41(6)—Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that defendant committed the burglary.

In a prosecution for burglary in the first degree, evidence held sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the defendant committed the burglary.

2. Burglary — 41(5)—Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding the burglary was committed in the nighttime.

In a prosecution for burglary in the first degree, evidence that the building burglarized was in a densely populated section, and that the burglary was committed between the hours of 8:30 in the evening and 8:30 the next morning, held sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the burglary was committed in the nighttime.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

George Williams was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Charles F. Metteer, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary of the first degree and appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The building burglarized is on Fourth street, between L and M, in the city of Sacramento, in what the appellant describes in his closing brief as "the densely populated oriental section of the city." The owner left the building on Saturday evening, October 1, 1921, at 8:30, and on his return the next morning at 8:30 he discovered that the place had been entered from the rear and 15 pairs of trousers, 8 or 9 coats, and between 50 and 60 shirts stolen. The defendant was arrested October 5. Prior to his arrest the defendant sold two of the stolen shirts to a man on the street and a pair of the stolen trousers at a secondhand store, signing the name "Harry Wilson" instead of his own at the latter place. At the trial he denied having sold the two shirts, but admitted that he sold the trousers. He denied having signed the name "Harry Wilson." In explaining his possession of the trousers, he testified that on the 4th day of October there were 10 or 12 men gambling under the Yolo end of the M street bridge, and that one of them "went broke in the game, and he asked several fellows if—who wanted to buy the pants; by me being a little ahead of the game, he asked me, and I paid him a dollar and a half for the pants." W. M. Hallahan, detective sergeant of the police department of Sacramento, testified that he interviewed the defendant prior to his arrest, and that the defendant at first denied having sold any trousers at a secondhand store, but later admitted that he had sold a pair, not involved apparently in this case, at a secondhand store October 3; that witness "asked him where he got them. He says he was shooting crap or playing cards with a bunch of fellows down along the river front there. A fellow sold them to him for a dollar and a half."

[1, 2] A reversal of the case is asked on two grounds: (1) That there is no evidence connecting the defendant with the commission of the crime. (2) That there is no evidence tending to show that the burglary was committed in the nighttime. There can be no doubt that the evidence is sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the defendant committed the burglary. The only evidence, other than that stated, tending to show that the burglary was committed in the nighttime, is that of a witness who saw two men in the alley near the place where the entry was made at 10:30 in the evening. One of them was about the height of the defendant, and the other was small. The witness was within about 12 feet of them but could not tell whether they were white or colored. The defendant is a colored man. The witness did not testify to any suspicious or unusual conduct on the part of these men and his testimony must be treated as of slight value.

Appellant correctly states that the burden is on the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the burglary was committed in the nighttime, and he contends that this burden has not been sustained. In support of his contention he cites a number of cases. In some of them the circumstances proved are less convincing than those of the instant case. In others the surrounding facts and circumstances are not stated. That of People v. Griffin, 19 Cal. 578, was tried prior to the enactment of the statutory definition of the term "nighttime." The court said that at the time of the entry "there was light enough out of doors to discern a man's features across the street. * * * The presence of sufficient daylight to discern a man's features has long been adopted as a criterion to determine whether or not the act was done in the nighttime within * * * the law applicable to burglary." In State v. Gunderson, 56 Wash. 672, 106 Pac. 194, 21 Ann. Cas. 350, the ship burglarized was in sole charge of a keeper who was absent all day and returned in the evening. On arising the next morning he for the first time discovered that a burglary had been committed. In Waters v. State, 53 Ga. 567, the burglary "was committed within a period of about 40 or 45 minutes, one-half of which was day, and one-half was night." In State v. Gray, 23 Nev. 301, 46 Pac. 801, the defendant entered a barn and took a saddle therefrom between the hours of 6 o'clock in the evening of June 4 and 7 o'clock the next morning. The defendant left town early in the morning of June 5—how early does not appear—starting from the residence of a woman who lived in the same block in which the barn was situated. The opinion does not disclose whether the vicinity was thickly or sparsely settled. In Leisenberg v. State, 60 Neb. 628, 84 N. W. 6, the burglary was committed March 29th between 6:30 p. m. and 9 o'clock of the same evening, the surrounding circumstances not appearing from the decision. In Ashford v. State, 36 Neb. 38, 53 N. W. 1036, the evidence showed that the burglary was committed between the hours of 2 a. m. and 9 a. m. of the same day. The court said:

"There is also a lack of evidence as to the location of the Reynolds house [the place burglarized], as to whether it was situated in the quiet or busy portion of the city and as to whether there were other residences or houses in the same vicinity. If located in the heart of the city, the probabilities that the entry was made before daylight would be greater than if situated in a more sparsely settled portion."

In all of the cases thus far considered the evidence was held insufficient to show an entry in the nighttime.

In this case the burglary was committed in a densely populated part of the city and the articles stolen were of considerable bulk. It is highly improbable that the defendant would take the risk of breaking into the building and carrying away these bulky articles in broad daylight in a populous section of the city. In People v. Dupree, 98 Mich. 28, 56 N. W. 1047, the court said:

"When a merchant enters his store in a city at the usual hour in the morning, though it be after daylight, and finds that it has been broken open and entered from the front door or window, it is contrary to good sense to say that the crime might have been committed after daylight, and therefore the court must direct an acquittal. Such crimes are not committed in broad daylight, but in the nighttime. The question was one for the jury, and not for the court."

In People v. Tracy, 121 Mich. 318, 80 N. W. 21, a barn was burglarized. The court said:

"The property stolen consisted of two large horse blankets, a set of single harness, a bridle, and a pair of hoppers. * * * The owner of the property was a farmer. Another farmer lived within 20 rods on one side, and another within 40 rods upon the other side. * * * The property was bulky, and it is not probable that one would run the risk of breaking into a building situated as these were, in daylight, and of carrying away property of this character. The chance of detection would be too great. The question was for the jury."

In Simon v. State, 125 Wis. 439, 103 N. W. 1100, the burglary was committed between twilight of August 22 and the afternoon of August 25, the owner of the house being absent in the meantime. The court said:

"The entry of the house was through a basement window, which, except for darkness, was in plain sight from the street and other residential grounds and residences in the vicinity. * * * The house was located in a residence locality. Other houses were close by. In the daytime people were accustomed to frequently pass by on the sidewalk and street in front thereof. * * * The place where the entry was effected, as regards opportunity for seeing the offender in the act, and the disturbance of things in the house were such as to render it highly unreasonable to suppose that the event could have occurred in the daytime without attracting the attention of some one while it was in progress; and highly unreasonable that any one would attempt such a thing, under the circumstances, except under cover of darkness, since opportunity for choosing such an occasion was ample. The verdict on this point is well supported by the evidence."

See, also, State v. Bancroft, 10 N. H. 105.

In the case of People v. McCarty, 117 Cal. 65, 48 Pac. 984, where the burglary was committed June 13, the court said:

"The defendant and others constructed a tunnel some 120 feet in length from the cellar of a certain saloon to a point immediately beneath the floor of a certain bank building in the city of Los Angeles, for the purpose of committing larceny. Upon the day set for the actual entry through the floor into the building the defendant and his confederates, some time during the afternoon, entered the cellar, one of them emerging therefrom at 7 o'clock p. m. * * * The others came out of the cellar at 12 o'clock that night. The burglary was committed by these men at some time during these hours. The finding of the jury on this question was a matter peculiarly within its province; and upon this evidence the court will not disturb the verdict in this regard."

Under the foregoing authorities, there can be no doubt that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. JOHNSON. (Cr. 593.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 7, 1922.)

1. Robbery — Information held to sufficiently express intent.

An information, charging that defendant made an assault to steal, necessarily carries the implication that his purpose or intent was to steal, etc., though the word "intent" is not used.

2. Robbery — Information not defective in omitting "against his will."

An information for assault with intent to commit robbery was not defective in omitting the words "against his will" as contained in Pen. Code, § 211, the terms "force and fear" entirely covering the situation.

3. Criminal law — Defects in information held not reversible error.

Where the evidence was sufficient to establish every element of the offense charged, and the hearing proceeded as though the allegations of the information were complete, the cause should not be reversed on account of omissions from the information, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

4. Criminal law — Instruction must be considered in connection with entire charge.

In determining whether or not an instruction was erroneous, it must be considered in connection with the entire charge.

5. Criminal law — Instruction, invading province of jury, cured by remainder of charge.

An instruction: "The defendant is charged with assault with intent to rob. This charge includes the smaller offense of simple assault, and he may be found guilty of either of said offenses"—if invading the province of the jury, was not ground for reversal, where, considering the instructions together, the jury could not fail to understand that, unless convinced by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, they could not convict him of any crime.

6. Criminal law — Permitting correction of record after certification held not error.

It was not error for the trial court on motion of the district attorney, after the trial was completed and the record on appeal was certified, to permit the record to be corrected by adding averments to the information, which averments had been a part of the information as originally filed, but had been stricken on motion of the people and by consent of the defendant; correction being made to show a complete history of the trial.

7. Criminal law — Correction of record without prejudice.

If it was error for the trial court to permit a correction of the record after its certification on appeal, it was entirely without prejudice to the accused, where the correction was made only to show a complete history of the trial and proceedings.

8. Criminal law — Objection to reading statement of accused held not to raise objection to certain questions and answers therein.

Where accused's attorney, when the court assented to the reading by the district attorney of a statement made by accused, objected that: "If the court please, we object to this procedure. The witness has a right to see the entire paper before counsel reads anything from it at all. Then he can ask him as to it"—was not a sufficient objection that some of the questions and answers contained in the statement were objectionable.

9. Criminal law — Objection to reading of statement of accused held not opportune.

Where with the consent of the court prosecuting attorney read a statement made by accused, and then asked the defendant if it was not a correct copy of the statements made by him, an objection of accused's attorney, "It is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and I assign now the reading of the document as misconduct on the part of the district attorney, and I ask the court to strike it from the record and to request this jury to disregard every question and answer read to the defendant," was not opportunely presented.

10. Criminal law — Objections to reading of statement of accused should specify objectionable matter therein.

An objection to the reading of a statement of the accused and a motion to strike it from the record should specify the particular portions of the statement deemed objectionable.

11. Criminal law — Injury of remark of district attorney obviated by instruction.

Any possible injury from a remark of the district attorney, "I suppose the district attorney and all of the officers, including the reporter, are all crooks and only the defendant is innocent," was obviated by an instruction of the court for the jury to disregard it.

12. Witnesses — Cross-examination of defendant as to details of his visit to a certain place held proper to test his veracity.

In a prosecution for an assault with intent to commit robbery, where accused on direct examination testified that he came to the city for the purpose of buying wine for a certain third party, it was entirely proper to test his veracity for the district attorney to ask on cross-examination as to whether he was being paid by such third person for buying the wine.

13. Witnesses — Proper to ask accused if ever convicted of felony.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, it was not improper to ask defendant on cross-examination if he had been convicted of a felony.

14. Robbery — Evidence held to warrant conviction of assault with intent to commit robbery.

Evidence held sufficient to warrant conviction of an assault with intent to commit robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Orville Johnson was convicted of assault with intent to commit robbery, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was convicted of assault with intent to commit robbery and the appeal is from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point made is that the information states no offense against the defendant, or at least no offense of which the superior court has jurisdiction. The particular criticism is that there is no allegation of the intent with which the "assault" was made. The charging part of the information, as certified by the clerk, is as follows:

"That said Orville Johnson on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1921, at the said county of Napa, and before the filing of this information, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, violently, and forcibly make an assault upon the person of one H. R. Hill, with the felonious then and thereby to steal, take, and carry away from the person, possession, and immediate presence of said H. R. Hill the goods and personal property of the said H. R. Hill, and to accomplish the said stealing, taking, and carrying away by means of force then and there used upon and against the said H. R. Hill by the said defendant, and by then and there putting the said H. R. Hill in fear."

[1] The omission of the word "intent" was probably an inadvertence in the preparation of the transcript, as in the reporter's transcript certified by the trial judge the word appears. But, be that as it may, it is quite apparent that if the intent with which the assault was made was not directly expressed it was clearly implied by the use of the terms which were employed. To charge that a defendant made an assault to steal, take, and carry away certain goods necessarily carries the implication that his purpose or intent in making the assault was to steal, etc. If it were stated that A. went to Washington to see the President, it would not be open to dispute that his purpose in going to the capital was to see Mr. Harding.

[2] It is also suggested that the information was defective in omitting from the definition of robbery the element "against his will," as contained in section 211 of the Penal Code. The terms "force and fear," however, entirely cover this consideration. People v. Riley, 75 Cal. 98, 16 Pac. 544; People v. Ah Sing, 95 Cal. 654, 30 Pac. 796.

[3] Moreover, after trial, wherein the evidence was sufficient to establish every element of the offense of assault with intent to commit robbery, and wherein the hearing proceeded as though the allegations of the information were complete, in contemplation of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, the cause should not be reversed on account of any such alleged defect. People v. Bonfanti, 40 Cal. App. 614, 181 Pac. 80.

[4, 5] The next asserted error relates to the action of the court in giving this instruction:

"The defendant is charged with assault with intent to rob. This charge includes the smaller offense of simple assault, and he may be found guilty of either of said offenses."

This instruction must be considered in connection with the entire charge, and, as thus viewed, it is not to be condemned. The court thereby did not attempt to define fully the crime with which the defendant was charged, but the offense was characterized in general terms to indicate that it embraced two separate offenses. Standing alone, it possibly might be subject to the criticism that it invaded the province of the jury in suggesting that they should convict the defendant of one or the other of these offenses, but it was immediately followed by these plain directions:

"If you find to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant committed an assault on H. R. Hill with the intent of robbing said Hill, as charged in the information, you should find defendant guilty of assault with intent to rob.

"If you entertain a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's intent in the matter, but find to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that he assaulted said Hill, as charged in the information, you should find defendant guilty of assault.

"And if you entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether defendant assaulted said Hill, you should find the defendant not guilty."

And in the beginning of the charge the court stated:

"I instruct you that in considering this case you must not act upon any outside influences or reports, if any have come to your notice. If the defendant is guilty such guilt must be determined by you from the evidence which has been introduced before you at this trial, and upon that evidence alone you must be guided in rendering your verdict."

Again:

"I instruct you that the law raises no presumption whatever against the defendant, but, on the contrary, every presumption of the law is in favor of his innocence; and in order to convict him of the crime alleged in the information, or of any lesser crime which may be included in it, every material fact necessary to constitute such crime must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; and, if you entertain any reasonable doubt upon any single fact or element necessary to constitute the crime, it is your duty to give the defendant the benefit of such doubt and acquit him."

Considering these instructions together, the jury could not fail to understand that, unless convinced by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, they could not convict him of any crime.

[6, 7] After the trial was completed and the record on appeal was certified the trial court permitted, on motion of the district attorney, the record to be corrected by having added to the information the following averment:

"That the defendant, before the commission of the offense charged in this information, was in a general court-martial of the United States army convicted of a felony."

It is not questioned that this was a part of the information as filed by the district attorney, but, when the cause was called for trial, on motion of the people and by consent of the defendant that part was withdrawn, and it was not read to the jury. If the record is to show a complete history of the trial and proceedings it is entirely proper for it to exhibit the information as it was filed. That a portion of it was afterward stricken out or withdrawn is no reason why the actual condition at the time it was filed with the clerk may not be shown. Moreover, if the action of the court in correcting the record was irregular, of course it is entirely without prejudice as far as this appeal is concerned. It has no effect upon the judgment and does not concern at all the merits of the verdict of conviction.

[8-10] Complaint is made of the action of the court in permitting the district attorney to read what purported to be a statement of appellant made to the officers after his arrest. It seems that on direct examination he was interrogated about the statement, and the record shows the following on cross-examination:

"Q. Was the reporter present in the sheriff's office when you made your statement there? A. Sir? Q. Was the reporter present in the sheriff's office when you made your statement? A. Statement to you? Q. Yes, sir. A. Yes, sir. Q. The reporter was taking it down in shorthand? A. Yes, sir. Q. I will show you what purports to be a transcript made by the shorthand reporter, as to what transpired in the sheriff's office, and I will ask you if that is the statement you made? A. No, sir; this is not a correct statement of what I done in the sheriff's office. Q. Wait a minute, let me have an answer 'Yes' or 'No' to the question, if you will.

"Mr. Riggins: I am going to read to him the statement; I am going to ask him now the questions and answers as I have them here. I might take a short cut and take this statement as a whole; of course, I am going to ask him separate questions.

"The Court: Go ahead and do it.

"Mr. Cavitt: One moment, if the court please, we object to this procedure. The witness has a right to see the entire paper before counsel reads anything from it at all. Then he can ask him as to it."

The court permitted the district attorney to proceed with the questions and answers. We can see no merit in appellant's objection to the proceeding. It was the right of appellant to see the statement, which had been reduced to writing, before he was questioned concerning it (section 2052, Code Civ. Proc.), but that is the exact course which was pursued. The district attorney showed him the statement, and we must presume that he examined it sufficiently to satisfy himself as to its contents. Nothing appears to indicate that he was not allowed ample time to do so. It is apparent therefore that the only objection made by appellant to this line of examination is entirely untenable. No doubt some of the questions and answers contained in said statement were objectionable, but appellant did not direct specific attention to them, and it is now too late to complain. After reading the document the district attorney asked this question:

"I ask you now, if that is not a correct copy of the statement you made that night in the presence of the people you have already mentioned?"

To which counsel for appellant responded:

"Don't answer that question. If the court please, I object to that on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and I assign now the reading of the document as misconduct on the part of the district attorney, and I ask the court to strike it from the record and to request this jury to disregard every question and answer read to the defendant."

The court overruled the objection and denied the motion. The ruling was correct. If there was any merit in the objection, the matter was not opportunely presented to the court. Besides, the objection and motion were addressed to the statement in its entirety rather than to certain particular portions which alone might be deemed objectionable.

[11] Fault is found with the following remark of the district attorney made in response to a provocative statement of counsel for appellant:

"I suppose the district attorney and all of the officers, including the reporter, are all crooks, and only the defendant is innocent."

It is altogether improbable that such statement would have any effect upon the verdict, but any possible injury was obviated by the instruction of the court for the jury to disregard it.

[12, 13] The district attorney on cross-examination of the defendant asked this question: "Were you to be paid anything by Mr. Dozier for buying the wine?" On the direct examination he had testified that he came from Vallejo to Napa for the purpose of buying wine for Mr. Dozier, and it was entirely proper to test his veracity for the district attorney to probe the surrounding circumstances of that asserted engagement. We may add that it was not improper to ask the witness if he had been convicted of a felony. Section 2051, Code Civ. Proc.

[14] We think there is no merit in the contention that the evidence did not warrant the conviction. The argument of appellant is apparently grounded upon the assumption that the jury should have accepted his statement of the affair, and that it was little less than an outrage for them to believe the prosecuting witness and other witnesses for the people. Giving full credit, as we must, to the testimony of H. R. Hill, we cannot escape the conclusion that appellant was justly convicted. The former was walking after dark in a certain alley in the city of Napa, and, in his own language:

"I felt somebody put his hand on my shoulder, and I looked around on this side (illustrating), and I saw something come around this way; somebody put something in my face. * * * It was the defendant. * * * He had a pistol. He stuck it up in my face, and told me not to holler. Then he grabbed me, and we went down, and as we were going down he kicked me in the mouth. * * * He kicked me hard enough that he pretty near come getting me, and he was going to try to do it again, and I kept him from doing it."

It further appears that the witness called for help while struggling with the defendant, and an officer and others came and appellant was taken into custody.

Other circumstances appear in the record indicating that the purpose of the defendant was to rob Mr. Hill, but we need go no further.

We are satisfied that no reason has been shown for disturbing the verdict, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

TETER v. THOMPSON. (Civ. 3709.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1922.)

1. Sales §479(6)—Transfer by defendant of possession lawfully acquired before claim and delivery is begun does not defeat action.

Where the property for which an action of claim and delivery was begun was lawfully acquired by defendant under a conditional contract of sale so that the common-law action would have been detinue and not replevin, the fact that defendant had transferred possession of the property to another before the action was begun does not bar plaintiff's right to maintain the action and have a judgment for return of the property or its value, though such an action could not be maintained if the original taking were tortious and the property was not in defendant's possession when the action was begun.

2. Sales §479(4)—Demand for possession and action to recover is sufficient notice of election to rescind conditional sale.

Where a conditional sale contract authorized the seller to retake possession of the property upon the exercise of his right to declare the agreement null and void, it was not necessary for plaintiff to make a declaration of intention in the language of the contract, but his demand of possession of the property after default in making a payment thereon and his institution of an action to recover the property was a sufficient manifestation of his election to rescind.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by F. M. Teter, doing business under the fictitious name of Teter Motor Car Company, against L. R. Thompson, for claim and delivery of personal property. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. E. McDowell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James W. Miller and John E. Carson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover possession of personal property, or the reasonable value thereof in case delivery of the property cannot be had, together with damages for the unlawful detention of the property. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered in favor of defendant.

On the 8th day of June, 1918, pursuant to the terms of a contract of conditional sale, plaintiff delivered to the defendant a certain truck described in the contract. The purchaser paid $500, and agreed to pay the further sum of $200 on the 5th day of July, 1918. By the terms of the contract, the purchaser agreed:

"That if he fails to make any of the above payments when due, or within ten days thereafter, or violates any of the terms of this contract, then the seller at his option and without notice may elect to declare the whole purchase price due and payable, or the seller may declare this agreement null and void, and in that event the seller may take possession of said automobile, and the purchaser agrees to forfeit all payments made thereon and also forfeit all right and interest in said automobile, time being of the essence of this agreement. * * * The second party acquires no interest in or title to said property until all payments as agreed shall be made; when the first party agrees to execute to the second party a bill of sale to said property. * * * Time is expressly made of the essence of this contract."

[1] Nothing was paid by the purchaser on account of this contract after the initial payment. In August, 1919, plaintiff made demand on the defendant for possession of the truck, but the defendant refused to comply with that demand. The fact was that prior to that time the defendant had sold and delivered the truck to a third party; since which time it never has been in possession of or under control of the defendant. By reason of these proved facts it was found by the court (contrary to the allegations of the complaint) that the defendant did not have possession of the truck either at the time of commencement of this action or thereafter. Counsel for appellant and counsel for respondent seem to agree that the judgment in favor of defendant rests upon the proposition that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action because the personal property sought to be recovered was not in defendant's possession at the time of commencement of the action. This presents the question upon which the appeal may be determined.

The principal decisions relied upon by respondent are Richards v. Morey, 133 Cal. 437, 65 Pac. 886, and Riciotto v. Clement, 94 Cal. 105, 29 Pac. 414. In Richards v. Morey, the court said:

"This is an action to recover possession of personal property which, it is alleged, the defendant took against the will of the plaintiffs, and now detains from their possession. But the finding shows that the property sought to be recovered was not in the possession of the defendant when the action was commenced, nor within his power to deliver, and therefore said finding would not have sustained a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the delivery of the buildings, or for the value of them in case a delivery could not be had."

Riciotto v. Clement was an action to recover possession of personal property belonging to the plaintiff, which had been seized by the defendant as constable acting under a writ of attachment against one Smith. At the time of commencement of this possessory action against the constable the goods had passed out of his possession. The court held that the action was one brought to obtain the benefit of a statutory remedy, the action being designated by the court as "an action of claim and delivery." The court held that neither "the action of replevin in the detinue," nor "the action of claim and delivery," can be supported against a defendant not in possession at the time of commencement of the action.

It should be noted that in the cases mentioned above the cause of action had its origin in a wrongful taking, or tortious seizure of property by the defendant. In Faulkner v. First Nat. Bank, 130 Cal. 258, 62 Pac. 463, it was held that where the defendant obtained possession lawfully under a contract of bailment, but detained the property unlawfully, an action may be maintained to recover possession of the property or its value from the bailee, even though prior to the commencement of the action the bailee has wrongfully transferred the property to other persons. The court said that this was just the kind of wrong for which at common law the action of detinue was especially appropriate; and that it was no defense to an action of detinue to plead that the defendant before the commencement of the action had wrongfully disposed of the property and therefore was not in possession of it. After citing sundry authorities, the court said:

"The principles declared in the foregoing authorities are eminently just, and are founded on the maxim that no one can take advantage of his own wrong; and they are as applicable now to an action based on a contract of bailment as they were to such an action when it had to be brought under the special form of detinue. The usual judgment in such action is in the alternative—that is, that the plaintiff recover possession of the property, or its value in case delivery cannot be had; but where it appears that the property cannot be delivered the defendant is in no way prejudiced by a judgment for the value only; and the fact that the judgment is not in the alternative is no ground for reversal."

The court also sustained the plaintiff's right of action in that case for another reason:

"There is another feature of the case, however, which disposes of this technical point adversely to appellant. The averments in the complaint of the demand by respondent of the appellant that it deliver to her the property, and appellant's refusal to do so, are sufficient averments of conversion; and the action may therefore be considered in the nature of trover, and thus considered there can be no objection to the form of the judgment."

The judgment was for recovery of the value of the property wrongfully detained.

In New Liverpool, etc., Co. v. Western, etc., Co., 151 Cal. 479, 91 Pac. 152, it appeared that the defendant was in possession of a quantity of salt as bailee; that prior to the commencement of the action the plaintiff had become entitled to possession upon demand. Demand was made by plaintiff and delivery of possession was refused by defendant. The action was brought to recover possession of the property, or its value if possession could not be obtained. Following the decision in Faulkner v. Bank, supra, the court held that the fact that a defendant had before the demand or before the action was begun parted with the possession of the salt was no defense, and approved the declaration that such an action is of the character formerly known as an action in detinue, and that the rights of the parties are to be determined by the principles of the common law applicable to that form of action. We are of the opinion that the fact that defendant had transferred the truck to a third person, and did not have it in possession at the time of commencement of this action, does not deprive the plaintiff of the right to maintain this action.

[2] Finding III states:

"That it is not true that the plaintiff herein subsequent to the 15th day of July, 1918, or at any other time or at all declared said agreement null and void or null or void, or became at such time entitled to the possession of said automobile; that it is not true that at all the times since this plaintiff has been and now is, or has been or now is, the owner and entitled or the owner or entitled to the possession of said automobile."

Since the defendant was in default by reason of nonpayment of the amount due from him under the contract, and also by reason of his transfer of the property contrary to the terms of the contract, the plaintiff became entitled to possession of the property, upon the exercise of his right to "declare this agreement null and void." Such declaration need not have been made in the very terms of the contract. When the plaintiff demanded possession and (upon defendant's refusal to comply with that demand) commenced this action to recover the property or its value, he thereby elected to put an end to the contract and waive his claim for the unpaid balance of the purchase price as definitely as if he had used the formula, "I hereby declare said contract null and void."

The judgment is reversed.

MORRIS et al. v. SIERRA & SAN FRANCISCO POWER CO. (Civ. 2422.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 8, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 5, 1922.)

1. Electricity ☞19(2)—Complaint for burning plaintiff's building held sufficient, though not mentioning intervening wire strung under which current was transmitted.

In an action against an electric power company for the burning of plaintiff's building, a complaint alleging the cause of the damage to be the negligent construction and maintenance of defendant's high-tension line was sufficient to sustain recovery on the theory that the power from the high-tension line was negligently permitted to enter a telephone wire strung under the high-tension wire, and that the telephone wire came in contact with plaintiff's wire, causing the fire, though the complaint did not mention the telephone wire.

2. Pleading ☞428(3) — Failure to object to evidence held to cure omission of issue from complaint.

The failure of defendant to object at the trial to evidence showing how the accident occurred is sufficient to cure the deficiency in the allegations in the complaint as to the manner in which it occurred.

3. Telegraphs and telephones ☞14—Regulation by State Railroad Commission as to distance between crossing lines held valid.

The regulation of the State Railroad Commission fixing the clearance between telegraph and telephone lines at crossings with similar lines was not unreasonable and was within the power of the Commission granted by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 18, § 30, which was authorized by Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23.

4. Electricity ☞18(1)—Violation by plaintiff of order fixing distance between crossing wires is contributory negligence in law.

Where plaintiff maintained a telephone wire crossing under a telephone wire of a power company with a clearance less than that prescribed by the Railroad Commission, he was contributorily negligent as a matter of law, and cannot recover for a fire started by a high-tension current entering his wire through the telephone wire which had been short-circuited with the high-tension line.

5. Electricity ☞19(5)—Extension of time for complying with requirements of Railroad Commission held not to disprove prior negligence.

In an action against a power company for a fire caused by its negligence, proof that after the fire the Railroad Commission extended the time within which the defendant should reconstruct its lines to comply with St. 1911, p. 1037, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1058, without proof as to the date of the order originally fixing the time for such compliance, does not show that the maintenance of the company's lines prior to the time of the fire in violation of the statutes and regulations was not negligence as a matter of law.

6. Electricity ☞16(1)—Extension of time to reconstruct power lines does not excuse failure to maintain proper distance between telephone lines.

An extension of time granted to a power company within which to reconstruct its power lines to comply with the statutory requirements does not excuse the maintenance by the power company of a telephone line on the same poles as its power line, in violation of regulations of the commission prescribing the clearance between telephone and telegraph lines at crossings.

7. Electricity ☞16(7)—Negligent construction of telephone line held cause of damage.

The maintenance by a power company of a telephone wire on its power poles without the clearance required by the Railroad Commission at a crossing above a telegraph wire of plaintiff was the proximate cause of damage to plaintiff resulting from a high-tension current transmitted to his telegraph wire through the telephone wire, regardless of the cause of the short-circuiting elsewhere of the telephone wire with the defendant's high-tension line.

8. Electricity ☞19(13)—Negligence of both plaintiff and defendant maintaining illegal crossing of lines proximately causes injury by fire.

Where plaintiff's telegraph wire and defendant's telephone wire were maintained at a crossing without the clearance required by the Railroad Commission, the negligence of both plaintiff and defendant concurred in proximately causing the damage resulting to plaintiff from contact between the wires, and a verdict for plaintiff cannot be sustained as a finding by the jury that plaintiff's negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury.

9. Electricity ☞18(1)—Prior construction of plaintiff's line does not relieve it of negligence in maintaining illegal construction at crossing of other lines.

The fact that plaintiff's telegraph line was constructed before defendant's telephone line which crossed it does not relieve plaintiff from the imputation of negligence as a matter of law in maintaining his telegraph wire at the crossing without the clearance between it and the telephone wire required by the Railroad Commission.

10. Electricity ☞18(1) — Interference with highway does not excuse maintenance of illegal crossing of telegraph over telephone wire.

The fact that plaintiff's telegraph wire could not be lowered at the point where defendant's telephone line crossed above it without interference with the highway does not excuse plaintiff's maintenance of his line with insufficient clearance between it and the telephone line overhead.

11. Electricity ☞19(4)—Evidence of repairs after accident is incompetent.

In an action against a power company for damage caused when its telephone wire, which had become short-circuited with its power line, came in contact with plaintiff's telegraph wire, evidence as to repairs and improvements made by defendant upon its wires subsequent to the date of the accident was incompetent.

12. Trial ☞84(2)—Objection question called for opinion does not raise objection it was incompetent as subsequent repair after injury sued for.

An objection that questions asked by plaintiff called for the opinion of the witness was insufficient to raise the question of the competency of the evidence called for, because it related to repairs and improvements made by defendant since the accident.

13. Trial ☞91—Motion to strike unavailable where proper objection to question was not made.

Where the objection was insufficient to raise the question that the evidence called for was incompetent as evidence of improvements after the accident, a motion to strike the testimony on that ground was unavailable to defendant.

Action by Saul Morris and another against the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, and John B. Curtin, of Sonora, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action in tort, and the appeal is by the defendant from a judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $8,564.38, as compensatory reimbursement to the plaintiff Morris for damage alleged to have been sustained by him through the alleged negligent act of the defendant in causing the store building and its contents of said Morris at Chinese Camp, Tuolumne county, to be destroyed by fire.

The general facts are: It appears that in the year 1885 Morris constructed, and down to the time of the fire causing the destruction of the property in question continuously maintained and operated, a telegraph line extending from his store at Chinese Camp to the city of Sonora, via the town of Jamestown, in Tuolumne county, the latter town being situated a short distance only from the town of Chinese Camp. This telegraph line was dedicated to the public service and consisted of one line of poles and a single wire. A number of years (some of the witnesses approximate the number at about 15 years) after said telegraph line had been established and in operation, the defendant power company, or rather, its predecessor in interest and grantor, installed in Tuolumne county an electric power line carrying 16,500 volts of electricity. This high-power line extended from what is known as Phoenix dam, "down past Jamestown, passing through the outskirts" of the last-named place and on to the Rawhide mine, in said county. The power line crossed the state highway at Jamestown, or on the outskirts thereof, and for a distance of several hundred feet passed through or over the bottom of a ravine to a point very near to a small body of water known as "Leland's fishpond." Said line, between the highway and said pond, was supported by three poles, the distance between which was from 125 to 150 feet. The high-power wires were on cross-arms located at the tops of the poles, and thereunder there had been placed smaller cross-arms, carrying two wires (one at each end thereof) used by appellant as a telephone system. At a point between the highway and the "fishpond," and about 200 feet distant from the highway, the Morris telegraph line, which, as seen, consisted of but one wire, crossed or passed underneath the power company's wires; and at this point the wire of the Morris line was held by two poles, so placed that one was at the top of each side of the ravine at about the same elevation, and the span of said line where it crossed underneath the power line was between 250 and 300 feet, being much longer than the span of the power company lines at that point.

On the morning of July 12, 1918, the general merchandise store of the plaintiff Morris at Chinese Camp caught fire, which partially destroyed the building and completely destroyed the stock of merchandise and fixtures contained in said building. Morris carried insurance on the building and stock of goods with his coplaintiff, three different policies, aggregating the sum of $3,200, having been at some time previously to the fire so issued to the said Morris. At this point it may be stated that the plaintiff Fireman's Fund Insurance Company, upon adjusting the loss, paid to Morris the total amount called for by the three several policies referred to, and that said company is in the case here claiming subrogation to such proportion of any rights established herein by the plaintiff Morris as is represented by the amount paid by it to Morris under said policies of insurance.

The building in which Morris carried on the merchandise business and which was in part destroyed by the fire in question was made of brick, with iron doors, and of the dimensions of 25 feet in width by 50 feet in length. The walls of the building were 18 inches in thickness. The height of the building was 12 feet, with a 4-foot fire wall. The roof was made of dirt and bricks with a tin covering, and the windows and the doors had iron shutters. Early in the evening preceding the morning of the fire Morris personally closed the store by locking the doors. On the morning of the fire, while he was still in bed, his attention in some manner was called to the fact that a fire had broken out in his store, and he immediately arose and hastened thereto. He found the doors and windows closed and locked as he had left them the previous evening. He looked through a hole in one of the walls of the building through which letters and other mail were deposited in the store and discovered that the fire was in the north end of the building, in close proximity to the point where the telegraph instrument was located. There was considerable smoke in the building, and it was apparent that the fire had already obtained considerable headway. He, with others, attempted to arrest the progress of the fire, but to no purpose.

After the building and contents had been destroyed, Morris, believing that the fire had been caused by the emission of electric sparks from his telegraph instrument and that this was in turn caused by the surcharge of his wire with an unusual voltage of electricity by reason of its contact with some high-power wire, proceeded, with others, to make an inspection of his line. They reached the point where the lines of the defendant and his line crossed each other as above described, and there he found that one of the telephone lines of the defendant had been broken, the end of said line falling to the ground and setting the dry weeds thereabouts on fire, burning a space of about 30 or 40 feet. His own line had been loosened from its insulation and dropped against a cottonwood tree and there grounded. The theory is that the telephone line of the defendant had, through some cause, come in contact with its high-power line, became overcharged with electrical energy, and was thereby caused to sever and fall on the line of the plaintiff Morris and so charge it with an unusual voltage, sufficient to cause the trouble at his store which resulted in the fire.

[1] The first point urged by the defendant is that the verdict cannot be supported by any of the alleged negligent acts set forth in the complaint. This point grows out of the proposition that the complaint nowhere mentions the telephone line, and alleges that the cause of the fire was through the negligent construction and maintenance of the defendant's high-power wire, by reason whereof electricity of high and dangerous voltage escaped from the said line and into the telegraph line, thereby causing the fire, etc.

[2] We think the complaint sufficiently alleges negligence against the defendant to meet the test of a general demurrer and even the demurrer upon the special grounds urged against it by the defendant. At any rate, there was no objection at the trial to evidence showing how the accident occurred, and this is itself sufficient to cure the deficiency of the complaint, even if it be conceded that there was any such deficiency in the particular referred to. Boyle v. Coast Improvement Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 720, 151 Pac. 25; Slaughter, Adm'x, etc., v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co. et al., 26 Cal. App. 318, 147 Pac. 90; Ruth v. Krone, 10 Cal. App. 770, 779, 103 Pac. 960.

There is no controversy between the parties as to how the fire was caused. Counsel for the defendant, both in their briefs and in their oral argument before this court, expressly admitted that the fire in the Morris store was due to the fact that the indirect contact of the high-power wire of the defendant with the wire of the Morris telegraph line overcharged the latter wire with such a high voltage of electricity as to produce the disastrous result of which complaint is here made. In the oral argument by the attorney for the defendant it was stated:

"The fire occurred in this manner: About three or four miles distant from the point of this crossing at a place known as Sullivan's creek a crane flew into the high-power wires of the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company. That caused a short circuit in the high-power system, allowing the wires to drop, or at least one, which brought the high-power wire into contact with the telephone wires. By means of the telephone wires the electricity was conducted to the particular crossing where the telephone wires of the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company and the Morris telegraph line came in contact, burning off the telephone wires of the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, due to the short circuit, and thereby shunting the electricity over the Morris line into the store at Chinese Camp."

But, while the defendant, through its counsel, makes this admission, and, indeed, has not denied that the fire was caused in the manner indicated by the foregoing statement, nevertheless contends that the plaintiff Morris was guilty of negligence which directly contributed to the commission of the alleged wrong for which he here seeks redress. In support of this position the appellant calls attention to the fact that the evidence disclosed that both the poles supporting the telegraph line over the ravine and at the point where the lines of the defendant crossed the former line were in an oblique position in the ground, and slanting in an opposite direction from each other. As to this, the theory of the appellant was and is that the poles had been driven or moved from a vertical position in which they were originally erected to the slanting position by some external cause, as by a heavy wind or contact of some heavy object therewith, and that the effect of the falling over of the poles was to take up the slack of the telegraph line and raise it nearer to or within a very short distance of the telephone line. It is claimed that this theory is sustained by evidence which tended to show that at the time that the telephone wire of the defendant had been repaired and thus placed in its original condition immediately after the fire occurred the space between the said wire and the telegraph wire of the plaintiff Morris was approximately an inch only. It is hence argued that, the telephone wire being restored to exactly the same condition in which it had always been maintained down to and at the time of the contact which produced the trouble, and the evidence failing to show that the telegraph wire was in any other condition than that in which it was at the time the telephone wire was repaired and restored to its original condition, the conclusion is irresistible that at some time prior to the fire the slanting of the poles upon which the telegraph wire was strung had caused the slack in said wire to be taken up or the wire itself to be stretched so as to become tense, thereby bringing said wire within the distance of an inch from the telephone wire. There was, however, evidence to the effect that the telegraph poles at the time of the inspection immediately following the fire were in a solid position in the ground, as though they were in the same condition as when originally placed there, and therefore, if the fact of the slanting position of the poles was to be regarded as significant in the determination of the question whether the plaintiff Morris was by reason thereof guilty of contributory negligence in the maintenance of his line, we would perhaps be required to say that the jury impliedly found, and were justified in so doing, that the poles were erected in slanting positions in the first instance, and that the condition as to said wire at the time of the collision between the two wires which caused the damage was no different from what it had always been.

As to the contact between the wires, the theory of the defendant is, as we have seen, that a crane, while in flight, at a point some three or four miles distant from where the wires in question crossed, attempted to pass between the telephone and the high-power wires, collided therewith, and so at the same time came in contact with both, and that thus the voltage from the power line was conducted into the telephone wire, causing a short circuit on the former wire, the result of which was to cause the telephone wire to fall upon and overcharge the telegraph wire of plaintiff and so produce the fire. The testimony of two of the witnesses for the plaintiffs supports this theory, and, upon the hypothesis that the cause of the contact between the wires is thus accounted for, counsel for defendant vigorously maintain that the damage resulted from a cause or an act beyond the control of human agency; that is to say, that the damage was entirely due to an act of God.

The plaintiffs contend, however, that, it having been shown that the fire was caused by the contact between the telegraph wire and the high-voltage wire through the telephone wire, the latter two wires belonging to the defendant, a prima facie case of negligence was thus established against the latter, and that thus a sufficient case was made to entitle them to a recovery, in the absence of a showing by the defendant that it was not guilty of negligence in the maintenance of its wires which contributed proximately to the damage (res ipsa loquitur), and that the verdict is conclusive against the defendant upon any matter of defense it set up or attempted to sustain.

But we may waive further consideration of all the above-stated propositions, since we are of the opinion that the contention of the appellant that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law must be sustained. Indeed, we think it is clear that both the plaintiff Morris and the defendant, in the maintenance of their said wires at the point indicated, were equally culpable and likewise guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and that such concurring negligence constituted the efficient or proximate cause of the fire and its disastrous results. It appears that there were at the time of the commission of the damage complained of herein and had been for a long time prior thereto authoritative regulations fixing or prescribing the distance which should exist between crossing wires carrying electricity, and which regulations it incontrovertibly appears from the evidence—indeed, it is admitted—were violated by both said plaintiff and the defendant in the maintenance of their respective wires at the point where the same crossed and where the direct cause of the destruction of the Morris building by fire occurred.

[3] On the 14th of December, 1912, the State Railroad Commission, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it by several acts of the Legislature, adopted what said body designated as its "general order No. 26," entitled, "Regulations governing clearances and construction at crossings of railroads, street railroads, telegraph, telephone, signal, trolley and power lines, with each other and with streets and public highways; also other overhead and side clearances of railroads, street railroads and wire lines." Section 3 of said order is under the subhead "Telegraph, Telephone and signal lines," and provides, among other things, that—

"Telegraph, telephone and signal lines, at crossings with other telegraph, telephone or signal lines, shall have a minimum clearance, above or below such lines, of 2 feet, unless suitably supported to prevent contact."

We presume it will not be questioned that the Legislature, in the exercise of the power conferred upon it by the provisions of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution, may rightfully invest the Railroad Commission with plenary power to regulate the manner in which railroad corporations and other public utilities shall maintain and conduct their business and the essential appliances thereof, and that said Commission may prescribe such regulations with respect to the carrying on of such utilities as may be necessary to safeguard and protect any rights of the public which may be affected thereby. And it will not be doubted that, upon the adoption of such regulations as it is within the legal competence of the Railroad Commission to promulgate with respect to public utilities and the maintenance of the essential equipments thereof, such regulations immediately acquire the force of law. Indeed, it is so declared by the Legislature itself in section 30 of an act of the extra sessions of the Legislature of 1911 (page 18), entitled, in part:

"An act to provide for the organization of the Railroad Commission, to define its powers and duties and the rights, remedies, powers and duties of public utilities," etc.

Said section reads:

"Every public utility shall obey and comply with each and every requirement of every order, decision, direction, rule or regulation made or prescribed by the commission in the matters herein specified, or any other matter in any way relating to or affecting its business as a public utility, and shall do everything necessary or proper in order to secure compliance with and observance of every such order, decision, direction, rule or regulation by all of its officers, agents and employees."

Nor can it justly be said that the regulations contained in order No. 26 with respect to telegraph, telephone, and power lines and the clearances which must be maintained between them where they cross each other are unreasonable or not in complete harmony with the powers with respect to such utilities with which the Constitution and the statutes passed in pursuance thereof have invested the Railroad Commission.

[4] Order 26 of the Railroad Commission became effective January 1, 1913, and it was served upon the plaintiff Morris, according to his own admission, a short time after it was adopted. Morris testified that continuously for some four or five years before the 12th day of July, 1918, when the fire occurred, there was a distance between his wire and the telephone wire of the defendant at the point where the two wires crossed and where the contact occurred of approximately one foot only. It is true that Morris stated that his measurement of the space between the two wires was not actual, but was based upon his judgment founded on his observation of the wires as he frequently passed along the highway near which the two wires crossed; but there is absolutely no other testimony in the record contradicting this statement or that is inconsistent with it. It is, in fact, the only testimony received which tended to show the distance which was maintained between the telegraph and the telephone wires, and, since it comes from the plaintiff himself, it must be accepted as the established fact in the case that the two wires mentioned were maintained continuously for several years down to and including the time at which the fire occurred at a distance only of one foot apart. Obviously this was in violation of order 26, above referred to, prescribing the minimum clearances between telegraph and telephone wires where the same cross each other, in the absence of the equipment of the line with such support as would prevent contact between it and the other wire. That neither the telegraph nor the telephone wire was furnished with such support is indubitably evidenced by the fact that a contact between the two wires actually occurred.

[5] As to the defendant, it is contended by its counsel that the corporation cannot be held to have been negligent as a matter of law, in that it violated the provision of order No. 26 of the Railroad Commission with respect to the clearances between telegraph and telephone lines, for this reason: That on the 20th day of November, 1918, said Commission adopted and issued an order extending the time allowed by a previous order within which the defendant should reconstruct its overhead electric lines so as to comply with the requirements of chapter 499 Laws of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1037), as amended by chapter 600, Laws 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1058). There are, however, several answers to this contention. The first is that it does not appear from the record when "decision 3701" referred to in the order purporting to extend the time to the defendant for the purpose stated was rendered or filed. It will be observed that the order purporting to extend the time and which is in the record before us was issued after the fire occurred, and, so far as this record discloses, the original order might have been made at some time subsequently to the date of the fire, to wit, July 12, 1918.

[6] But, assuming that the courts may take judicial notice of the orders or decisions of the Railroad Commission, and so ascertain and determine when decision No. 3701 was rendered by said Commission, there is still another reply to the contention, viz.: That the order purporting to extend the time within which the defendant was required to reconstruct its electric lines has reference to subdivision (c) of section 1 of the statute of 1915, which entirely deals with high-power lines, and not with telephone and telegraph lines. It follows, therefore, that even if the defendant has, by virtue of the order of extension referred to, until June 30, 1919, within which to reconstruct its power lines in conformity with the requirements of said order and the statute of 1915, it must, nevertheless, be held that it violated the regulation with respect to the clearance which should exist between telegraph and telephone lines crossing each other by maintaining its telephone wire a distance of one foot only from the telegraph wire of the plaintiff Morris, and that it was therefore, equally with said Morris, guilty of negligence as a matter of law. This being true, it also follows that it was the concurring negligence of Morris and the defendant which was the efficient, proximate cause of the damage complained of. It may be argued, though, that since the primary cause of the trouble was in the high-voltage wire, the determination of whether the defendant was negligent as a matter of law must rest upon the determination of the question of fact as to the distance between the high-power wire and the telegraph wire, and that, so determining the question whether the defendant was or was not negligent, we are required to fall back upon the order of the Railroad Commission extending to the defendant further time within which to reconstruct or readjust its power line, and that the conclusion therefrom must be that, although the power line was, in violation of the regulations above mentioned, within four feet of the telegraph line, the defendant is immune from the imputation of negligence as a matter of law because of said order.

[7] First, we may observe in this connection that, if the order purporting to give the defendant further time would have the effect, as probably it would, of relieving it of the imputation of negligence as a matter of law because of maintaining its high-power wire nearer the telegraph wire than is allowed by the regulations of the Railroad Commission, we would not be prepared to say that said order, notwithstanding that it was not specifically granted to the plaintiff Morris, would not also have the effect of relieving Morris of the imputation of negligence as a matter of law, since it would be a very anomalous, if, indeed, not an unjust, rule which would in effect declare that one of the parties so maintaining wires carrying electricity would, because violating the rule as to clearances between such wires, be guilty of negligence as a matter of law while the other would not. But this question does not arise here. The proposition is this: That the defendant maintained its telephone wire, which, as we have seen, does not come within the purview of the order of extension, nearer in proximity to the telegraph line of Morris than is permitted by the regulations of the Railroad Commission with respect to such wires, and that the telephone wire of the defendant was the direct instrumentality through which the telegraph wire became surcharged with electricity, thus causing the fire, and that but for said telephone wire so situated, whatever might have been the remote cause of the fire—that is, the cause of the contact between the wires, even assuming that the cause of the contact was correctly explained upon the theory of the flying crane—no damage would probably have occurred.

[8] The contention that the finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiffs necessarily involved an implied finding that it was the negligence of the defendant which constituted the efficient, proximate cause of the damage, even though both were negligent as a matter of law, and that such finding is conclusive upon this court, is in effect answered by the foregoing views and the conclusion following therefrom. Obviously, if both were guilty of negligence as a matter of law, such negligence being concurrent, the one is equally culpable with the other as to any injury which might proximately result therefrom. In other words, it would be contrary to the plainest precepts of logic to hold that, where injury follows from the maintenance of two electric wires in nearer proximity to each other than the law permits, the efficient, proximate cause of such injury may be imputed to one of the parties alone while the other is to be held free from blame. This conclusion follows from the proposition that, as in ordinary cases, where two parties own independent electric lines, each is charged with the duty of so maintaining his line as that the danger to the public of injury flowing from its maintenance will be reduced to the lowest reasonable minimum, so, where the maintenance of such wires so owned is within a distance prescribed by the law, it is as much the duty of the one to see that his wire is removed and maintained beyond the interdicted distance from the other wire as it is the duty of the other to do so. In other words, speaking concretely, the duty was no less upon Morris to see that his line was not within the inhibited distance from the defendant's telephone wire as it was the duty of the defendant to see that its telephone wire was not within such distance of the telegraph wire, and, as above suggested, if this duty was overlooked by either or both, necessarily any damage which may directly result from the contact of the two wires because of the fact of their being in too close proximity to each other under the law must be held to be proximately caused by the concurrent negligence of the owners of the two wires. Dow v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 157 Cal. 182, 106 Pac. 587; Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 423, 14 S. W. 863, 24 Am. St. Rep. 614. See, also, Harrington v. L. A. Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663; Cook v. Miller, 175 Cal. 497, 166 Pac. 316. If a third party had suffered damage as the direct result of the contact between the two wires, maintained, as they were, at a distance from each other prohibited by law, no one would be found to say that the proximate cause of such injury was not the concurrent negligence of both the defendant and the plaintiff, Morris. In other words, if the Morris wire had not grounded in the cottonwood tree, but had sent the high voltage to the place in Jamestown or the place in the town of Sonora where the telegraph line ended, equipped with the usual telegraph instruments, and had set either of the buildings in which it was there maintained on fire, destroying the building, the property of another, it could not be doubted that both the defendant and Morris would be joint tortfeasors, and that the party so damaged could maintain an action against them jointly for the injury thus inflicted.

[9] The fact is also emphasized by the plaintiffs that the telegraph wire was the first in point of time to be installed where the two lines crossed; the contention in effect being that thus the negligence of the defendant in so placing its wires in dangerous proximity to the telegraph wire constituted the proximate cause of the damage. This proposition, however, is not only answered by the above considerations, but also by the authorities, among which may be noted Dow v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., supra. In that case, which involved an action against two distinct corporations for an injury occurring to the plaintiff by reason of a contact between the respective wires of said corporations, due to the nearness in proximity of said wires, the point here suggested was made. Replying thereto, the court said:

"It matters not that the telephone wire was the last placed, and that this company therefore became in the first instance directly responsible for the negligent work. With knowledge upon the part of the appellant that the wire was thus dangerously close and liable to sag, the continued maintenance of the wires in this position was negligence upon the part of both companies"—citing a large number of cases from foreign jurisdictions.

[10] In this case, as we have shown, the plaintiff Morris had actual knowledge of the existence of the regulations as to the distance between telephone and telegraph wires as prescribed by the Railroad Commission; and it may be, although it is not necessary so to decide here, that he was bound by the regulations, whether he had actual knowledge of their existence or not. As above stated, it was his duty, as it was also that of the defendant, to exercise such vigilant inspection of his wire as would enable him to keep it the legal distance from the wires of the defendant. It is stated, though, in the brief of the respondents that Morris testified that he could not have lowered his telegraph line below the point where it was strung on his poles without interfering with the use of the road which passed through the ravine and under the wires where they crossed each other, and upon this it is in effect contended that Morris cannot be charged with contributory negligence as a matter of law or at all where it was impossible for him to comply with the regulations or remove his wire below where it was stretched on the poles without interfering with the use of said road. In the first place, we remark that we have not been able to find any testimony in the record, either from Morris or any other witness, to the effect that the lowering of the telegraph wire would have materially or at all interfered with the traffic over the road running under said wires at the point where they crossed each other. In the second place, if it be true that such a condition existed and that the telegraph wire could not be lowered without interference with the use of the road, the duty would still be upon Morris to maintain the distance between his wire and that of the defendant in accordance with the regulations prescribed by the Railroad Commission.

[11] There are certain assignments of error involving the action of the court in admitting certain evidence over the objection of the defendant and in the giving of certain instructions and in refusing to allow another which was proposed by the defendant. Under the view that we have taken of this case, as indicated above, it is hardly necessary to consider these assignments. But we do not deem it amiss, since possibly there may be another trial of the cause, to express the opinion that the refusal to give defendant's proposed instruction No. 10 involved prejudicial error; also we think that the testimony which the court allowed the plaintiff Morris to give as to the repairs and improvements made by the defendant upon its wires subsequent to the date of the fire was incompetent. Helling v. Schindler, 145 Cal. 303, 311, 312, 78 Pac. 710; Sappenfield v. Main St., etc., Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590; Hager v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 309, 311, 33 Pac. 119; Turner v. Hearst, 115 Cal. 394, 401, 47 Pac. 129; Limberg v. Glenwood, 127 Cal. 598, 604, 60 Pac. 176, 49 L. R. A. 33; Nalley v. Hartford Carpet Co., 51 Conn. 524, 50 Am. Rep. 47.

[12] But the ruling of the court permitting this evidence was not erroneous for the reason that the only objection urged by counsel for the defendant against it was that the questions eliciting said testimony called for the opinion of the witness.

[13] It is true that counsel for the defendant, after the testimony had been received against his objection upon the ground just stated, moved to strike out all the testimony on the ground that the facts and circumstances so testified to occurred after the happening of the fire, but his motion could not avail him, since it was not in accord with the ground upon which he made the objection. At any rate, the ruling denying the motion was not erroneous.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. RYAN. (Cr. 1021.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. April 12, 1922.)

Criminal law — §1070½, New, vol. 11 Key-Number Series—Appeal by state from order dismissing prosecution, taken after order sustaining demurrer to information, was taken in time.

In prosecution for violation of Medical Practice Act, where a demurrer to an information was sustained, and later, on failure of district attorney to file an information according to form required by the court order sustaining the demurrer, the action was dismissed, pursuant to Pen. Code, § 1008, on announcement by the district attorney in open court, according to section 1240, that the state would appeal, the appeal was taken in time; an announcement of an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to the information being merely surplusage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

In an appeal by the State from an order dismissing a prosecution against Al Ryan for violating the Medical Practice Act, defendant moves to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Lucas F. Smith, Lucas F. Smith, Jr., and

Stanford G. Smith, all of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal.

The transcript shows that the district attorney for the county of Santa Cruz filed an information for misdemeanor, to wit, violation of Medical Practice Act (St. 1917, p. 93), against the defendant on September 23, 1921. Defendant demurred to the information. The demurrer was sustained on September 26, 1921, and the district attorney was granted one week's time within which to file an amended information. On September 29, 1921, the district attorney presented an amended information to the court, which was substantially the same as the original information, and did not amend said original information in the respect required by the previous court order sustaining the demurrer. The court, thereupon, denied the district attorney leave to file the amended information in the form presented and informed him that unless an information amended in the manner indicated be filed by October 3, 1921, the action would be dismissed pursuant to the provisions of section 1008, Penal Code. The district attorney then stated that the prosecution did not desire to amend and "that the prosecution gives notice of appeal from the judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer."

On October 3, 1921, the parties appeared in court and the district attorney again refused to amend, whereupon the court ordered the action dismissed, pursuant to the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code. The district attorney then announced, in open court, that the prosecution appealed from the order made on September 26, 1921, sustaining the demurrer to the information, and also from the order made dismissing the action. Respondent now makes a motion to dismiss this appeal, upon the ground that the same was not taken in the time provided by section 1240, Penal Code.

The recent case of People v. Apple (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 487, is directly in point. It is there said:

"Since section 1008 of the Penal Code was amended, * * * there is no reason why the rule as to appeals in civil cases for the purpose of having the order of the court sustaining a demurrer reviewed, should not be applicable in criminal cases, and that the appeal in such instances should be from the judgment entered upon the order sustaining the demurrer and not from the order itself."

Under the ruling of this recent case, it was not necessary for the district attorney to appeal from the order of September 26, 1921, sustaining the demurrer. The judgment of dismissal which was entered under the provisions of section 1008, Penal Code, upon the failure of the district attorney to amend within a reasonable time, was the judgment entered on the order sustaining the demurrer and was the order from which the appeal should have been taken by the district attorney.

The order that the action be dismissed, pursuant to section 1008, Penal Code, was not made until October 3, 1921. At that time, the district attorney announced in open court, in accordance with section 1240, Penal Code, that the prosecution appealed from the order dismissing said action. It is true, he also announced that he appealed from the order sustaining the demurrer, theretofore made on September 26, 1921, but that announcement was merely surplusage and of no effect. The controlling fact is that at the time the order dismissing the action was made, which was the judgment entered upon the order sustaining the demurrer, the district attorney did, in open court, announce that the people appealed from the same. The appeal was taken in time, therefore, and is properly before this court.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

BEARDEN et al. v. BANK OF ITALY.
(Civ. 4210.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 18, 1922.)

Banks and banking — 143(7)—Bank held not liable for arrest of drawer of check wrongfully dishonored.

In an action by a drawer against a bank, for damages for wrongfully refusing to pay his check drawn upon it, after the payee of the check had informed the bank that the drawer would be arrested unless the check was paid, the subsequent arrest and incidental indignities suffered by the drawer was caused by an independent human agency, and hence was an intervening cause for which the bank was not liable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Tempest Bearden and husband against the Bank of Italy. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

I. M. Peckham, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Louis Ferrarl and Richard Fitzpatrick, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. Appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant entered following an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend.

The action was for damages in the sum of $25,000, the gravamen of the complaint being that the plaintiff, Tempest Bearden, as the result of the wrongful refusal of the defendant to honor a check drawn by her, was at the instance of the payees of the check arrested and imprisoned and subjected to indignities incidental to such arrest. The complaint contains an allegation to the effect that, after a first refusal of the defendant to pay said check, upon the ground of lack of funds to meet it, the payees "personally presented said check to said defendant and told said defendant that, unless said check was paid, they would cause the arrest of said plaintiff, Tempest Bearden, but notwithstanding said knowledge and in spite thereof the said defendant negligently willfully, and maliciously refused to honor said check, * * *" and the only question in the case, as is stated in the brief of the appellants is whether the quoted allegation takes the case out of the rule laid down in Hartford v. All Day and All Night Bank, 170 Cal. 538, 150 Pac. 356, L. R. A. 1916A, 1220.

That also was an action for damages for arrest and imprisonment upon the alleged wrongful refusal of a bank to pay a check drawn upon it, and it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, for the reason that the refusal to honor the check was not the proximate cause of the arrest. Upon this point the language of the court is as follows:

"The second legal principle which necessarily works a reversal of this judgment is that the damages claimed are in no legal sense the proximate result of the act of negligence complained of. It did not necessarily follow that the plaintiff would be arrested and charged with a felony because of the bank's act. There was no direct causal connection between the two things. There was an interruption and the intervention of an entirely separate cause, which cause was an independent human agency acting with an independent mind."

The same may be said of the case at bar; and the only difference in the two cases is that, in the one under consideration, a threat of arrest was communicated to the bank, thus bringing pointedly to its attention a probable consequence of its refusal to pay the check. That such a consequence might follow the refusal, however, was known to the bank official in the case of Hartford v. All Day and All Night Bank, supra, since the issuance of a check upon a bank without funds or credit to meet it is a public offense which notoriously frequently results in the arrest and imprisonment of the drawer of the check. The case cited emphasizes the factor present therein of the "independent human agency acting with an independent mind," which it holds to be an intervening and separate cause, and to which the plaintiff's damage must be attributed rather than to the refusal of the bank to pay the check. We think the difference between the two cases is not of such a nature as to call for the application of a different rule of decision.

Several cases cited by the appellants strongly support their argument that the refusal to pay the check ought to be considered as the proximate cause of the arrest, but the argument was equally applicable to the Hartford Case, and was not there found to be of sufficient force to compel the adoption of the rule advocated by the appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte CAREY. (Cr. 614.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 10, 1922.)

1. Criminal law ☞1218—Police court may commit offenders to reformatories.

Police and justice courts may commit offenders to reformatories.

2. Criminal law ☞1208(9)—Police court can commit offender to reformatory for indeterminate sentence.

Police courts can commit offenders to reformatories for indeterminate sentence.

3. Criminal law ☞1213—Commitment to California Industrial Farm for Women not punishment but for purposes of reformation.

The detention provided by St. 1919, p. 246, creating California Industrial Farm for Women, is not, within purview of the Constitution, punishment at all, but is for purposes of reformation, and does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

4. Constitutional law ☞205(2)—Criminal law ☞1206(1)—Statute giving right to confine fallen women not unconstitutional as denying privileges given men.

St. 1919, p. 246, creating a home for and confining fallen women for purposes of reformation, is not invalid as denying privileges and immunities under Const. U. S. Amend. 14, even though the act is directed only to women as a class.

5. Constitutional law ☞205(2)—Criminal law ☞1206(1)—Prostitution ☞1—There is no discrimination in confining women for "soliciting for prostitution"; men being punished for pandering.

"Soliciting for prostitution" is the act of a fallen woman in hailing passers-by and soliciting them to patronize her business; and, since under San Francisco county ordinance a woman only can be so charged, there is no discrimination in confining one found guilty in California Industrial Farm for Women (St.

1919, p. 246), the punishment for men for "pandering" being under Pen. Code, § 318.

Application of Betty Carey for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the superintendent of the California Industrial Farm for Women to secure release of petitioner. Writ discharged.

C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. Betty Carey, in whose behalf this proceeding is instituted, was, by a judgment of the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, committed to the California Industrial Farm for Women in conformity with the provisions of section 8 of an act establishing said farm. Stats. 1919, p. 246. She will be referred to in this opinion as the petitioner.

An ordinance of said city and county provides as follows:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person on any public street or highway or elsewhere to solicit * * * for the purpose of prostitution.

"Sec. 2. Any person violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $100 or by imprisonment not more than fifty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The petitioner was convicted of the offense denounced in said ordinance, and upon appearing for sentence the following judgment was entered:

"The court renders its judgment: That whereas, the said defendant having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of misdemeanor, to wit: Soliciting prostitution, * * * it is ordered and adjudged that the said defendant be committed to the California Industrial Farm for Women under section 8, chapter 165, Statutes 1919."

The petitioner is detained at said farm under said judgment on a commitment that amounts, in effect, to an indeterminate sentence. She claims that the judgment in question is void, and she assigns in support of this contention a number of reasons, among which are that it is beyond the jurisdiction of the police court to sentence a defendant to the farm upon an indeterminate sentence, which might amount to a detention for the period of five years; that the punishment is cruel and unusual; that the act is discriminatory, in that it applies only to women; and that the Legislature cannot, by general enactment, modify an ordinance of said city and county.

Those portions of the act that are material to the points under examination read as follows:

"Section 1. There shall be established within this state an institution for the confinement, care and reformation of delinquent women, to be known as the California Industrial Farm for Women.

"Sec. 2. The purpose of said institution shall be to provide custody, care, protection, industrial and other training and reformatory help for delinquent women."

"Sec. 8. When any woman, eighteen years of age or over is found guilty by any court within this state of prostitution, soliciting for prostitution, keeping a house of ill fame or residing in such house, frequenting any dance hall, hotel, rooming house, or other public place, for the purpose of prostitution, or of vagrancy because of being a common prostitute or a common drunkard, she shall, in lieu of any other sentence or disposition provided by law, be committed by the court in which she is so found guilty to said institution for an indeterminate period of not less than six months nor more than five years."

"Sec. 14. Every woman received by said institution shall be examined mentally and physically and shall, if retained by said institution, be given the care, treatment and training adapted to her particular condition. Such care, treatment and training shall be along the lines best suited to develop her mentality, character and industrial capacity to a point where she can be honorably discharged from the institution with reasonable safety and benefit to herself and to the public at large. Upon her reaching such point, in the judgment of the board of trustees, she shall be honorably discharged from the institution. * * *

Further provision is made that the person must, in any event, be discharged from the institution upon the expiration of the period for which she was committed.

The following provisions of the federal and state Constitutions are cited by petitioner in support of her writ:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the laws." Section 1, art. 14, Federal Const.

"Sec. 11, art. 1. All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Cal. Const.

"Sec. 13, art. 1. No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law." Cal. Const.

"Sec. 25, art. 4. The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * Second—for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors. * * * Thirty-third,—In all other cases where general laws can be made applicable." Cal. Const.

It is clear that the petitioner is held under a commitment for an indeterminate period. Such a commitment, after an extended examination of the question, was upheld by the Supreme Court in Re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 Pac. 958, wherein the court says:

"It is generally recognized by the courts and by modern penalologists that the purpose of the indeterminate sentence law, like other modern laws in relation to the administration of the criminal law, is to mitigate the punishment which would otherwise be imposed upon the offender. These laws place emphasis upon the reformation of the offender. They seek to make the punishment fit the criminal rather than the crime. They endeavor to put before the prisoner great incentive to well-doing. * * * It has uniformly been held that the indeterminate sentence is in legal effect a sentence for the maximum term."

The Police Court Judgment.

[1] It is insisted that, although a superior court might commit a prisoner for an indeterminate period, such power is not vested in the police court. But the power of police and justices' courts to commit offenders to reformatories, in cases authorized by the Legislature, is upheld in the cases herein-after cited. This power is so clear that we would abandon further examination of the matter, if no other points were involved.

[2] It is further claimed, however, that, even though a commitment to a reformatory might be upheld, still the police court could not commit the offender for a longer period than the longest period for which she might be committed to the county jail. This claim is equally untenable. In truth, every point urged in support of this writ has been decided adversely to the contentions of the petitioner, save one. This point will be noticed further along.

In one case in which a minor was committed to the industrial school by the police court of said city and county, the Supreme Court, in commenting upon the case, says:

"The action of the police judge here in question did not amount to a criminal prosecution, nor to proceedings against the minor according to the course of the common law, in which the right of trial by jury is guaranteed. The purpose in view is not punishment for the offense done, but reformation and training of the child to habits of industry, with a view to his future usefulness when he shall have been reclaimed to society, or shall have attained his majority. * * * The restraint imposed upon him by public authority is in its nature and purpose the same which, under other conditions, is habitually imposed by parents, guardians of the person, and others exercising supervision and control over the conduct of those who are by reason of infancy, lunacy, or otherwise, incapable of properly controlling themselves." Ex parte Ah Peen, 51 Cal. 280.

John Liddell, a minor, was found guilty of the crime of petit larceny and was sentenced by a justice's court to serve one year in the reform school. The court, in upholding the action of the justice's court, says:

"There can be no question as to the power of the Legislature to provide for the detention and education of juvenile offenders, as it has done in this act; and the provisions of the act are not obnoxious to the criticism that it prescribes unjust or unequal penalties. It is true, the term of detention at the reform school may be made greater by the judgment of the court than the term of imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison for the same offense would be; but it cannot be said that the punishment inflicted is greater than could be put upon an adult for the same offense. The object of the act is, not punishment, but reformation, discipline, and education. * * * While detained for a longer period, perhaps, than he would be if sent to state prison or the county jail, the conditions surrounding the child are vastly different. He is given the opportunity and instruction to learn a trade, and qualify himself for the duties of citizenship, so that at the end of his term he will go out prepared to take care of himself, and those dependent upon him, without the odium which attaches to an ex-convict. * * * It is equally clear that the state may arrest the downward tendency of those who have offended against its laws, and manifested a disposition to follow a criminal career, by placing them in an institution where they will receive the care, education, and discipline necessary to prepare them for honorable citizenship." Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251.

"Petitioner assails the constitutionality of said statute mainly upon the grounds that it is unequal in its operation, because under it an adult can be punished for petit larceny * * * for only six months, while a minor may, for the same offense, be sent to said school for a much longer period; that a justice's court has no jurisdiction in such a case to impose imprisonment for more than six months; that the statute is a special law regulating jurisdiction of a justice's court, etc. These and similar objections to the statute are answered against petitioner's contention by the case of Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633." Ex parte Nicholas, 110 Cal. 651, 43 Pac. 9.

Ex parte Ah Peen, supra, was approved by this court in the Matter of O'Connor, 29 Cal. App. 234, 155 Pac. 115. In no case have we found any criticism of the foregoing authorities. They enunciate the principles that must govern this court in the disposition of this matter.

Cruel and Unusual Punishment.

[3] This claim may be dismissed with the statement that the detention provided for in the statute is not, within the purview of the Constitution, punishment at all. It is not a penalty. Indeed, it is wholly for purposes of assistance and reformation. Whether or not the detention is an unwarranted interference with personal liberty, it seems clear that it does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. People v. Oppenheimer, 156 Cal. 733, 106 Pac. 74; In re O'Shea, 11 Cal. App. 568, 105 Pac. 776; Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U. S. 130, 25 L. Ed. 345; Ex parte

Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519.

Unequal Privileges and Immunities.

[4] Petitioner points out that the statute denies to women certain privileges and immunities granted to men, thereby violating the Fourteenth Amendment and other constitutional guaranties. It is quite certain that the statute is applicable only to women, and if, in fact, it makes discriminations against them in particulars not warranted by natural or other conditions, it violates the constitutional guaranties of equal protection to all. It should be noted that the state has never claimed that it does not discriminate with reference to women; though, happily, it is believed that these discriminations are enacted mainly in their own interest. It is accepted, law that a state may discriminate in favor of women (or against them, according to the point of view) with reference to hours of labor. Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, 35 Sup. Ct. 342, 59 L. Ed. 628, L. R. A. 1915F, 829. This case is found reported in 162 Cal. 687, 124 Pac. 427. It enunciates many important principles applicable to the case at bar. The following quotations are taken therefrom:

"Although this guaranty of the Constitution is apparently absolute and unqualified, yet it is well established that it is subject to the exercise, by the Legislature, of what are known as the police powers of the state. * * *

"The injury must be of such character and extent and to such a number of persons that it may be reasonably supposed that it will cause injury to others, that is, to the community in general, or, as it is expressed, to the public health and general welfare. * * *

"(Quoting) 'If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to preserve public health, the public morals or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to these objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the court so to adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution.' * * *

"So, also, it has been recognized that some occupations followed by women, though less arduous than those generally followed by men, may have such a tendency to injure their health, if unduly prolonged, that laws may be enacted restricting their time of labor therein to ten hours per day. The application of these laws exclusively to women is justified on the ground that they are less robust in physical organization and structure than men, that they have the burden of child-bearing, and, consequently, that the health and strength of posterity and the public in general is presumed to be enhanced by preserving and protecting women from exertion which men might bear without detriment to the general welfare. [Citing many cases.] * * *

"We must take this statute as a law intended for a police regulation to preserve, protect, or promote the general health and welfare."

This case, as exemplified by the Supreme Court of this state and the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error, establishes two very important principles, namely, that legislation may be directed to women as a class and that they may be segregated into groups or subclasses in the interests of public health, safety, or morals. And these two principles lie at the foundation of the legislation attacked by the petitioner.

However, we are not driven to the necessity of determining whether the Legislature may, in the exercise of its power to protect the general health, morals, or safety, provide one punishment for a man and another punishment or remedy as against a woman; for, as we shall show further along, the crime committed by the petitioner is one that cannot be committed by a man.

The question is narrowed down to this: Does the state have the lawful right to seize its fallen women and confine them for purposes of reformation and assistance? That it may seize and confine minors, morons, lunatics, criminals, and persons addicted to the excessive use of drugs, and liquors is not questioned. The first and last enumerated classes are confined solely for purposes of reformation and assistance. It is insisted that the state, if it confine its fallen women, for purposes of reformation, should make like provision for dealing with those of the opposite sex. But the difficulty is that men cannot commit the crime of carrying on the business of prostitution, except as accessories, and therefore no general rule on the subject could be made to apply to both sexes. The fallen woman alone carries on the traffic. If others prey upon her frailty, it is only with her co-operation—willing or unwilling.

The relation sustained by the fallen woman to her business and society at large is altogether unlike that sustained by her partner in crime. She follows a business that can be carried on only by women. The most casual observer cannot fail to see a vast difference between fallen women as a class and the balance of the human kind. They stand apart. No other body of malefactors constitute so distinctly a class as do the fallen women. They present a greater single element of economic, social, moral, and hygienic loss than is the case with any other single criminal class. Not only do they constitute a menace to the morals and social welfare of mankind, but they carry very unusually heavy pathological liabilities. In truth, from the standpoint of public health they are sometimes referred to as pestilential and their places of abode as pest houses. The law declares them to be a public nuisance. Altogether, they present the most perplexing problem with which modern penology and social legislation are called upon to deal. The fallen woman occupies a relation to society very analogous to that of the chronic typhoid carrier—a sort of clearing house for the very worst forms of disease. The right to quarantine persons suspected of contact with infectious is uniformly upheld by both state and national governments. The right to quarantine at all implies the right to continue the isolation so long as the danger remains. That a woman carrying on the business denounced in the statute is a constant pathological danger no one would question. If this be true, the fact implies the right to seize the offender and detain her, not only for mere purposes of temporary quarantine, but for the laudable purpose of reclaiming her and destroying the probability of a subsequent renewal of the danger. Though her entry upon a life of shame may often be due to social maladjustments or to the abuse of her affections, still the statute in question does not purport to deal with her as an innocent person. On the contrary, the law appraises her as so steeped in crime and in so exceptional an environment that ordinary methods of reformation and escape are impossible. Every door is closed to her. Every avenue of escape is shut off. The state, realizing this, has undertaken to take forcible charge of this class of unfortunates and extend to them a home, education, assistance, and encouragement in an effort, otherwise hopeless, to restore them to lives of usefulness. The state combines both altruism and self-preservation. Of similar import, though devoid of the shocking features, are such measures as maternity bills and acts establishing houses of refuge for homeless women. The act is wholly identical in spirit with those provisions of law which authorize the detention and reformation of common drunkards, even though the latter, in terms, apply to all persons of either sex who are capable of becoming such. The statute assailed in this proceeding applies equally to every person who is capable of committing and who commits the offenses inhibited therein.

It is true that the statute provides that every woman carrying on the business of prostitution may be committed to the farm; but the statute would have meant exactly the same had it in terms applied to every person. The fact that the fallen woman carries on the business of commercialized vice justifies whatever discriminations may be found in the statute. The act of her partner in vice, while equally as nefarious, is neither commercialized nor continuous. It is proper enough to send him to jail for his offense, but it is doubtful if the scheme of impounding him for purposes of reformation would commend itself to the lawgiver. The conditions surrounding the two classes of offenders are so unlike that different methods of treatment are fully justified.

So superlative are the demands of civilization upon its women that discriminations in handling criminal cases may, as to them, under some circumstances, be upheld without violation of the constitutional guaranties; especially where, as here, the discrimination, in her case, withholds the penal tax and affords a more humane and beneficent line of treatment. At least, it would seem that she cannot complain of such treatment.

The Charge in the Commitment.

[5] The specific charge against the petitioner is, not that of carrying on the business of prostitution, but of soliciting for prostitution. She insists that a man, as readily as a woman, may commit this offense, and that therefore no discrimination in punishment can be tolerated. Even if this premise were sound, we are far from conceding the soundness of her conclusion. But the premise is not sound. The ordinance, it is true, applies to "every person." For the offense, if he could commit it, he would be sent to jail. In her case she might be committed to the farm for purposes of reformation. But a man can no more commit the offense of soliciting for prostitution than that of carrying on the business of prostitution. In one sense, possibly, it may be said that a man who acts as a "capper" for a house of prostitution is guilty of the crime of soliciting for it. But the crime committed by others than the principal is known as "pandering" and the offender is known as a "panderer," "pimp," or "procurer." His punishment is provided for in section 318 of the Penal Code. The words "soliciting for prostitution" have a well-understood and distinct meaning. They are held to mean the act of a fallen woman in hailing passers-by and soliciting them to patronize her business. They are so understood by police officers and all others who are called upon to labor with this class of people. The various reasons which we have assigned for holding that the crime of carrying on the business of prostitution is confined to fallen women apply with equal force to the specific charge against the petitioner.

The charge is sufficient. The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

CAVANAGH et al. v. SHAVER, Superintendent of Streets, et al. (Civ. 3972.)*

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 8, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 4, 1922.)

4. Municipal corporations $\S$ 581—Fifty per cent. redemption penalty on sale for taxes was not saved by repealing statute.

The provision of Pol. Code, $\S$ 3779, requiring payment to the county treasurer, for redemption from a sale to the county for taxes, of the purchase money and 50 per cent. thereof, which was made applicable to assessments for the opening of streets by St. 1889, p. 73, $\S$ 16, was not saved as to the penalty from the repeal of that section by St. 1895, p. 19, $\S$ 8, and by St. 1895, p. 328, $\S$ 59, by the provision of St. 1895, p. 204, $\S$ 1, which provided all sales and redemption should be made in the manner such sales and redemption were made before that act, since the saving clause makes no reference to penalties.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 581—Fifty per cent. redemption penalty on sale for taxes not extended to street opening assessments.

In view of St. 1889, p. 73, $\S$ 16, imposing a 5 per cent. penalty on delinquent assessments for street openings, the provision of Pol. Code, $\S$ 3779, requiring payment of the purchase price of property sold for taxes to the county with 50 per cent. penalty in order to redeem, was not extended to street assessments by the provision in that section of the street assessment act extending to such assessments the provisions for the collection of delinquent state and county taxes not inconsistent with that act.

3. Pleading $\S$ 403(3)—Defective averment of receipt of money held cured by answer and finding.

The defective averment, in a complaint for money had and received, that the money in controversy was actually received by defendants, was cured, where defendants alleged the money had never come into their possession, and at the trial the court found the money had been received by defendants, and there was no showing that they were prevented by the trial court from making full and complete proof on that issue, so that they were not prejudiced by the complaint within Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 475.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1030—Premature commencement of action does not require reversal.

That an action for money had and received was commenced before the actual receipt of the money by defendants does not require reversal of a judgment rendered against defendants after they had received the money.

5. Money received $\S$ 14—Judgment cannot be rendered against officer whose successor received the money.

A judgment cannot be rendered against a defendant either individually or as street commissioner for money had and received, where it was undisputed that the money was actually received by his successor in office, who was not made a party to the action.

6. Taxation $\S$ 710—Deposit to redeem from tax sale was made under duress.

A deposit to redeem property of plaintiffs from a tax sale, which was necessary to prevent the permanent loss of plaintiffs' title, was made under duress, although plaintiffs' title had already been clouded when the deposit was made.

7. Pleading $\S$ 347—Defendants in action for penalty erroneously deposited held not entitled to judgment on pleadings.

In an action by taxpayers to recover the amount of a penalty which they were erroneously required to deposit to redeem from a tax sale, the defendants were not entitled to a judgment on the pleadings notwithstanding a defective allegation of receipt of the money by defendants, where the answer alleging the money had not been received was deemed denied under Code Civ. Proc. § 462.

8. New trial — Court held to have jurisdiction to grant, after judgment for defendants who subsequently received money sued for.

Where the trial court had rendered a judgment for defendants in an action for money had and received after proceedings indicating a trial on the merits under Code Civ. Proc. § 582, because there was no showing at that time that defendants had ever received the money in controversy, the trial court had jurisdiction to grant a new trial after the defendants, before the judgment was signed or filed, had collected the money and had since retained it.
